He talks with cautious Gideon and the nation's long captivity becomes overwhelming. Strong Samson's father is overawed by the Man talking with him strangely no man. The Jewish statesman administers the world's empire of the Euphrates is ruled by a Man of Fire in a blinding blaze of first it is simply a man, in outer appearance in tone of voice, in garb, in the inter-labor. Then, quietly, unmistakably, comes credible overpowering evidence that He is simply a man.

And there is something more that runs through these fleeting glimpses. There is the Unusual Man Coming. These glimpses illustrate the meaning of that. That childless exile of Ur is told that through his unborn son will come a man who will bless the world.

And then old Israel, on the Nile, sees a Man coming to lead the race. The foremost racial prophet speaks of a Man coming to do for all that he does for the Hebrews. The royal poet speaks of a Man coming to rule, and to right, and be as a benediction to the world, and the fragrant of the dew of the new morning—then, the Man is here. He is born in a world unknown before, and unrepeatable since. He grows up in the simple Nazareth home. He is out of thirty-three years, ten-elevenths of His life, is spent in a whitewashed stone house and a carpenter shop.

Nazareth means a commonplace life, in its ordinary circumstance, lived truly for God. Look at Him: rising in the morning, the kindling, the cow likely, hanging the kettle over the fire, maybe, down the street with a cheery "Good morning" to His fellow-craftsmen.

At the carpenter shop, amid the odor of shavings, hammering nails, gouging, chiseling, pushing a saw, polishing off the table for a crusty customer. Back at the stretching weary muscles, the evening meal, talking over with the mother of the home the small, big, home problems, rent-day maybe, making both ends meet.

And then off sharing sleeping space on a pallet in a corner with a brother. And that not for a year, thirty of them. The Father's plan for the God-Man's life down here meant just that, living, simply living a truly human life, commonplace in its outer round.

Then there was the smaller round, measured in years. Feeding men's hunger, healing the maimed and lamed and diseased, robbing the grave of its victims, comforting sore hearts, talking over personal problems in the doorway, teaching by the roadside.

Is it any wonder the Galilean hills rang with praise of this Man, faces brightened at the mention of Him, homes echoed glad songs, little children came a-running, strong men and women came and listened and went with a peace within.

Then the opposition. Of course. The enmities aroused, the selfish ambitions blocked, old prejudices rudely jolted, cherished plans threatened. And then the climax. Ten times the leaders tried to do Him to death, and are held off with an unseen power they can't understand and can't resist. Then He allowed them to take Him, and do their worst.

And He did it, He said, for us. There was some terrible need that it be done, that dying. So He died. And when the tomb had quite done its work, He quietly let Himself up, up toward His true center of gravity. No tombs for Him when that one had done its work.

Truly He was the God-Man, and is, as human as though only human and nothing more; as really God as though only God and nothing else. Jesus was the Face of God looking into men's faces. He was the Voice of God talking into men's ears. He was God Himself in human shoes, hand-pegged, and in human clothes, home-spun, hand-stitched.

HEAVENLY BREEZES.

A ship was lying becalmed while the sea around it was like glass and the air seemed motionless. Presently a pennant on top of the tall mast was fluttering gently. There was no hint of breeze on water or on the deck of the vessel, but the sailors spread the upper sails. Soon the ship was moving through the quiet waters, being driven by the currents of the upper air. This story is a parable of life. The atmosphere in which we move on the street, in the shop, in the office, as we transact business and social affairs, may seem dead, and we may feel that life is unprogressive and dead, but above all these there are currents of life like the breezes of the upper air, and, if only we will spread our sails and take advantage of them, the soul can cease standing still. We can catch the impetus of higher and better things.—Exchange.

LOOKING FOR SNAPS.

Who are some of the boys who would rather "catch a ride" than do their own errands? Well, one of them is the boy who tried to get through school by "luck," by cheating, or by any other method than hard, honest study. Another is he who endeavors to perform his tasks by makeshifts—giving only superficial effort instead of diligent, thorough labor. Again, there is the boy who expects to be given a position, and to get along in life generally, because of his friends or influence. He would ride to success on somebody's fame or fortune rather than plod there by his own efforts. Of course he misses the ability that comes by labor, and he misses, too, the sense of mastery that comes only through the performance of one's own work.

The truth is, too many of us have that dangerous notion in our heads that we ought to seek a "soft snap." Try to go through life under that impression and you will have the hardest kind of a time. Think for a moment how cowardly such a creed is. It means virtually this: "I will work my share of the work; I will get out of paying every honest man's debt to the world; I will ride to success, if possible, on some other person's labors." Could anything be more un-American, unmanly, or ignoble?

The boy whom the world will love and honor is he who bravely and conscientiously gives it of himself and his work. He is not afraid of labor—labor is the lot of all honest men. He has a contempt for any "short-cut" methods of reaching success. Others may idle and ride when they ought to be working and walking, but as for him, the true boy, he will not stint in faithfulness or energy. In short, he takes his working creed the words from a certain wise book, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."—W. T. Ellis, in Sabbath School Visitor.

TESTED BECAUSE TRUSTED.

A father who was an officer during the war, with his son under him, wrote out an order called his son, and said, "Deliver this to the general down on the firing line." The young man placed the message under his belt, mounted his horse and rode away. The enemy's bullets flew thick and fast while he made the dangerous ride. The father stood and watched, and waited, and wondered, while that strange conflict raged in his soul that must take place where the father and the officer are one person, and the son and subaltern the other, and that son exposed to danger by the father's command. At last the son rode back into his father's presence with his foam-covered horse and dismounted. The father threw his arms about his boy's neck and said: "My son, I did not want you killed, but I had to send a man that I could trust." God's bravest and best soldiers are in the hard places.—The Changeless Christ.

CLEAN HANDS.

A jewelry salesman, noticing his hands to be somewhat soiled, said: "This is very trying to me. Of all persons, I should have soft and clean hands. It is awful to offer a diamond or pearls of any sort to a possible customer when my hands are not perfectly white and tidy. It makes a repulsive background for the piece of jewelry."

The Christian should have clean hands and a clean life. Whoever he may be, minister or not, he recommends Jesus Christ and his salvation to the world. His life should not be a sorry and repelling background.

They who bear the vessels of the Lord should have pure hands. The salesman was very sensitive, and rightly so. He had cultivated taste. Each professing Christian should be scrupulously careful to maintain a consistent life.—Selected.

From Brother Braswell.

We want to extend our heartfelt thanks to the following persons for the donations they have made to us in time of need. Sister Hattie Harris Perkins of Raleigh, $10; Brother T. D. Harris of Oxford, $10; Brother E. C. Harris of Oxford, $10; Brother Thomas Chandler of Oxford, $1; Brother F. A. Pearson of Garysburg, $5; Sister C. T. Moore, $1. I have no words that will express my deep appreciation of these donations and others that have been made during our days of trial.

I have many things to be thankful for. I feel very grateful for friends, and for the Bible with all its precious promises, and for Jesus who has promised to go with us to the end. I thank the Lord he lets me work for Him and with Him in the lowly places of His Kingdom. I am serving a little church that has paid me about $13 this year. I preach for them every Sunday, and we all enjoy it together. I am very glad indeed that I have gotten well and strong enough to do a man's work again. I have to work as hard as I ever did at any time in life. I do not know how long I will hold up at it. I am so glad that I am able to take care of the one that has stood by me for nearly fifty-two years. I am having to go through some things that seem hard. I reckon it is right or it would not be so. It might be different if those who have money would spend it in the right way. If I keep as well as I am at present, I am planning to do all the revival work I can this year. I have two engagements to hold meetings, one the third Sunday in August, and one the first Sunday in September, and there are a number of places where there is no church that a man can go and hold meetings and do good. God bless you all. Pray for us. D. A. Braswell.

State Street, Church, Lexington.—The Easter program rendered principally by the children was very good. The collection too was quite encouraging.

Our revival meeting began last night. Brother Gerringer of Calvary church, Greensboro, is doing the preaching. He gave us a fine sermon last night. We feel sure this meeting will have great results in many ways.

Sunday school is growing in numbers and interest. Our church heads all the churches in town for attendance according to the number of church members.

Please pray for the success of the meeting here.

A card just received from Brother Bethea reports a great Easter service at State Street, and G. C. B. paid in full. Hats off to State Street.

Please let us have the Easter offering from all churches promptly. Our books are balanced each month and all G. C. B. receipts forwarded to Treasurer Staley. We trust that the Easter offering may be in by the time our April account is balanced. Thank you.

Stanly.—Many things are being done here since spring has opened. Just a few weeks ago the people of Friendship got together and began to beautify the grounds around the church and parsonage and in a few days the grounds were looking much better. The grass seed has been sown and has come up and is growing rapidly. We are planning to have some beautiful flowers as soon as the weather gets warm.

A nice and very expensive bulletin board has also been placed on the church ground near the highway which marks the place plainly and adds much beauty.

The District Rally will be held at Friendship April the 18th and 19th. All-day services Saturday and Sunday, beginning at ten o'clock A. M.

We are getting ready for the painting of the church inside and out. We hope to have it finished by the rally day.

The second quarterly meeting was held here Saturday. The business was transacted in a spirit of love.

A large congregation was present Sunday. Some have said Mr. Ridge presented one of the best sermons they ever heard him preach.

Our Easter program is being prepared and will be rendered Sunday.

Alghany, Davids n Ciscuit.—Pastor Ridge the second Sunday preached a good Easter sermon, which we enjoyed very much. There was the largest congregation that we have had this spring. There is some sickness which hindered some. Mr. A. O. Lanier is very low.

Sunday school is doing fairly well. The little children seem to enjoy it fine. Some of them had some pieces which they spoke well. We always love to see the children have a part. I believe that all ought to have a chance to do something in the church. I believe that sometimes some stay away from church because they feel that they don't have part in the work. Give all a chance to do their part. There is work for all and plenty of it. Just a few cannot do all the work. Collection, $1.80.

Brother Ridge will commence a singing next Saturday night, $1 for adults and 50c for children under 15 years. Pray for us that we may all do our part.

Community Church, Thomasville.—Our special meeting of ten days closed last Friday evening. Rev. J. R. Hutton was with us and did the preaching. He endeared himself to us while here, and we shall welcome a visit from him at any time. We enjoyed having him in our homes and listening to his most interesting conversations; and in the pulpit he is really a teacher of God's Word. Every sermon was made plain and clear even so the children could understand the word. We greatly appreciate his work and feel that his efforts were not in vain.

On Sunday morning we received ten into the church on profession of faith and by letter, whom we are glad to welcome and feel they will be much help in our work here. All the infants of our good brothers and sisters, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gardner, and Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Hall, were baptized just after the opening of the morning service. Then followed a beautiful sermon by our pastor, Rev. J. B. Williams, on "The Power of the Resurrection."

Sunday evening the children rendered the Easter program. They did their parts with about forty children taking part. The offering for our Board of Home Missions amounted to $20. A large crowd was present. Mr. Williams made a short address on home missionary work.

Just after the service he and Mrs. Williams left for Hillsboro in their car to visit his father and relatives on Easter Monday.

Our Sunday school is doing splendid work. Superintendent Finch is always thinking of new and nice things to do—and does them. On Sunday morning he had quantities of carnations there and distributed by several young ladies to each member and visitor present, everybody was wearing a flower and a smile, and no doubt but that Mr. Finch was the happiest one there. We greatly appreciate this act of kindness and thoughtfulness his.

We were so glad to see our young people who have been away in colleges back with us again; also the ones who are elsewhere in business, and the one who had married and left away. All came back to visit home folks and their interesting church. Even our good friend and singer, Miss Myrtle Perry, who has been under her physician's care and has ordered rest and keep quiet (and we had missed her so much for the past two weeks) came in. We trust she may soon be able to take her place in the choir.

INVITATION TO ALL METHODIST PROTESTANTS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Next Sunday the splendid new church in Point is to be opened with a sermon by H. Lewis, president of the General Conference, and the pastor, Dr. George R. Brown, calls all our people in North Carolina to attend this service. The sermon at night will be by the resident A. G. Dixon, of our conference. Those who cannot accept this invitation yet rejoice with our High Point people in the fact that they have come into possession of this magnificent church. It does not seem very long to us since they built their church. That has since been enlarged by the addition of Sunday school rooms, and now has been outgrown, and this new building was necessary to supply a felt need.

Klux Klan Declining.—Reports from different parts of the country where this organization has had its greatest strength indicate that disintegration has set in. Various reports are assigned, as the quarrels among members, loss of confidence and consequent refusal to continue to pay dues, etc. We were pleased to have a call from Rev. F. Kennett during his recent visit to us. He and Mrs. Kennett are enjoying their work and associations with the people of our community.

The sum of more than $100,000 has been raised by a citizen's committee of Staunton, Va., for a memorial to President Woodrow Wilson. Staunton is the birthplace of the President. The house where he was born has been made into a national shrine.

Elwood Haynes of Kokomo, Indiana, inventor, designer and builder of the first vehicle ever driven by a gasoline engine, died April 13, at the age of 67. Mr. Haynes took his first ride in his "horseless carriage" on April 4, 1894, at a speed of about seven miles per hour. Later, in Chicago, a policeman told him to "get that contraption off the streets." The "contraption" is now in the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, D. C. Haynes gave it to the Government in

In 1898 Mr. Haynes founded the Haynes Automobile Company at Kokomo and was its president until his death. He was the inventor of many improvements that have helped to make the automobile what it is today. Thirty years ago the "horseless carriage" was a curiosity. Today the automobile industry is one of the greatest industries in the world.

—DR. TIKHON, former Patriarch of All Russia, that is, head of the Russian Orthodox Church, died April 5 in a monastery near Moscow. He was known throughout the world for his struggle against the Soviet government of Russia. In 1922 he refused to obey an order that all church treasure should be turned over to the government to aid in famine relief. He charged that the government was simply stealing church property for its own uses. He was thrown into prison charged with treason, but was finally released. However, he was forced to resign as Patriarch. The Soviet government is opposed to the Russian Orthodox Church and has tried to break its power in that country. Dr. Tikhon was well known in the United States. He was head of the Russian Orthodox Church in this country for eight years (1899-1907). He first went to San Francisco and later to New York. He was elected Patriarch of All Russia in 1917.

NOTICE, PASTORS AND CHURCH TREASURERS.

Receipts for A. C. B. are falling below current expenses. There is not enough in hand now to meet the obligations of this month. Thank you.

And that Easter offering—please, please do not neglect to send it in. Every dollar of it should be reported during this month. Some have been very prompt; others will, no doubt, get their offering in at the earliest possible date.

S. W. Taylor, Treasurer.

April 21.

The finance and budget committee of the W. H. M. S. recommended that the apportionment for the branch be $4,500, and that the following months be specified for raising the funds for the various interests:

April—General Fund.

May—Scholarships for High Point College.

June—Business Girls' Home in Baltimore.

September—Bethel Home.

October—Foreign Work in Ohio.

November—Children's Home.

January—Pittsburgh Mission.

March—Pine Ridge.

If you have not learned what your apportionment is don't wait, but begin at once to raise as much or more than you were asked to raise last year on practically the same percentage basis.

If it is too late to raise the General Fund in April try to double up the first month if possible or select one of the months that is not specified. Let us begin a drive for funds now.

"SOMETHING KEPT ME."

A business man said recently in an informal talk to his Bible class of young men: "My stepfather was unkind to me, and I left home for good when I was only eleven years old. My mother was a good woman—I loved her, and she loved me—but she knew little of the world and could not advise me as an experienced father might have done.

"For the next six years I mingled with all classes of people except good people and had every opportunity to become a tough and criminal. Well, I wasn't a model boy by any means, but I never lost my footing. How I kept it I don't know. As I look back at those days I can't remember that I had the instinctive shrinking from wrongdoing that is the safeguard of some sensitive natures. The things I saw and heard didn't disgust me.

"When I was about seventeen years old a lad from the country came to work in the factory where I was employed, and he and I became intimate. John Wilson—that was his name—told me a good deal about his home, which had been a far different home from mine. John had had his share of temptations, but he said frankly that he believed his mother's prayers had helped to carry him through. I began to wonder whether my mother had ever prayed for me. If she had prayed for me she had done it in secret.

"One evening I went with John to a religious meeting in a little Methodist chapel in the suburbs. Some of the earnest prayers I heard that night amazed me. What most impressed me were the petitions for all who were tempted, helpless, destitute, distressed, lonely, or friendless. That seemed odd to me. I had always thought of prayer—when I had thought of it at all—as asking God for something we wanted for ourselves. I had never thought that Christians the world over prayed for people whom they didn't know, but who needed God's protection and help. And during those years of hardship and temptation such prayers had been going up to God for me! Something had kept me all through those perilous days! Something was keeping me now and would keep me to the end! God's people had called God's attention to me, and he had been watching over me.

"I think I learned the secret of prayer that night. Praying for people I don't know has a meaning for me. It isn't a formula; some one needs it. Who can say where I should be today but for the prayers of strangers?"—The Youth's Companion.

HEALTH HINTS FOR FARM HOMES.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

If you were offered the privilege of choosing one from among these three things—health, wealth, learning—which would you take? I imagine that, however longingly you might gaze on wealth or learning, you would finally settle down with health as your best friend. You would rightly conclude that with health you might expect to acquire sufficient wealth and learning to meet your needs; while without health nothing else could be very much enjoyed. A thing so highly prized as health should be guarded with great care. Here are some homely helps.

Teeth.

The teeth should be brushed after each meal and before retiring. Adequate dental service is a necessity. Prompt filling of cavities is wise economy. Abscesses on the roots may cause serious trouble. The mouth is the mill in which food is cut and ground; because of the important work it does—and for the sake of the stomach and bowels receiving the material which it has worked upon—the mouth should be kept clean and in good repair.

Lungs.

The lungs should be so managed as to utilize all their parts. Holding the head high, keeping the shoulders up and thrown well back, making use of such exercises and doing such work as call—at least occasionally, for rapid and deep breathing, are excellent habits.

The lungs need pure air with which to invigorate the blood; they also throw off poisons with the breath—hence the importance of spending much time in the open air, and having sleeping rooms well ventilated.

The Skin.

"Cleanliness is next to godliness." Remember the commandment, "Six days shalt thou wash and keep thyself clean, and the seventh day thou shalt take a great bath. For in six days man gathers filth and disease germs: wherefore the Lord blessed the bath-tub, and hallowed it."

In addition to frequent water baths there should be an air bath twice each day. It is bad practice to jump from the bed into one's clothes in the morning and back from one's clothes into bed at night, even in the coldest weather. Take plenty of time. Go over the entire body with the hands, rubbing vigorously. This will wake up the skin, remove dead particles from it, admit fresh air to the pores, and give mild exercise to all the joints and muscles.

Food.

Eat regularly and moderately. Stop before getting full. It is a sure sign that you have over-eaten if, after leaving the table, you feel you are carrying a load.

Even if one does not think best to reject all animal food, one will be wise to use meat only sparingly—especially after having reached middle life.

Fruits, vegetables and grains may be used in liberal quantities—pastry and rich desserts with discretion. Tea and coffee should be mild and cooked but little.

Exercise.

No farmer should allow himself to imagine that work—even outdoor work—furnishes adequate exercise. The horse, after drawing the plow all day, will if not overworked, take some exercise when turned loose at night. The normal boy plays—exercises—after his work is done, sometimes even before his task is completed. The back, the legs, the feet, the shoulders, need special handling to supplement the sort of exercise they get in connection with a man's daily toil. Several times a day, whatever a person's work may be, he should straighten himself up, breathe deeply, and call into action for a few moments muscles not ordinarily used.

The getting together of farmer folks for community games and athletic stunts contributes to both health and sociability.

Stimulants.

Faithful obedience to the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead act will bring no regrets. The farmer needs a clear head, money in his purse, and a fine family life—all of which intoxicants threaten to destroy.

Why should a man's mouth be made filthy and his whole body be rendered mal-odorous by the use of tobacco in any form; even if grown men are granted the right to use the weed, boys should be instructed against injuring their development by such indulgence.

Calls of Nature.

Heed promptly the calls of nature. Delayed and imperfect elimination of bodily wastes is one of the most fruitful causes of inefficiency and disease. Nature's promptings are usually timely, but, because of our artificial ways of living, it is not always convenient to respond—and we suffer for our neglect.

The bowels and bladder are important, even if "unseemly," parts of our bodily machinery—so they should be given the "more abundant honor" of prompt obedience. Perfectly clean and wholesome food leaves in the body deposits of waste materials which, if retained too long, breed poisons as disastrous to health as the most deadly gases ever found in mine or sewer.

By careful observance of these simple hints residents on the farm may become in fact—what fancy has mistakenly pictured them to be—the healthiest group of people in the world.

THE DIFFERENCE IT HAS MADE.

Nearly 1900 Easter days have come and gone since the affrighted women came to the tomb of Jesus with their spices, found it empty, and heard the angel say: "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen."

Nearly 1900 long, long years have passed, and still in the world there are crimes unutterable and shameless men and women. We are tempted to say in our darker moments as we approach another day that celebrates the gladdest anniversary of all the year: "What has been accomplished, after all? How is the world better? How has Jesus' resurrection affected mankind for good?"

The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain until now. We take up our morning paper, and we read of bandits and bootleggers, of a "crime wave" in Chicago, of a rum fleet off the Jersey coast, and of a "lone wolf" in Boston. We read of chaos in China, of starvation in Russia, and of increased war-preparations in half of the countries of Europe. The plea of President and commoner for a World Court of International Justice falls upon deaf ears in the Senate, and wisest plans for a better country and a better world are side-tracked for the sake of so petty bit of political advantage. We get impatient and perhaps morose as we cry out: "How long, O Lord, how long?"

Why do the chariot-wheels of righteousness stick in the mire like Pharaoh's, and "die heavily"? If the death and resurrection of Jesus mean all that Christians say they mean, why have not the slow centuries produced a better world? Why is it still a matter of debate between optimists and pessimists whether the world is really growing better or worse? Above all, why has the most horrible and devastating of all wars ruined half the earth, nineteen centuries after the Prince of Peace came to present His program of good will to all peoples?

One way to meet these questionings and forebodings is to deny the major premise of the pessimist, that the world is no better, perhaps worse, than it was nineteen hundred years ago. This denial I would make with bold face and a stout heart.

More Tender-Hearted. The Man in the Cave.

In the first place, the world is far more tender-hearted than it was nineteen centuries ago. Let me take an illustration of this from the daily papers, where the pessimist gets most of his information: A few weeks ago a poor man got imprisoned under a pile of rocks in a cave in Kentucky. Did anybody care? Rather, was there anybody in America who did not care? For seventeen days the whole country followed the fortunes of one poor man with almost breathless anxiety. Every morning the daily papers gave the largest and best space to him. Headlines three and four columns wide, told how the liverers were working toward the imprisonment of the man. He seemed to be of more importance to the nation than the President of the republic himself. Large groups of men neglected their business and worked in relieving squads day and night as they never would work for in order to reach one poor, perishing brother man, while millions and tens of millions watched eagerly for the messages which graph and telephone and radio constantly flashed over the country.

Floyd Collins was no superman on whom the destinies of America depended. He was an ordinary man, dear to an old father and mother, liked, no doubt, by his neighbors and low workmen, but yet not one whose death would have affected the nations. Why was all this ado made over him? Simply because he was a man, a fellow man, a man whom Jesus Christ by His life and death and resurrection taught us was worth saving even so far as a natural life was concerned.

If Jesus had not come and suffered and died, would the country have believed in Floyd Collins or any other man in humble position? Would there have been more than two weeks, and of all this tremendous publicity in a thousand newspapers I do not believe it. Jesus Christ showed us the difference of man as well as the worth of a soul.

In the old Roman days would a Floyd Collins lying by inches have created such a sensation? Who can think it? When Roman emperors threw their slaves into the ponds to their fishes; when they wrapped the Christians in tar and oily rags, and lighted them as torches to amuse the populace, would Floyd Collins in his cave have stood any chance of rescue? Would any company of men have dug feverish days and nights on the possibility of saving him? Who can believe it?

To little children, to helpless women, to dumb beasts even, has the whole world become kinder and more loving, because Jesus Christ lived and died and rose again.

More Honest. The Shopkeeper's Pennies.

The world has grown more honest since that first Easter Day. I write this looking the facts squarely in the face, remembering the bank defalcations and the robberies, the petty thieving and big malfeasance in office, of which the newspapers keep us so well informed.

Some people try to make us believe that dishonesty is universal, that every man has his price; but if it were so, no business could be done, no bank would dare to open its doors, the wheels of industry would all cease to move. Because honesty is practically universal and dishonesty the exception, and, comparatively speaking, the rare exception, men continue to buy and sell and live at peace with their neighbors.

On the busy Boston street on which I live in the winter, a newsdealer, having "other fish to fry" besides newspaper-selling, goes off on his other jobs for two hours every morning. He leaves his stock of papers and magazines to look after themselves; he opens wide the large window of his shop, and sets a little wooden box on the sill. His customers come to get their morning papers, throw into the box the two cents which the papers cost, and go off with their favorite journal. The customers might each take two papers instead of one. They might put into the box one cent instead of two, or they might put in nothing at all. Nobody would know the guilty one. They might loot the box or the whole little establishment, with small chance of discovery. As a matter of fact, none of these things happens, and when the newsdealer comes back he finds the right number of pennies in the box and the right number of papers in his piles, and all the rest of his goods intact. He has kept on doing business in this way for months and years, which he certainly could not do if most people or many people were dishonest.

I seldom see a policeman on our street, and at least one hundred, perhaps five hundred, people every morning in the shop-keeper's absence go by the piles of papers and the little wooden box half full of coppers, dimes, and nickels; but the dealer rarely loses one of them. Our street is not an exceptionally honest one. I often see the same sight at railway stations and other places—little piles of coin and large piles of papers, while people come and go, make their own change, leave their money, and carry away the news of the day. The sight is not an unusual one in many parts of America.

Opposite my newsdealers shop is a big public school attended by hundreds of children—eight, ten, and twelve years old, little Jews and Negroes and Italians and Slavs, and a few one-hundred-per-cent American youngsters. But the newsman suffers from no pecu-lations, though in attractive candy-stores near by the children could find a use for the pennies so temptingly left unguarded.

No, in spite of the pessimist, the Golden Rule has made its way into the hearts of the vast majority of men and women and children, and these pennies and these papers are safe because once there was the first Easter Day, and the One who then rose from the grave introduced a new system of ethics. Most men are learning, in some degree, at least to do as they would be done by.

Think of the incredible corruption of pre-Easter days, the extortions of the publicans, the profligacy of the rulers, the rascalities of those in high places and low, and we can realize in some measure what Easter has done not only for one newsdealer and his box of pennies, but for the whole civilized world which he represents.

More Peaceful.

Once more, the world is growing more peaceful because the Son of God once rose from the grave. I dare to say this while the earth is still palpitating with the echoes of the greatest war of all time, while the cripples of that war still lo about our streets and the hearts of millions of wives and mothers are still bleeding for the loss of their dear ones.

Yet, when was there ever such a longing for universal peace as now? When were such a multitude of good men in various ways planning to abolish war? When was war so execrated as now? When were the nations so deadly sick of war and all its horrid train of evils as now?

In the time of Christ war was considered the normal state of mankind. Might alone ruled. Rome had literally conquered the world. What effective voice was raised against it? Only one, and that a still small voice, which said, "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God."

For nineteen centuries that still small voice scarcely made itself heard, over the tumult and the shouting of the warriors. But it has never ceased to speak. It is beginning to be listened to. It is being heard in high places and low, in king's palaces, in halls of Congress, in labor assemblies, in all great church gatherings. It is the leading topic of the day. This very year of 1925 may see such advance as the ages have never seen before in response to the demands of the people of the whole world for peace and good will.

Mr. Pessimist, you and your tribe may go to the rear and hush your doleful wails. Jesus Christ was born in Bethlehem; Jesus Christ was crucified on Calvary; Jesus Christ rose from the new rock tomb. One more Easter Day is almost here.—Rev. Francis E. Clark, in Christian Endeavor World.

AGAIN THE "FIVE BARLEY LOAVES AND TWO SMALL FISHES."

By Charles V. Vickrey, General Secretary
Near East Relief.

I have seen the feeding of five thousand—in the land of the Book.

I saw also the feeding of eight thousand. Yes, I have seen the feeding of tens of thousands of little children in the land of our Savior's birth and in the land of Paul's missionary journeys.

The first five thousand that I saw were seated together in one assemblage, practically under the shadow of Mount Ararat, and they were "beginning again at Ararat" after devastating war, political revolution and social chaos had made havoc of the past.

Of the eight thousand whom I saw being fed, a thousand or more were in Jerusalem, some were in Nazareth, but the much larger number were on the hillsides of Syria, above and around ancient Sidon. They were not very far from the identical spot where Christ Jesus fed the five thousand men, besides women and children. The ones whom I saw were all children, without fathers, without mothers, and many without country.

Just as in the old days He said in substance to His disciples, "How many loaves have you?" and they replied, perhaps somewhat apologetically, "Five barley loaves and two small fishes," so in these later days He has said unto the children in America, "What hast thou in thy hand?" and the children replied, "Some nickels and dimes and a few pennies." He said, "Give them to me," and He transformed those nickels and dimes and pennies into bread and milk and other forms of food, and blessed the offerings of the children of America, and they were distributed in His name by the Near East Relief workers to thousands of little starving children.

No other religion and no pagan philosophy has ever yet put into the hearts of little children ten thousands miles away to sacrifice for and contribute to the feeding of other children whom they had never seen.

It is only the living Christ—living today in the hearts of millions of Christians—that can accomplish miracles like the feeding of these thousands, and there are millions of people living in the world today, and hundreds of thousands of children, looking forward with hope to the future because Christ lives.

We have the privilege of doing in Jerusalem, Nazareth and Syria some of the work which He would do if He today were walking in the flesh. The breakfast which His children in the Near East had this morning and the supper which they will have tonight came from Him through His children in America.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

The order cards sent to our pastors and Sunday school superintendents with the samples of the Children's Day Service call for "ONE CENT STAMP," but the new postal rates call for TWO CENT STAMP in all such post cards.

When the order cards were printed, the provisions of the new law were overlooked. Please put a TWO CENT STAMP on the card when mailing your order to me for the supplies, which will be sent free to our schools, and send it promptly.

This week we add three more charges to our lists, leaving fifteen not heard from to date. We have five charges paying over $100 on the G. C. B. We should have a score or more. We are glad for the additional names on this budget this week. The list has gone up from 29 to 46. That is a good jump and a great many of those who were on the budget sent in good substantial gifts on this budget.

Too, Littleton sent in a good amount to the A. C. B. while English Street stated that their $12 belonged on the A. C. B., adding one more name to that list. It is possible that a number have not had time to report on the Easter offering and that next week we will have a great many more names. Let us keep going and going a great deal more rapidly than we have. Yours in His service, A. G. Dixon.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Friday night, April 17, 1925, was spent in Concord. We went there to hold their second quarterly conference.

It has been a long time since I presided over a quarterly conference where the reports were all so complete and up to date as were all the reports in this conference. Every report from that of the superintendent of the Junior C. E. society, up to that of the pastor was written, and every department of the church showed progress.

Their church treasurer reported pastor's salary paid to date, and also the A. C. B. and the G. C. B. paid to date with 60c in the treasury. A fine record.

Important Announcement.

At the unanimous request of our Board of Young People's Work, and also of the trustees of the High Point College; and by the consent of the Concord church, Rev. Lawrence C. Little has been released from the pastorate of the Concord church and appointed field secretary of our young people's work.

In connection with his work among our young people, such as he did for one year among us, he is to canvass for students for the High Point College. He is seeking now to get a list of all Methodist Protestant young people who are graduating this spring from a high school. Pastors will please see that this list is sent at once to Dr. R. M. Andrews at the College, or to Brother Little in Concord, N. C. Also a list of any other prospective students for our college.

The Concord church regretted more than many of us will ever know to give up their pastor, and we sympathize with them in this. But most of our people will rejoice to know that we are to have the services of Brother Little in the field again.

District Conference at Friendship.

Dr. R. M. Andrews, Mrs. Dixon and I were with the people of the thirteenth district for their rally on Saturday and Sunday, April 18 and 19, and Rev. Lawrence Little and his wife were there for Sunday.

This rally was held at Friendship church on Stanly charge, and was well attended. It was a good meeting. The people attended well, and seemed interested in the discussions pertaining to Kingdom service.

We were glad to note the signs of progress around Friendship church. That church stands in the midst of one of our most prosperous country communities. They have beautified their church grounds, have the church and parsonage lighted with electricity, have put up a splendid bulletin board in front of the church, are painting their church this week, and in the near future they will be building Sunday school rooms. They and their pastor are happy in the work.

At Albemarle.

The district conference closed with the afternoon session. Brother Ridge prevailed on Dr. Andrews to stay and preach that night, and we went into Albemarle to preach to our people there, and to present the College endowment. One man pledged $100 toward it, and a committee was appointed to canvass the membership.

Our church in Albemarle has been assisted by our Board of Church Extension until this year. So all of us are interested in its progress. It seems to be moving along in pretty fair shape at this time. The Sunday school, we understand, is the largest in the history of the church. It has one class of young people which numbers 82. Brother Lawrence Little spoke to this class on Sunday morning, and he will tell you what they plan to do for the Young People's Summer Conference.

They have a good orchestra backed by a good choir, and they make good music. They gave us some splendid music at the district rally. Pastor Trollinger is planning to hold evangelistic meetings soon with Rev. T. E. Pierce to assist.

College Endowment.

Pastors and committees will please work this up as rapidly as possible that those of us who are giving nearly all our time to it may turn to other things. Our College cannot run without this endowment, and of course we are going to raise the endowment; but why not do it quickly so other things may not be neglected.

Children's Day.

Dr. F. C. Klein, Berwyn, Md., has recently mailed to each of our Sunday school superintendents a copy of a splendid program for Children's Day services. If for any reason you did not get yours, write Dr. Klein and he will gladly send you one. Children's Day should be held during May or June, and every Sunday school in the entire denomination should hold this service and take a special offering for foreign missions. I shall be delighted if every Sunday school in the North Carolina conference will hold this service. Order your supplies from Dr. Klein, and get your children to practicing soon, and have a good service.

Each church can easily raise 25 per cent of the General Conference budget at a Children's Day service if the proper effort is put forth. Be sure to hold the service and take the offering.

A Request.

I am asking that each charge please give their pastor a vacation from June 15 to June 26, and pay his way to the Summer Conference at the College and Children's Home. We want every pastor in the conference to be there for those ten days. Please see that they come.

Yours in the Master's service,

A. G. Dixon.

Union Grove Charge.—Our pastor, Brother Totten, has been very faithful, and preached for us every Sunday since he came on this work except during his Christmas vacation. We were much pleased to see the largest congregation at church last Sunday we have had this year; very glad indeed to have Mrs. J. A. Wooten and little daughter Esther back with us again; we missed them and were so anxious for them while they were absent on account of serious illness. Mr. Wooten nowers of the Herald.

lives in his new home, erected near the church. Our Sunday school is increasing in interest and attendance, and there are yet many more that we hope to see come in.

The Christian Endeavor society is still going on..

The Ladies' Aid society met at the parsonage last week and set up a nice bed. There will be another meeting of this society at the parsonage Saturday, May 9, at two P. M. All the ladies are requested to attend and offer their suggestions about the work needing to be done in the house, and on the grounds.

Miss Gertrude VanHoy united with our church fourth Sunday in March.

We are expecting Brother and Sister Dixon back with us at our annual meeting fourth Sunday in September, and trust the Lord will be with us in saving power and revive the interest for his cause in all of our hearts.

Our second quarterly conference has been held, and not being present, I am not able to say how we are getting along in finances, though I fear we are far behind our assessments. Best wishes to the editor and all readers. Reporter.

REV. GEORGE G. SHURTZ, B. D.,

Pastor of the First Methodist Protestant Church, Tiffin, Ohio.

Brother Shurtz will speak at the Young People's Summer Conference on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, June 23 and 24. It will be recalled that Brother Shurtz was at the Young People's Summer Conference at Weaverly in 1923 and exerted a most wonderful influence on the life of our young people.

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT.

Mrs. J. M. Stone, Editor.

Report of Education Committee, N. C. Branch, Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Societies.

The Education Committee has decided that it can do its most effective work with the young people by co-operating each year in furnishing a speaker at the annual Young People's Conference.

If it can be arranged this year, we will provide a speaker from our organization selected by the president of the Young People's Board.

We recommend that this committee keep in touch with Life Work Recruits both at High Point College and throughout the M. P. Church in North Carolina. Also that a report be given each year at Branch meeting from these recruits by the chairman of that committee.

We recommend that each auxiliary continue to give twelve per cent of its budget for the scholarship fund, and if possible raise this amount by personal contributions.

We recommend that we endeavor to make the monthly meetings more educational, by encouraging the use of the programs given in the Missionary Record. Because the committee understands that in some of our organizations the study part of the program has been subordinated to the collection of dues, we propose to do all possible to change the emphasis from finance to study. Should any organization fail to meet their particular need, or should any organization have difficulty in securing leaders for their study programs, the education committee through the district chairman will try to supply additional literature and speakers if necessary in order to create an intellectual interest in missions.

Mrs. R. M. Andrews,
Mrs. C. L. Whitaker,
Miss Julia Ross, Committee.

THIS IS NEXT.

Nature has awakened from her long winter's sleep, and bedecked plant, shrub and tree with bud, blossom and flower, and in-wrapped herself in verdant robes o'er hill and plane.

Easter, with the cheery note of birds from southern scenes, and the peals of bells and the glad song of assembled hosts in earthly temples united in praise over the triumphs of the glorified Christ, has passed into history.

And throughout the wide range of our denominational territory young and old have thought and desire turned once more to the gladsome day which recognizes the place and value of the childhood and youth of the entire church, and also the church's solemn obligation to instruct and train them for life and service dedicated to the upbuilding of the Kingdom of light and righteousness.

The Union Board of Foreign Administration, authorized by the General Conference, has anticipated the needs of our Sunday schools by preparing the means for discharging a distinct and important part of that obligation, i. e., the missionary education of the children and young people who are under the care of the church in its many Sunday schools.

This has been done by publishing its annual Children's Day Service which is considered to be among the very best of the many services issued, whether considered from musical standards, literary worth, printer's art, etc.

Only words of praise have reached us for the beauty of the original front cover design which portrays representatives of the three countries, in which our church is carrying on its foreign missionary operations, drawing near to the Christ, and for the clearness of the pictures which depict workers, buildings, etc., and we are satisfied that the music selections will be found not only pleasing and attractive but adaptable in the range of young voices, and the program is so varied as to meet the requirements of every school, and leaves room, of course, for the introduction of any special features desired by any of the schools.

The pageant, written expressly for this year's service, can be used as a part of the regular program, or can be used separately on some other occasion as may be desired.

One essential object of the Children's Day service is to enlist the enthusiasm and efforts of all connected with all our Sunday schools, and all the ladies of all the auxiliaries of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and all members of every local church in duly celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the introduction of the Children's Day Service into our Sunday schools.

It was Rev. F. T. Tagg who instituted the first service in 1885, and it has been supplied regularly through the years to our Sunday schools, and has greatly increased the interest and co-operation of our people in the conduct of the foreign work, and been the agency through which a large part of the Board's income has been derived.

It is most fitting, therefore, that we should honor his memory, and we can do that by providing to maintain and develop the work in which he was so deeply interested, and which he did so much to promote.

Every Sunday school can help greatly by giving in the Children's Day offering 25 per cent of the local church's budget, and for this we plead.

Fred C. Klein.

THE TOBACCO GHOST IN UTAH.

By Will H. Brown.

When a sheriff was elected in Utah who announced that he would enforce the anti-tobacco law of that state—which prohibited smoking in public places—tobacco users made loud protest. With many of them it seems that law to them is like law to the boozers—not to be enforced if it hits you. At any rate, after a lot of loud talk, following several arrests of more or less prominent citizens of Salt Lake City, the law was amended. With this action the tobacco organs claimed a great victory, but when one takes a good look at the law as amended, he wonders what they are crowing about. Here is what we actually find:

Prohibition of sale of cigarettes except in cities of the first class and upon the payment of a license costing $10. Prohibition of cigarette advertising of any kind, within the borders of the state. Prohibition of tobacco advertising of any kind on bill-boards.

Inasmuch as the protest was so loud over the enforcement of the part of the law prohibiting smoking in public places, one is puzzled over the pretended jubilation of the tobacco people, in view of the fact that now it is illegal to smoke in any kind of an enclosed place, except in compartments especially set aside for smoking, and labeled as such. This means one can not smoke in hotels, restaurants, cafes, cafeterias, theaters, passenger elevators, street cars, interurban and passenger railway coaches, waiting rooms, motor and other public conveyances, or in state, county or public buildings, except where the owner or proprietor of any public eating place may designate the same as a public smoking room by a conspicuous sign at or near the entrance. The tobacco man who can rejoice in such a law needs no further recommendation as an optimist.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

This article will convey the information to all parties concerned, that the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Protestant Church will hold its annual meeting in the Victory Memorial Church, Indianapolis, Ind., on Wednesday, May 13, 1923, at nine o'clock A. M. "Applications for assistance shall be presented to the Board at the Annual Meeting. Emergency appropriations shall only be made upon the recommendation of the Executive Committee, and with the unanimous consent of the Board." See Discipline, page 93, paragraph 10.

A number of churches desiring help in former years have neglected the matter of presenting applications at the proper times, and it has been difficult to secure satisfactory information to the members of the board between the meetings. We hope that this year there will be no deferred applications, and that everything will be in hand previous to May 1. If your church had any expectation of presenting an application to the Board of Home Missions at the Annual Meeting, please place it in the hands of the secretary if possible previous to May 1, and in any case previous to the Annual Meeting. The report and recommendations will be prepared of course previous to the meeting the board, and if the applications were not in hand no recommendations could be made.

What will be developed at the Annual Meeting? No man knows. The recommendations so far as they have been received are being considered upon the presumption that the churches will approach the goal set for Easter by the Board of Home Missions. When we have our reports from the treasurer of the General Conference, and know what sums have been contributed by the churches for the support of our work during the closing year, and what surplus remains as cash in bank from the operations of the closing year, we will make our final recommendations to the board, supported by the facts in every case so the action of the board may be intelligent.

The needs of the field are great. We have never approached our duty as a denomination in reference to our home mission work. Our needs are not less than $300,000 per year. Our appropriation, as fixed by the General Conference, is $115,000 per year. Our appropriation as fixed by the churches including budget credit, Million Dollar Fund, Inter-church Fund, and special campaign for the year ending April 30, 1924, was $40,131.79. Of this amount $38,852.84 was entitled to budget credit, and is the sum which should be used in an estimate of the percentage received othe General Conference apportionment. What all the church set as our apportionment for the year closing April 30, 1925? You have the answer. If your Easter offering is promptly reported, and designated as an Easter offering for the Board of Home Missions, and if your budget apportionment is paid in full to date, we shall have the full apportionment. At every church that holds its Easter offering until too late to reach Treasurer Staley before April 30, or fails to designate the Easter offering as such, and every church that is in arrears in its monthly payments on the General Conference budget, will deduct the amount of its total arrearage from the home missionary appropriation for the closing year. Every such church must accept the responsibility for any delay on the part of this board in beginning important new work, or developing work already under way.

We shall discuss this subject further next week.

Charles H. Beek.

I HATE TO DO IT.

But there doesn't seem any other way out of it; so here goes. Yep, it's another drive, campaign, movement—call the thing any name you want to. You know what Shakespeare says about roses. But let's start it, and then stop it by getting through with it. That's the best way of taking castor oil that I know of.

By this time I suppose you have looked to the fellow who's writing this foolishness. And I suppose you have said to your several selves, "Just as I expected; it's that fellow Bates again. Wonder what he wants now?" Maybe he's a flying machine for the president! And maybe it ain't. It ain't!

Get out your smelling salts, and I'll tell you what I want. I want $500. Yep; just that much. Not a cent more. If the amount you've only comes to $499.99, I'll try to make up the balance. But somehow or other I must get that five hundred.

Did I hear you say, "What do you want $500 for?" Well, I'm not going to pay off the mortgage on the old home place with it. There ain't no sech place. And, you will agree, I'm not asking for enough to buy the president a flying machine.

Now if you'll be still a minute and listen I'll tell you what I want of it. I want it so I can ease my conscience! It's been hurting me bad for the last nine months. You see, I haven't done what I said I'd do. You know that your conscience does for you when you get in that fix. It just rises up in the middle of the night, meets you in the middle of the road, and gives you such a stare that you feel like hiding. And I don't want to hide. I want to go up to the old thing and say, "Here you, get out of my way; you can't scare me worth a cent. What hast thou to do with me?"

But I can't do that unless you help me. Listen! I opened my mouth at the last General Conference, and put my foot in it. I'll let you find the reference of the "it." Aw, now, be serious! Well, here we are, my face is as long as your arm.

As I was saying, at the last General Conference I opened my mouth and told Dr. Dixon to pledge $500 for the North Carolina Conference on the new college church at the Nagoya College, I opened my mouth and told him if he'd pledge that much, I'd raise it among the folks. He took me at my word when I opened my mouth, and Dr. Klein put it—the $500 pledge, not my mouth—down.

Then, when I went around the circle and got back to the Old North State again, I found so much to do; and so many other matters pressing in the Herald, that I kept putting off getting that $500—and I haven't got it yet. But my conscience is giving me fits. I must have this money. And my conscience hurts worse because I know it's all my fault that I haven't had the money months ago. All I had to do was to ask for it. You have never refused anything I have asked you to do. I knew you wouldn't refuse this request. But I just put off, I procrastinated, I delayed, I neglected, I—I—Yes'm, I did.

$500 within the next two month! To help provide the College Church at Nagoya, Japan. To help Brother Auman do his work among the young men of the Sunrise Kingdom. $500 to redeem the honor of the conference. All right, postman, bring in that sack. You needn't make an extra trip. I'll go up to the post office, and get the rest of the letters. Thank you. And say, friend, if you didn't get your letter in that delivery, it may not be too late yet. Send your check to

SOLID SENSE FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA'S PREMIER.

He thinks Straight and Speaks Clearly.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

The people of the Pacific coast—both Americans and Canadians—are face to face with the critical Asiatic problem. Shall Orientals be allowed to come in? or shall the bars of exclusion be kept up?

California has sometimes yielded to panic and taken foolish action—comparable only to the unreasonable action of the United States Senate in passing, over President Coolidge's veto, the Japanese exclusion bill in its grossly irritating form.

British Columbia is said to have about 90 per cent of all the Asiatics in Canada. Instead of being unduly excited over the situation, however, John Oliver, the able prime minister of that province, carries an unusually level head. In a recent interview he has given expression to a number of facts, sentiments and principles that are well worthy of thoughtful consideration by those who dwell on either the north or the south side of the Canadian boundary line. All races and nationalities and colors are exceedingly human, hence, when a well read man of discerning mind talks of race relations something interesting and informing is likely to be heard.

Asiatics and Whites Compared.

"As regards this Asiatic matter," Mr. Oliver said, "I do not favor letting down the bars. In that direction I see no tolerable solution of the problem. It is repugnant to me to think of certain phases of the competition introduced by immigrants from Japan, China and India. I do not like to contemplate, for example, the unmarried Asiatic in competition with the married white man striving to bring up a family decently in this country.

"But the white man, in my view, should give some thought—anxious thought—to his position. He should ask himself if he is not degenerating, not losing the grit, the frugality, the passion for work, the mental, moral and physical qualities that are necessary not only to build a civilization but to keep it after it is built. There is nothing a white man cannot do as well or better than an Asiatic. All he requires for success in any rivalry is a full and determined use of his natural powers. I am not for letting down the bars, but I will tell our people that, in my opinion, they are in far greater danger from self-indulgence and deliberate avoidance of hard work than from any kind of foreign invasion."

What Job?

This prime minister was born in England, at twelve years of age he worked in the mines, came to British Columbia 48 years ago and engaged in farming until he went into politics. He is, therefore, quite well qualified to speak of jobs—to the enlightenment of Americans as well as Canadians. He says:

"Our people—the people of this generation—are appallingly extravagant, and at the same time very particular as to what they will and will not do. We had great unemployment here not long ago. We had this unemployment when numerous lines of endeavor, many tasks, were calling for workers. I have two boys on a farm. They could not get help, though the streets of our cities were crowded with idle men. Farm work was too hard, far beneath the dignity of these men. In my office one day I received a delegation of the unemployed, and a woman member snarled at me: 'You are the man who wanted my husband to dig ditches.' 'Well, madam,' I said, 'I dug ditches, and I should dig them again if necessary. I dug ditches and my wife is not begging for bread as you are.'

"It is the attitude of mind seen in this woman's remark to which I object, and in which I see peril to the future of the white man. He should profit by the Oriental's example of steadiness at his job. He should grasp the fact that Orientals are valued by employers not only because they eschew overniceness as to what job they will do but because they are less prone to desert their work lightly and to go upon strikes from which they can reap nothing but disaster."

Living Standards Too High?

Mr. Oliver hews to the line just here. He attained his present position because of industry and native ability—yes; but frugality, also, played an important part. So he is qualified to speak. Hear what he says:

"It is true the Asiatics we get live in overcrowded shacks and are satisfied with the bare necessities of existence. It is true such a way of living, united with the ability and disposition to work, means formidable competition in the sphere of productive enterprise. If Orientals are satisfied with too little, it is not less sure, to my mind, that our white folk demand too much. Today in British Columbia, in Canada, and I dare say, in the United States and throughout the white world, standards of living are too high. We here, but for our superabundant natural resources, could not carry on at our present rate.

"These natural resources are not inexhaustible. I mean they are not going to last and support us in our extravagance forever. One knows it is the law of the pendulum of life to swing to and fro. It has swung too far to the side of thoughtlessness and improvidence among white men. It may swing back, but I see no promise of such a movement in our time or our children's time. It were well if the leaders and teachers of the white world would try to make it sensible to its follies. If the Oriental can bring us back to a hearty esteem of the virtues of constancy, self-denial and hard work he will do us good out of all proportion to anything he can do us in the way of harm."

Read and Think.

This practical prime minister inveighs against other things besides the wastefulness of his people and their disinclination to certain sorts of necessary work which, they may think, do not comport with their dignity. He has something to say of their intellectual activities—or lack of activity. His thoughts are as good for Americans as for Canadians. He says:

"Our people do not read and think enough. Their mental habits are frivolous. Too many love the flimsy and the sensational. Great thoughts and serious study, constructive intellectual pursuits, do not interest them. Not a few, claiming to be democrats, do not understand democracy.

"Let me illustrate. Speaking to some of my constituents I must give time and energy to defining the line of demarcation between the legislative and administrative domains of government. Premiers find themselves urged and even bullied to do things lying wholly outside their official competence. There are people who look upon me as an autocrat. They do not realize that when I take my place in the legislative chamber I am but one representative among forty-eight, and bound by all the restraints of our parliamentary practice. Altogether too much, anyway, are the people of the modern world inclined to ask government to do for them what can be done only by themselves. In no country can government be the conscience of the citizens, or preserve their morality, or endow them with virtue and strength, or take from their backs the burdens destiny ordained them to carry."

Only Fittest Peoples Will Survive.

Much unwisdom has been uttered concerning the superior qualities of this or that race of people. The most harmful heresy of all is the belief that somehow, perhaps by Divine interposition, a self-acclaimed superior race will be relieved of the necessity of meeting the competition of the so-called inferior races with the character and service which alone can make good their claims of superiority. The closing words of Mr. Oliver's interview are well worth pondering.

"In this great and many-sided problem of the races, whether in the Pacific or elsewhere, let the white man take to heart the fact that he cannot permanently hold what he is not worthy to hold. He has a great patrimony and a great trust. No man believes in him more than I; no man is more devoted than I to conserving his power and his inheritance. If I point out what seem to be his shortcomings it is only because I should like to see those defects corrected; and I have no manner of doubt that, in the long run, with the inevitability of the moral law, the relatively unfit, white or colored, will perish and the fittest will survive."

West End, Greensboro.—The Easter services were unusually interesting and well attended at West End this year. At the 11 o'clock hour the children of the Sunday school, under the direction of Mrs. J. R. Holden, entertained the congregation with the rendition of the Easter program issued by the Board of Home Missions. The offering was generous, amounting to $58.43. In the evening the choir had charge, giving the cantata, "In Joseph's Garden." The musical selections were interspersed with readings and tableaux very effectively given.

Mrs. W. H. Bonkemeyer was hostess to the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society this month, and Mrs. C. W. Huffines entertained the Woman's Home Missionary Society. Both of these societies have done splendid work this year, paying their assessments in full, and submitting a good report to the branch meeting. At the First Reformed Church during the past week members of the two societies repeated the play, "Aunt Peggy's Surprise," which has been so successfully given a number of times.

The social committee of the Junior Christian Endeavor society entertained the members of the society and a number of invited guests at a party in the basement of church Saturday afternoon. More than thirty were present and they had a delightfully busy time together.

We have been very much pleased the last two Sundays with a weekly bulletin Mr. J. J. Lard is publishing entitled, "The West 1 Messenger." A kind friend, whose name is not disclosed, in response to an audible from the pastor that $10 might be raised to continue this publication, very generously donated the entire amount. This will cover the expenses of publishing for some time to come, and we feel greatly indebted to our good friend.

A number of our members have been absent the past few weeks on account of illness. We miss them very much. Among this number is Miss Violet Routh, who so faithfully and efficiently serves in the Sunday school Christian Endeavor work. We trust that her illness may not be of long duration, and that she may soon take her usual place in church. Reporter

Harmony Grove, West Forsyth.—Our first attracted meeting commenced on Easter Sunday at 11 o'clock and lasted through the week, closing Sunday night, the 19th. Mr. Riddle of Draper assisted our pastor, Rev. D. A. Morgan, in the meeting. Mr. Riddle preached some forceful sermons, and we hope that much good has been accomplished.

Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Fishel are the proud possessors of a fine baby girl, Helen Virginia. Helen can boast of having more grandmothers living than most babies. She has four grandmothers, four great-grandmothers, one great-great-grandmother, the great-great-grandmother being Mrs. Louvitha Hunter of Old Town. She is now nearing her 87th birthday. The only grandfather is a great-grandfather, Mr. E. M. Fishel, a well known singing teacher and preacher. Reporter

Midway, Haw River Circuit.—We had a very Easter program Easter Sunday at three P. M. The house was filled with people, some being visitors from a distance, some being our boys and girls who have been away in school teaching; in fact, it seemed a little like home coming day. We were so glad to have Brother E. G. Lowdermilk and some of the girls from the Children's Home with us. Brother Lowdermilk was our pastor before Brother R. came and he is much loved by our people. We were sorry Mrs. Lowdermilk could not come with him.

The Easter service was well rendered. The children did their part well, the singing was good and the offering for home missions was $35.53. The children were trained by Mr. John Bartee, Mrs. Clarence Butler and writer. Mrs. G. W. Apple, Reporter

(Consecration Meeting.)

Some Bible Hints.

The habit of making caustic remarks destroys home happiness. Let us master kindly words (v. 29).

The world's greatest lack is that of kindness, and this can be developed if we are in earnest (v. 32).

Imitate God in His love and patience and home will be happy. Unhappiness is largely caused by selfishness and impatience (v. 1).

It is as possible to make home happy as it is to keep the house clean. We must make it our job, and give ourselves up to it at all costs (v. 2).

One should strive to be just as tactful in dealing with those in his own home as he is with other people. Tact is based on kindness. Tactlessness is thoughtlessness or ruthlessness, which pay no heed to the feelings of others. There can be no home joy if we nag or blame or wound feelings.

Bring other young people into your home, and in trying to give them a good time you will find happiness. We can plan for joy, or we can give way to little disturbances and be miserable.

One Indian tribe has an official called "the Joy-Maker." He greets the sunrise with a song. It is his duty to make the people happy. It would be great if every Christian would strive to be a joy-maker. There is no excuse for an unhappy Christian home.

The Leader's Part.

This meeting should be filled with good cheer. A happy atmosphere in our Christian Endeavor meetings will help us all to be happier when we go home. A study of this topic will affect every one of us, now and forever, and we need to think seriously and happily over it.

Home should be the happiest place on earth. Here the little intimacies of life are permitted. Here the future of the children is planned. Here the things are done which make or mar the children's future. The family is the basis of our entire life, and if the home life is what it should be the rest will largely take care of itself.

Happiness in the home depends upon the attitude of the inmates of the home toward each other. In our consideration of this topic we should stress the word help. Helpfulness is what makes a happy home possible. This sort of an attitude on the part of every member of the home circle will do away with everything which hinders the development of true happiness. Helpfulness does away with selfishness, with meanness and with everything which hinders the construction of all that is highest and best in the home.

Taught in Our Scripture Text.

Our Scripture lesson opens the window of truth and allows us to see the various things which Christians in the home should practice in order to help the home to be more happy.

Our conversation in the home, while more intimate and free than is possible outside, should be high and of such a character as to edify and build up the minds and hearts of the members of the home. Grace comes, many times, through clean, Christian conversation.

The Holy Spirit is often grieved by the attitude of various members of many homes toward each other. Paul tells us here that a number of things must be put away if we would be true Christians. And this truth must be emphasized in our home life. Bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, railings, and the basis for all these things, malice, must have no place in our home life. We ought to have at least as much consideration for those in the home as we have for others outside, but that is often not the case.

"Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving each other," is splendid advice to Christians.

Homes are made unhappy, and oftentimes broken up completely, because these graces of kindness and forgiveness are not believed and practiced to a greater extent.

The Lesson in Our Daily Living.

Christ must be the head of the home if it is to be a happy, Christian home. A home can not be truly happy where our Master is not honored and loved. All difficulties and differences must be submerged in obedience to His commands; and they will be if He is the Head of the home.

A home cannot be truly happy unless every member of the family, who is old enough, is a Christian. The influence of both parents should be that of Christians, and as each child becomes old enough he should become a Christian and join the church on his own responsibility. And this will come about, easily and naturally, in a truly happy Christian home.

There is an indescribable something about a happy Christian home which makes us marvel. We have all been in homes where everything went smoothly, where there seemed to be no friction whatsoever. We have passed from such homes into others where all was chaos and confusion. And we have wondered what made the difference. In nearly every case lack of true Christianity is the reason.

Points of Prayer.

1. Thank God for godly parents the world over.
2. For those parents who have spared no good advice to their children.
3. For the teachings of God's word concerning happiness.
4. Ask God for courage to be as good Christians at home as we are in other people's homes.
5. To bless your home and your parents.
6. To help the church and the Christian Endeavor societies to influence their members towards Christian happiness in their homes.

—From the C. E. Quarterly.

—Brother J. Norman Kirkman and his brothers of Guilford County and Burlington are in Atlanta, Ga., this week to attend the funeral of their brother Everett who died of heart disease.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING FOR THE MASTER.

So many people seem to think that when they have their names placed on the church book, that their whole duty is done. They lose sight of the fact that the whole unsaved world is watching them. A man said to me some weeks ago, "I cannot afford to take the burden of Christianity on me unless I could see some member of the church that is better than I am." Now, friends, if you think Christianity is a burden you don't know anything about it. Our blessed Savior has never denied His followers one single pleasure that did not bring sorrow and pain in the end. He has never required us to do anything except the things that bring joy and happiness later.

We so often hear that we must pray for the revival service that we expect to have later in the year. Wouldn't it be better to live for it? The world is watching the church members every day and if they see that you have something valuable they will want that thing. Again, we are taught that if any one fails to accept Christ at the revival service in the summer, one cannot be saved till next summer. That is Satan's favorite suggestion. We don't need any one to help us take Christ into our hearts. One old brother said, "One of the best places to commune with Christ is between the plowhandles—up and down the corn rows." An old lady said, "Yes, and over the cooking stove and the dishwashing." When we acquaint ourselves with Him in this way we will understand "what a friend we have in Jesus, all our sins and griefs to bear." A minister said to me recently, "The churches are filled with people who know nothing of the new birth, and the whole world is drifting to destruction." Now, friends, it is time for us to be up and doing. Every day of our lives we are impressing our associates with our personality. Are we making a good impression or a bad one? Are we making people think more of Christianity or less? Are we loving our fellow men, or are we hating them? Are we striving every day to lift people's burdens, or are we piling more burdens on them? Do you ever think of the difference between heaven and the abode of the lost? None in the millenium one is love and the other is hate.

Let us try to be kind and gentle, and unselfish and get our happiness in making others happy. I heard a man say once that Christ was selfish. When some one asked him where he got the idea from, he said, "From His childhood to the cross His greatest and only pleasure was in befriending and blessing every human being with whom He came in contact." If we can call that "selfishness let us try to follow Him more closely. We can do so many little things that cost only a small effort but mean so much to people who think no one cares for them. Do not let our fellowmen believe that we have "an axe to grind" every time we speak to them.

We are passing through the hardest time that the present generation has ever known morally and financially, and we need to be watching every moment to see what we can do to lighten the burdens of our fellowmen. Do not think you are not important enough to help in this war against evil. The poorest man on earth is equal to a millionaire if he by divine aid is overcoming sin.

Ruth Fletcher.

THE AWAKENING OF DORIS MEREDITH.

Stillness, befitting the sleeping-place of the dead, brooded over the expanse of shining gravestones. It was afternoon of Easter Sunday. The chill of winter was still in the air. Here and there, through bending trees, were hints of color—bright promises of life to come.

A light footfall broke the quiet. A young woman veiled in black made her way in and out among the lots. With head bent low she saw not the heralds of coming summertime. There were no visitants in shining garments to stand beside her, as in the long ago they stood by the women sorrowing at an empty tomb. "Why seek ye the living among the dead" were words she had forgotten.

The sudden bursting forth of a bird note from a tree just above her head delayed her step. She looked up, a moment's eager expectancy shining in her eyes—but only for a moment. A deeper sadness overspread the girlish face, and involuntarily she whispered,

"How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I see weary, fu' o' care?"

With dragging step she passed on, halting at length beside a lonely marble shaft. Gazing down upon the narrow bed, the sweet face twitched in an agony of pain. Then, encircling the cold marble with her arms, she pressed her face against it and gave herself up to a passion of weeping. Time passed unnoticed. What mattered it? There was no one to know or care. The husband lying silent at her feet, untouched by her misery, had been all her world. Back in the years of childhood, father and mother had been put to rest in another quiet graveyard far away. After that, there had been none of her own blood to cherish her.

Then had come, in the freshness of her young womanhood, a love that brought compensations for what she had missed. A brief year of wedded happiness—then the awful accident, which had left her body unscarred but had stabbed her soul with a mortal wound. Since that day in the month of roses, when, as if from a great distance, she had heard them say the burial service, and somehow knew that hands she was too numb to feel were tearing her away from all she cared about—since that awful hour, life had been only a wretched existence. Friends had called and tried to open the door for her to new interests. Others from the church had come with words of comfort. She had smiled with brave lips until they had gone, then had turned again to the sad solace of dear memories.

The afternoon was nearly spent and still she stood, clasping the grim gravestone. A sudden sound burst upon the stillness. She raised her head, startled. A child's voice in an abandon of grief—loud, heart-breaking sobs. She hastened in the direction whence they came. Near by were the public lots where lay in unmarked graves the city's poor. Prone upon the chill earth lay a girl of perhaps twelve years. Her bitter weeping was hushed as the woman bent over her and placed a gentle hand upon her head.

"My dear child, you must not lie on the damp ground and you should not weep like this. Tell me why you do it."

Reassured by the sweetness of the voice and face, the child stood up and grasping the woman's arm in a sudden yearning, breathed, "My precious mother!"

"Tell me all about it," the kind voice encouraged.

"She died just the night before Christmas and left me all alone."

"Have you no father or brothers and sisters?"

"No, ma'am. We lived all by ourselves. I was a baby when papa died."

"What made your mamma sick, child?"

"Oh, she hurried to get a lot of dresses done for Christmas. The rich folks always wanted so many things to wear, and they must have them right away. Then mamma got cold. Oh, she was awful sick before I went for the doctor. She didn't want me to get him because she thought we couldn't afford it."

"Who is taking care of you now, dear?"

"There's nobody my own now. I live with Miss Harris on Stony Court. Mamma was good to her once and she keeps me. But she's poor and she's got rheumatism and we don't have nice things to eat like mamma used to make and she can't sew for me. Oh, I miss my mother so!"

The child turned again to the silent grave. A friendly arm was slipped quietly about her and the kind voice said, "Come, let us walk home together." With a despairing look at the spot where her mother rested, the child allowed herself to be led away. The woman made no turn of the head toward the scene of her own recent tears. But one thought filled her mind. What could she say to this little one in her sore need? In vain she searched through her own experience of the past months to find the right word. All at once, she seemed to see these months of gloom and darkness as they must appear in the light of that other world. The truth of words oft read in happier days, came to her now:

"Life is too short for logic; what I do
For God alone shall guide."

I must do simply; God alone must judge—

The child must have the right message. "Lord, give it me," she breathed, and turning to the little silent girl—"What shall I call you, dear?"

"My name is Marjorie—Marjorie Hunt," answered the child.

"And mine is Doris Meredith. Now, dear, I'm sure your mamma doesn't like to have you come here and grieve so."

"Why, do you think she knows?" Big blue eyes opened wide.

"We can't be sure, Marjorie, but if she could speak to you, she would tell you not to do it, wouldn't she?"

"Why—yes, I never thought of that," said the child slowly.

"She is just as near you at home as she is here. You mustn't think of her as here at all, you know. It may be she is close beside you all the time, just hidden by a little veil that your eyes can't quite see through. I'm sure she wants you to be a brave little woman, doing the best you can with each today and trusting the dear God to plan splendid things for you as you grow older."

"Mamma was planning to keep me in school so I could learn to be a teacher, Oh!

I'd love to be one—but now I never can," and again came the choking sobs.

"Marjorie, I want you promise me something before we say good-night. Will you try to do everything just as if you knew mother was watching you? Somewhere she is happy and smiling. Smile back at her, will you, and"—Mrs. Meredith caught her breath—"don't come here any more. Mother isn't here."

For a moment there was no answer. The girl raised questioning eyes to her friend's face. Then hesitatingly, as if half afraid to speak: "But, Mrs. Meredith, you come here. I saw you crying when I came, and you have black clothes on. Did your mother die?"

"My husband, dear, was killed in an awful accident last June and my mother died when I was younger than you."

"Oh, then you know all about it," and impulsively the child kissed the hand that held hers so lovingly.

"Yes, I know all about it, Marjorie. Shall we promise each other not to come here again for a long time? Now run home. I will see you some day soon, dear. It is almost dark and you are shivering. Good-night."

With a new look upon her face, Doris Meredith hastened home. This was the hour of the day when she was wont to sit alone, with no light save from a fire in the grate, and think upon the anguish of her life. It should be different today. Entering the house, she passed quickly from room to room and raised the drawn shades. "Tomorrow's sunshine shall come in," she whispered.

In the dining-room, she took from off the table, near her solitary place, a photograph of her husband. A moment she gazed at it earnestly. "If sadness can enter the place where you are living, dear," she murmured, "I must have made you sad all these weary months. But I know the way now. I'll give you smile for smile the while we wait," and the picture was returned to its old place in the library.

At the kitchen door she paused. "Jane, you may serve supper a little early tonight, and eat with me, please. It will be more cheerful for both of us." She did not wait to see the glad look that brightened the faithful old servant's eyes.

Before her bedroom closet, she stood irresolute. Some things were hard to do. There hung her husband's clothes, all undisturbed as he had left them. Could she bear to see the empty hooks? Yes, her resolution, taken as another's need made claim upon her, should be carried through. Tomorrow those garments would be given to the poor. Then her eyes rested upon her own black robes. She must go all the way, she thought. Black was not the right symbol of a Christian's grief. She would wear it no more.

Her thoughts turned to the sad child whose helpless grief had brought her own awakening. She switched on a light and sat down to think it out. Something she must do for her. Slowly, the thing shaped itself in her mind. A smile of childlike eagerness came to her face, as she sat tense with tightly clasped fingers. Why Not? Here was here beautiful home. She had money and leisure. There might have been a daughter of her own flesh, but Heaven had had other plans. Yes, Marjorie should come and be her child. Together they would fashion a new life pleasing, per chance to the dear ones waiting beyond the border line—and pleasing to Him who died and rose again that the sting of death might be forever gone.

Finally she remembered her Sunday school class of young girls—forgotten during all her time of selfish grieving. Tomorrow she would find them. There was so much to do tomorrow!

"A sacred burden is this life ye learn." Old familiar words came to her.

"Look on it, lift it, bear it solemnly,
Stand up and walk beneath it steadily.
Fail not for sorrow, falter not for sin,
But onward, upward, till the goal ye win."

All at once the church bell rang forth a joyous note and with the sound came suddenly the recollection that this was Easter Sunday. Not once had she remembered it. All the day she had spent in the tomb's darkness, but now at eventide, the risen Lord had appeared unto her. Hastily she rose. Yes, she would go to the church. Supper could wait. She would get Marjorie and together they would listen to the Easter message. Henceforth for them the graves should be empty. Some day, questions that had filled their aching hearts would all be answered. Then they would know even as also they were known. But as the Lord had need of them to serve with Him awhile.

Soon they sat together in the lily-scented church, listening to the message of life triumphant over death; of peace triumphant over pain—understanding at last that our light affliction which is but for a moment worketh in us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.—Susie Potter Hesse, in Zion's Herald.

A WILD PET.

Probably the only wolf in captivity that is allowed all the privileges of a pet dog is the one owned by Mr. and Mrs. T. W. Bewick of Wisconsin. The wolf, "Laddie," is now three years old, and having been brought up from its earliest days with the bulldog belonging to Bewicks, it displays more dog characteristics than those of a wolf.

Three years ago a marsh was being burned out near the town in which Mr. and Mrs. Bewick live. The fire ranted out a nest of wolves, and the mother escaped without saving her little ones. All excepting the one saved by Mr. Bewick perished in the flames, but he took the one which he rescued home with him that night, and decided to keep him as a pet. The little wolf was so young that his eyes were not yet open, and Mr. Bewick thought that his bulldog would mother the little thing, but instinct warned the dog, and if the Bewicks had not constantly been on guard the dog would have killed the baby. Eventually, however, the stranger made a welcome for himself, and the dog took the best of care of him. If the dog is away for any length of time Laddie becomes restless and unhappy and whines pitifully until his foster mother returns. As for other dogs, Laddie has no use for them. As soon as their unsuspicious backs are turned, he attacks them ruthlessly. Strange to say, however, dogs seem to have no fear of Laddie, so like a dog has he become. They approach him as one of their own kind.

When the time came for the burning of the marsh, the mother wolf was killed, and the little ones were saved. One of them was taken home by Mr. Bewick, and the rest were sold to a hunter.

4. "The blood of the martyr's is the seed of the church." The death of Stephen served to scatter the firebrands of the gospel throughout Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. A foreign missionary movement was then started that has spread over the entire earth.

5. Stephen yielded his last breath on earth in earnest supplication for his murderers. And who knows but that his mantle later fell upon Saul of Tarsus in answer to prayer?

"Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,

The Christian's native air,

His watchword at the gates of death;

He enters heaven with prayer."

Evangelism.

Soon our revival meetings will begin in full force. In July and August many of them are held.

Has it ever occurred to you that a revival has a financial basis? Remember the 10th chapter of Acts is our text. In the second verse we read of Cornelius that "he feared God with all his house" and "gave much alms," and in the 31st verse, "and thine alms are had in remembrance in the sight of God." Thus it would seem in this Cornelius meeting alms-giving is credited with a part of the preparation for this great revival. You might test this in preparing for our revivals this summer. Get the finances well on and out of the way, both the budgets and pastor's salary, and see if God will not pour us out a great blessing.

Prayer.

All, we think, recognize prayer as one of the essentials of a revival. In getting ready for this meeting there was prayer at both ends of the line. Cornelius not only gave much alms but he "prayed to God alway" (see second verse), and Peter, the preacher chosen of God for this revival, "went up upon the house top to pray about the sixth hour." Are you to assist in a meeting? Don't forget to pray much for that meeting.

Work.

After Cornelius had sent for Peter—the God-chosen preacher—he got busy. In the 24th verse we read, "And Cornelius waited for them, and had called together his kinsmen and near friends, and when the preacher came he could say, 'Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all the things that are commanded thee of God.'" And then, 34th to 43rd verses, we have Peter's sermon and in the sermon Jesus is the central figure. Someone has said that the reason so nearly all who are saved are led to Christ during our special meetings is because through the year the preacher "preaches about Christ," but during the revival the preacher "preaches Christ." And Jesus said, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

These three, alms-giving, prayer, and work, will usually bring about a revival—a Holy Ghost revival. Let us try it this year. God will not disappoint us.

Granville Circuit Meetings.

Our special meetings are to be held as follows, with the help as indicated:

Rehoboth, first Sunday in July, Rev. R. A. Hunter to assist. Mt. Carmel, second Sunday in July, Rev. R. A. Hunter to assist. Union Chapel, fourth Sunday in July, Rev. R. C. Stubbins to assist. We earnestly crave the prayers of God's children for gracious revivals in our churches.

Henderson, April 20.

Henderson.—We repeated our Easter pageant on Tuesday evening of last week to another full house. A splendid impression was made with the pageant and $50 is the amount of the offering for home missions.

We gave over practically the entire hour last evening for music and a fine program was rendered to a packed house, it being with difficulty that we seated all the people. Miss Cheatham, our organist and choir director, was presented with a ten-dollar gold piece as an expression of the church's appreciation of her work.

Orange Chapel, Saxapahaw Circuit, Mission Circle.

The Myra Crawford Mission Circle met with their superintendent, Mrs. J. I. Lewis, April 10, for their first meeting of this year's work. The meeting was called to order by the superintendent and roll was called by secretary, nine active and two honorary members being present.

The following program was then carried out: Song, "Happy Workers." Scripture lesson by Ruth Crawford and Allene Thompson. Prayer by Mrs. Foust Thompson. Easter Bible story by Bettie Pickard. Recitations—"He Arose Today," Ruth Crawford; "He Loved Me Best," Lucile Edwards, Paulette and Margaret Edwards. Song, "Bring Them In." Recitations—"The Diamond," Bessie Mae Smith; "If We But Knew," Allene Thompson; "It Is Easter Time," Margaret Pickard. A reading by Mrs. Foust Thompson. Recitation, "Easter Morn," Elizabeth Thompson.

Plans for this year's work were then discussed. Then the superintendent with the aid of two of the girls served home-made candy and candy Easter eggs.

After the meeting was dismissed the children enjoyed an egg hunt which had been planned for them while they were having their meeting. The children were glad to have as visitors Mrs. Mattie Edwards, Mrs. Johnnie Edwards, and Miss Betsie Pickard.

Secretary Young People's Work.

Asheville.—Last Sunday was a very good day for our church here. Little Helen Bates was baptized and received into membership. This makes a total of four recently received into membership. There are others coming soon.

Brother Bates's sermon Sunday morning was one of the very best; the text, Luke 2: 49, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" "The Church as a Business Concern" was the subject. Some of the fine things he said:

The church is a great business concern, oldest and largest. I. The Plant. The church as a manufacturing concern dwarfs all material factories, as to money invested, physical equipment—church buildings, sites, college, benevolent institutions, publishing houses. The cost of running the churches in America alone is $400,000,000 annually. II. The Personnel. Back of every industrial concern is the personal element—president, board of directors, stockholders, superintendents, managers, foremen, mechanics. So, the church. God is a silent Partner. Jesus is founder and President. It belongs to Him. He loved and gave Himself for it, directs it, issues orders for it. He has committed the welfare of the church to "managers"—pastors, superintendents, presidents of societies, teachers. III. Products. IV. Power. It was a beautifully illustrated sermon, practical and most helpful.

Our brother, Roy Pittman, is critically ill. His sisters, Mrs. Ricks and Miss Pittman, are here from Rocky Mount.

Mrs. U. S. Miller, one of our most faithful members, recently returned from a visit to her children in New York City and Detroit. While away she visited one of our old members, Mrs. Wallace, at Flint, Mich.

Mrs. Fears recently donated a number of fine books to Westminster College, Texas.

The fruits of Brother Suits' labors in our special meeting just before Easter are in evidence continually. His visits among the members, with Pastor Bates, gave much comfort and will yield results. His practical sermons were much enjoyed. He will always have place in our hearts.

The shrubbery recently planted on the church lawn has made it one of the prettiest in Asheville.

Total of offerings on Easter Sunday was $100.

The Christian Endeavor Society will purchase the bulletin board so much needed.

Pastor Bates will begin this Wednesday night a series of studies on Bible characters. Abraham is the subject this week.

Burlington.—Two banners were presented to as many missionary organizations at the morning service yesterday. These banners were awarded at the branch meeting held in Winston-Salem April 7-9. The banner awarded to the Y. W. A. was for the best all-round report. Mrs. R. A. Maynard, the president, received this banner for her organization. The Buds of Hope banner was given for the largest enrollment, and was received by Mrs. Olie Moser, the superintendent. The other banner awarded to the G. M. B. has been ordered but has not yet arrived.

The Burlington church has eight missionary organizations—two for women and six for young people. This is the total number of organizations provided for in the general program of the women's work, and since we have them all, we suppose that our church may be rated as a 100 per cent church in missionary organization. About 300 members are enrolled, and the amount raised at the close of the fiscal year, April 30, is $848. We are grateful for our missionary activities.

The services yesterday were spiritual, and well attended. Prof. C. C. Haworth assisted us by teaching the Philathea class, and singing in the choir at the preaching service. Other visitors, and some of our members living in other cities, were gladly noted in the service.

The regular work of the C. E. Societies will be suspended during the Ham-Ramsey meetings. Instead of the usual program, the Intermediate and Senior societies will meet at the church at seven P. M., to pray for the meetings. These meetings have been running for a week now, and are getting well under way. The interest is growing and the effectiveness is becoming more and more apparent. The seating capacity of the tabernacle was taxed yesterday. Many could not get seats last night. More than six thousand people must have been present. We are praying for and expecting a great meeting.

The sick among our people are getting better. Mrs. Hornady is able to move about in her home, though she has to go on crutches. Mrs. W. N. Thompson, Mr. Carl Holt, and Mr. L. Boswell are out of the hospital. Maxine Kennedy, who was so badly hurt in an auto accident some weeks ago, is able to walk about her home, though she will probably have to undergo an operation before she gets entirely well.

Our Easter program was full of interest and gladness. The program had been well prepared, and was well rendered. The usual offering for home missions was taken.

The father of little Jerry Boggs, one of our boys, died early Sunday morning. Our hearts go out in tenderness and sympathy to Jerry and to the family.

April 20.

Mizpah, Brown Summit Charge.—If I were looking for the happiest people on earth, I could go to Mizpah church to find them. With the old church torn away and the beautiful new structure taking its place and the grounds beautified, you would hardly recognize it as the same place. It is a wonder to all who know that such a beautiful church has sprung up in so short a time, and with such congenial good fellowship. The writer has never known anything like it. They were not satisfied just to have a new church, but it had to be beautifully carpeted, with new pulpit chairs and table, and last of all, a beautiful piano has been installed—and better yet, this week will be pay-up week when there will be no debt on anything. Why not they be happy? And as a result, new life is in evidence on all lines of church work, larger and better Sunday school, finances in better shape, all because the folks had a mind to work. And it would be mean if I did not say that the good women of the community played a large part in the endeavor.

W. D. Reed.

Concord.—There was a large congregation gathered yesterday morning at our 11 o'clock service to hear Dr. R. M. Andrews, president of our college, who brought us a wonderful message on Leadership. Dr. Andrews told us in a magnificent way the importance of having a leader, someone that we could follow.

Every one was very happy indeed when it was announced that our former pastor, Rev. Lawrence Little, was going to deliver the evening message for us. He brought us a message that I am sure will help our church to overcome some of the trials and difficulties which we are now having to face. From Mr. Little's message I believe everyone has resolved to do his best, to do the things God would like to have us do while we are without a pastor. Mr. Little closed by challenging us to lean heavily upon our Master, and by trusting in Him for strength, to do whatever He would like to have us do.

The second quarterly conference was held Friday night. Our president, Dr. Dixon, was with us, and presided over the meeting. We had splendid reports from the different organizations, the church treasurer reported that everything was paid up to date, and a small balance left in the treasury. Besides the reports there were other important business matters attended to.

The Senior Christian Endeavor society held its monthly service at the county home Sunday afternoon at three o'clock. The old people at the home always seem happy to have us come and sing for them.

We were all sorry to give our beloved pastor, Mr. Little, up, but we are all going to do our part and work harder than ever until another pastor can be supplied for us.

Resolutions of Appreciation.

Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence C. Little:

Words are inadequate to express our appreciation of the splendid work you have done since being in our midst. Therefore be it resolved:

First—That the members of the Ladies' Aid society wish in this way to tell you that we love you and with every thought of parting there comes a pain.

Second—That we sincerely regret that circumstances have made it such that you had to leave; but we shall always cherish the memory of your stay with us.

Third—That wherever you go or whatever work you take our prayers and best wishes shall follow you.

Fourth—That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mr. Little, the quarterly conference, the Herald, and a copy be placed in the minutes of our society.

Mrs. Lillie Robbins,

Mrs. D. A. McLaurin,

Mrs. R. H. Haupt, Committee.

Palestine, Flat Rock.—Our beloved pastor, Rev. J. B. Trogdon, filled his appointment third Sunday. The house was almost filled. Brother Trogdon brings us a new message every time he comes. We all enjoy hearing him. The more we hear Brother Trogdon the more we like to hear him. It seems he gets better and better every time. We have begun to think we have a "real" good preacher.

We all enjoyed having Mrs. Trogdon, Idez, and J. B., Jr., worship with us. The pastor, Mrs. Trogdon, Idez and J. B., Jr., sang and played a special piece of music that we all enjoyed.

Immediately after service, Mrs. Trogdon presented the Sunday Egg Club to us. Mrs. J. C. Tucker was elected secretary and treasurer, Sister Dollie Sharron to solicit members. Hope to have the club well organized by our next appointment. Sunday egg club money will go to orphan children.

Sunday school is beginning with Brother J. C. Tucker superintendent. Hope all will attend that can.

Our revival meeting will be as usual third

Sunday in July. Pray for us.

Grace R. Tucker, Reporter.

Greenville Circuit.—I held my second quarterly conference at Wesley's Chapel on Saturday, April 11. Pastor preached at 11. A nice dinner was served, after which we transacted business of charge. A good representation from all the churches except Ebenezer which was not represented. A very interesting session was held. The spirit of love and good fellowship prevailed. A good showing on pastor's salary—not much on conference claims. The following were nominated for delegate to represent charge in annual conference: Joseph Brancombe of Philadelphia, R. D. Pair of Hobbs Chapel.

Matthews Chapel sets the next Quarterly conference. All together for a good and successful year. Very truly, H. L. Powell, Pastor.

Orange Charge.—On last Monday night, after we had returned from a visit to Mizpah church, Haw River circuit, a number of the people from Elford and Hillsboro came to our home and left various articles, suitable for table use.

This is the second regular pounding we have received here; but from time to time we have been remembered by useful articles of food and clothing. For all of these expressions of kindness we express our sincere thanks.

The work seems to be moving along nicely. The Easter program was rendered at three of the churches. Easter offerings were taken at each of the churches.

The contract for new parsonage is to be let next Saturday, the 25th.

Sincerely,

B. M. Williams.

Pleasant Grove, Thomasville Circuit.—We have had the seventh district rally and had a nice time. We enjoyed having all the visitors with us and hope they will come again some time. We want to thank Brother Bethea for preparing the program.

The Sunday school is progressing nicely but there is room for improvement.

The Christian Endeavor has decided to give a box party to get a library for the church. No definite date has been set.

Brother Reynolds preached us a splendid sermon Sunday. We were very much delighted to have Mrs. Reynolds with us Sunday.

At the close of the service the church made up $28.65 to pay for concrete walk to cemetery, and to terrace the front yard. The Ladies' Aid society is going to beautify it with shrubbery and flowers.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Tribute to Miss Lewis.

On March 2, the whole Orange Chapel community was made sad when it was learned that Miss Martha Jonna Lewis had passed to the great beyond. She was born August 28, 1861. When she was very young she surrendered her life to God and joined Orange Chapel Methodist Protestant church. To this church she was faithful and loyal until death. Although she was almost an invalid for many years, she often attended church, many times when she appeared to be unable. Miss Lewis lived a beautiful Christian life. She was modest and unassuming, amiable and pleasant.

For some time she had made her home with her nephew, Brother J. I. Lewis, who with his wife ministered to her so tenderly and lovingly.

A large crowd of relatives and friends attended the funeral service at Orange Chapel, which was conducted by the writer. Her body was then gently laid to rest in the nearby cemetery. The flower carriers were the Mission Band girls of Orange Chapel.

She is survived by Brother D. M. Lewis, her only brother, also one nephew and two nieces: Brother J. I. Lewis, Mrs. Henry Isley and Mrs. Tucker Conklin.

Beautiful toiler, thy work all done,
Beautiful soul into glory gone,
Beautiful life with its crown all won,
God giveth thee rest—

Rest from all sorrows and watchings and fears,
Rest from all possible sighings and tears,
Rest through God's endless wonderful years;
At home with the blest."

H. L. Isley.

Lashley.—Columbus Monroe Lashley was born May 5, 1851, and departed this life March 11, 1925. Early in life he accepted Christ as his personal Savior and joined Mt. Olive Baptist church, later transferring his membership to Antioch Baptist church. Although not a member of the Methodist Protestant church, Brother Lashley attended services frequently at Orange Chapel, it being the nearest church to him, and often spoke of joining. He was a good man, a kind neighbor, and will be greatly missed.

Brother Lashley is survived by his wife and one son and one daughter. The writer was called on to conduct the funeral service at Orange Chapel Methodist Protestant church, after which his body was laid to rest in the church cemetery.

THE FOUR VALENTINES.

There once lived in a village a certain rich young girl, the Lady Louella Lapidee, who was very fond of sweets and pastries. Twice a year she had her huge pantry stored with supplies for making them; but several times the flour had run short.

When the St. Valentine season came round Lady Louella made up her mind that that should not happen again. So without saying anything to her cook, and without knowing anything herself about weights and measures, she sent a large order to the mills.

She wondered very much when a wagon loaded with sacks of flour drew up before the door.

"O dear, dear me!" she said to herself. "What shall I do with it all?"

But she had ordered the flour, and so there was nothing to do except take it.

Forty large sacks were carried into the storeroom.

"My stars!" said Lady Louella. "I must take a long walk and try to think what to do with all that flour."

As she strolled down the road the first house that she passed was a paper-hanger's shop; the windows were full of wall-papers of all patterns. The second building belonged to a banker; there was a pile of gold coins in each window. The third belonged to a dry goods merchant; in the windows there were wax figures of ladies in velvet gowns. The fourth building was a bakery and in the windows of that there was nothing at all.

All at once an idea occurred to her. She turned round and went home and wrote four notes and sent them to the houses that she had just passed. In each note she said, "I have more flour than I know what to do with and shall be glad to give away thirty sacks at five o'clock tonight."

The notes made a great stir when they were delivered.

"The paste that I can make!" said the paper-hanger.

"I can sell those thirty sacks and have more gold pieces for my windows," said the banker.

"I will give away a pound of flour to every customer and so increase my trade," said the merchant.

The baker was the most excited of all, for he had almost run out of flour. "But now," he said as he caught his little daughter, Irene, and whirled her round and round, "I can get more flour."

At five o'clock Lady Louella sat waiting in her parlor. She wondered which of the four men would come in response to her letter.

There was a knock at the door, and a few minutes later the servant showed in five visitors—the paper-hanger, the merchant, the banker, the baker and little Irene, the baker's daughter, who had begged to come too.

Lady Louella was astonished; she had no idea that so many people wanted flour. "Could you really use thirty sacks of flour?" she said timidly to them.

"I could, indeed," said the paper-hanger, the banker, the merchant, and the baker almost with one voice.

"O dear, dear me!" said Lady Louella.

Here was a pretty state of affairs! The lady looked in a troubled way at her guests, and her guests looked at her and at one another. No one knew what to do.

Then little Irene stepped forward and raised her hand. "Please, Lady Louella," she said.

"What is it, little girl?" said Lady Louella.

"Day after tomorrow will be St. Valentine's Day," said the little girl. "Suppose you say that you will give the flour to the person who sends you the best valentine?"

Lady Louella was delighted. "Just the thing!" she said. "I will give the thirty sacks of flour to the person who sends me the sweetest—yes, the very sweetest—valentine on St. Valentine's Day."

The four men agreed readily to that. Each of them was perfectly sure that he should succeed.

Late the next afternoon they came again, but this time little Irene was not with her father. The men laid their offerings before Lady Louella.

With a pink spot in each cheek she began to unwrap the packages.

The paper-hanger's valentine came first. It was made of layers and layers of delicate silver paper, and on each layer was painted a tiny wreath of flying birds, rose and green and turquoise. "How lovely!" said the lady.

The merchant's valentine was made of ivory-colored lace as thin as a cobweb, and gilt threads were woven through it. It was decorated with clusters of little velvet violets, white and lavender, purple and gold. Lady Louella was charmed with it.

The banker's offering was very handsome. The foundation was a piece of heavy gold cloth as large as a plate; in the center was a perfumed rose with golden petals, and at the heart of the rose lay a milk-white pearl. Lady Louella clasped her hands in wonder and delight.

The baker's valentine was in a white box. When Lady Louella had taken off the cover she sat and stared. Then her eyes began to twinkle.

"How sweet!" she said. Then she picked up the contents of the box and took a big bite. For the baker's valentine was very sweet indeed; it was a heart-shaped chocolate cake covered all over with trailing vines of green and with little frosty pink-and-white flowers of cocoanut.

"Oh, how delicious!" said Lady Lapidee. "Dear me, how rude I am to begin eating it right away. But I could not help myself." Then she added, "You will have to admit, gentlemen, that this is the sweetest valentine of the lot."

The baker beamed, but the three other men looked terribly disappointed.

"We didn't know you meant that kind of sweet," said the merchant, the banker, and the paper-hanger all together.

"I didn't know it either," said a voice at the door, and little Irene came running in. She had not been able to stay at home any longer.

"Well, I didn't mean that kind of sweet," said Lady Louella. "But somehow this valentine seems the sweetest in every way."

Irene's face shone. "I just knew that nothing could be better than one of father's good cakes," she said.

So the long and short of it was that Lady Louella sent for a knife and then cut out the bitten piece and sliced the cake and passed it round. The banker, the merchant, and the paperhanger had to admit that it was a wonderful cake.

So the baker, aided by his little Irene, won the prize. He offered to share it with the other men, but they shook their heads and declared as they finished the chocolate and coconut crumbs that he had won it fairly.

Then they all went home, and the baker and little Irene spent many happy hours turning those thirty sacks of flour into loaves and cakes and puddings and pies.—Clara Peterson, in The Youth's Companion.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Rosa Victoria Brown.—"Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord." Such a one was Rosa Victoria Brown, born at Buffalo Springs, Va., February 14, 1861. Converted in girlhood, she joined the Episcopal Church. She was married to W. A. Brown April 29, 1885, to which union four children were born, two of whom have preceded her to the heavenly land. Those left to mourn her death are her husband, W. A. Brown, Elizabeth, a daughter, and Talmadge, a son, besides three grandchildren, Rosamund, Thelma and Louise Merritt, whom she has had since the death of her first daughter, all living at Gibsonville, N. C. She came with her husband to Haw River in 1885, where she became identified with the Methodist Protestant Church, and thence to Gibsonville in October, 1906.

She was a fine, unassuming Christian character, and was much loved by those privileged to know her. She was not well for many years before her death, and was several times in the hospital, and all was done that human hands could do, but after a long illness death came, and she reached the Gates at 11 A. M., April 1, 1925, surrounded by her family, to whom she had given evidence of departing to be with Christ. Funeral services were conducted by her pastor, Rev. G. H. Hendry, in the Gibsonville Methodist Protestant church in the presence of a large congregation of relatives and friends that overflowed the church, April 2, 1925, at 2:30 P. M.

The sorrowing one we commend to God "and the word of his grace" that they "sorrow not as those who have no hope," but rather may her mantle resting upon them lead them to the everlasting habitation.

WHAT IS HE GOOD FOR?

What is a boy good for anyway if we can't trust him? He may have a fair face, fine clothes, and standing collar, but what does he amount to if his ears are not right?

We have no earthly use for a boy that will sneak or tell a lie; better tell the truth all the time than lie just a little. A boy may sometimes have to be punished for telling the truth, but the punishment will be ever so much lighter than if caught in lies, and in nine cases out of ten he is sure to be caught. So no matter what kind of a scrape you get into tell the truth first, last and all the time.—Selected.

HOW HOT IS IT?

In Rio Janeiro it seemed hot. We went around in our lightest clothes and felt rather uncomfortable at that. Then we noted that most of the well-to-do men wore ordinary suits of heavy cloth with coats buttoned up. At a great funeral there were several hundred men in stove pipe hats and heavy Prince Albert coats, all carefully buttoned up. None of them looked especially hot and uncomfortable.

We began to wonder whether it were really hot, and to look for a thermometer. We found one. It stood at 51 degrees. "That's one degree below freezing," said the Lady, "and we are standing around here with our lightest clothes on. It's not reasonable."

"What's this on the other side?" asked another member of the party. "It looks like another thermometer."

"So it is," assented the Lady.

They all looked at registered 25 degrees. It remained for the young graduate to solve the difficulty. "That thermometer is a European thermometer," he said. "One side is the centigrade scale, the other is Fahrenheit. The temperature here is 51 centigrade or about 120 Fahrenheit, but who knows what that means, Fahrenheit?"

Nobody knew, but the tall man undertook to figure it out.

"One degree of Centigrade is equal to one and eight ninths degrees of Fahrenheit," he said. "That would make 51 degrees of Centigrade about the same as 56 Fahrenheit."

"It's more than 56 right now," declared the young Graduate, wiping his forehead. "I forgot to add 32," said the tall man. "That makes the temperature right here in the shade 88 degrees. No wonder it makes us sweat."

"How about those fellows in the tall hats?" asked the Lady, still a little skeptical of the figures.

"They are used to it," was the reply.—Selected.

"Eh?" said the deaf man.

WHAT WILL YOU DO WITHOUT HIM?

I could not do without Him!
Jesus is more to me
Than all the richest, fairest gifts
Of earth could ever be.
But the more I find Him precious
And the more I find him true,
The more I long for you to find
What he can do for you.

What will you do without Him?
Is He not kind indeed?
Did He not die to save you?
Is He not all you need?
Do you not want a Savior?
Do you not want a Friend?
One who will love you faithfully,
And love you to the end?

What will you do without Him
When death is drawing near,
Without His love—the only love,
That casts out every fear?
When the shadow-valley opens
Unlighted and unknown,
And the terrors of its darkness
Must all be passed alone.

What will you do without Him
When He hath shut the door,
And you are left outside because
You would not come before?
When it is no use knocking
No use to stand and wait;
For the word of doom tolls through your heart
That terrible, "Too late!"

METHODIST PROTESTANT HERALD.

J. F. McCulloch, Editor and Publisher.

Published weekly in the interest of the Methodist Protestant Church as an organ of the North Carolina Annual Conference.

Price.—$1.50 a year, payable in advance. Papers are discontinued on expiration of the term of subscription. However, subscribers who request it will be marked on our books as "regular," their papers to be continued and payment to be made as near the beginning of the year as convenient.

Subscribers can remit directly or hand their money to pastors who act as our agents in the field.

In directing change of address, give the old address as well as the new. In renewing, give the same initials as before.

We cannot often supply back numbers.

We acknowledge receipt of money on subscriptions by accounts by changing the date on the label. If this is not changed within two weeks after your money is forwarded, write us.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Greensboro, N. C.

—Read the report from High Point this week and you will begin to realize what a magnificent structure our people there have prepared for their use. This building is, we believe, the best church our denomination has yet erected. We think neither Washington, Baltimore nor Pittsburgh has its equal. But Dr. Brown intimated that they would be free from vainglory and would have a sense of greater responsibility because they have the advantage such a building gives them. Last Sunday after the sermon thirty people came forward and united with the church.

—Dr. Lewis, in his sermon at the church opening in High Point last Sunday spoke of God's real dwelling place on the earth. From the time that Jacob set up a pillar of stone and called it God's house men have been trying to localize the presence of God. But all the great temples that men build are but shadows, symbols, of God's real dwelling place on the earth. The speaker found the real temple of God to be the human body. In the body of Christ dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead. But every believer is to be the temple of God. Christ showed in his relation to God as a man what all men may become. The great thing is not a consecrated house but a consecrated life, including soul and body. Have consecrated houses no value, then? Yes, they have a value. Solomon's temple had a value. Every Christian church has a value—as a type or shadow of the reality, the indwelling of God in the body and soul of man. "The tabernacle of God is with men and He will dwell with them."

A Methodist Protestant in Important Position.—Brother Ira Champion of the Alabama Conference has for some time held the important position of assistant legislative superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America, with office in Washington, D. C. He was called to this position because of his ability in work of the kind. He is thus associated with Wayne B. Wheeler, who is the terror of the wet politicians. Brother Champion was in Greensboro last Friday and honored us with a call.

THE NEW FIRST M. P. CHURCH, HIGH POINT, N. C.

—The Germans in their election last Sunday elected General Hindenburg as the president of the German Republic. To many this seems to indicate a leaning toward the old order of things, including monarchy. Others think that it has no such significance. Time will probably tell.

—Last Sunday night at Calvary church Rev. L. W. Gerringer preached the annual sermon to the graduating class of South Buffalo High School. This school has closing exercises this week.

—Brother Bynum Clapp of Grace church favored Calvary church with a solo in the Sunday night service.

—May 23-30 will be observed throughout the country as Flag Week. At least that is the plan of the United States Flag Association, of which President Coolidge is honorary president. The purpose is to bring to all Americans greater love and respect for the flag and a better understanding of what Old Glory stands for.

—The Japanese freight ship Raifuku Maru sank off the coast of Nova Scotia last week. All the thirty-eight members of the crew perished. The ship sent out radio calls for help, which brought two big ocean liners, the Homeric and the Tuscania, to the scene. They could do nothing to help, however, on account of the heavy seas.

—Augustus Lukeman, sculptor, of New York, has been named to finish the work on the gigantic confederate memorial that is being carved on the side of Stone Mountain, near Atlanta, Georgia. He succeeds Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor who planned the memorial and began work on it. Borglum had a misunderstanding with the memorial committee and was discharged.

—Brother J. Norman Wills was one of those nominated as members of Greensboro's board of councilmen in the primary election last Monday.

—Rev. T. M. Johnson was in Greensboro this week.

That which the French proverb hath of sickness is true of all evils, that they come on horseback, and go away on foot; we have often seen a sudden fall or one meal's surfeit hath stuck by many to their graves; whereas pleasures come like oxen, slow and heavily, and go away like post-horses, upon the spur.—Bishop Hall.

MISTAKES OF SCIENTISTS.

Scientists are but men—fallible men. But some seem to think that when the term “science,” “scientific,” or “scientist” is tagged on to a thing that settles it. It does not matter how wild, unreasonable, or foolish it is, the average person is ready to gulp it down whole—horns, hoofs and all, without any thought or consideration whatever. And most especially if the thing contradicts the Bible, do they the more eagerly swallow it down whole, with a relish. It suits the natural human heart. There could be nothing more delightful to some persons than to be assured that the Bible is false and that there is no God. And everything that they can scrape together that some persons calling themselves scientists have spit out contrary to the Bible, they hold as their most valued treasure. This becomes their god instead of Jehovah. Anything to get rid of God and the Bible. As Paul says, “they do not like to retain God in their knowledge,” and “change the truth of God into a lie.”

Dr. Nelson in his “Cause and Cure of Infidelity” tells of a certain formation, or deposit, in France that scientists judged to be from 10,000 to 20,000 years old. Of course, had their judgment been correct, it would have shown the Bible to be false because of certain remains which this deposit contained. But it turned out that an old man living in the community remembered when the whole thing happened. So the bottom fell out of this scientific(?) guess, and the Bible haters were confounded.

Sidney Collett in his “All About the Bible” tells that in the delta of the Nile where the deposit is about 30 feet thick, some pieces of human pottery were found at the bottom of the deposit. And some of the scientists guessed that these bits of pottery were at least 30 or 35 thousands years old. And of course this proved beyond all question—for a scientist had spoken—that man had been on the earth at least 30 or 35 thousand years—anything to contradict the Bible. But the bottom fell out of this infidel guess, when some of this pottery was taken to Rome, and found to be Roman pottery of a late date. And a Christian scientist, Sir William Dawson, showed that allowing one-fifteenth of an inch a year for the deposit (a very conservative estimate) the delta could have been built up in less than 5,000 years.

So when you find scientific statement contradicting the Bible, just lay it up in your curiosity shop and wait, and in due time it will be shown to be untrue. Nobody has ever shown the Bible to be untrue—some think they have, because of their ignorance of the Bible—but it always turns out that a “man of straw” has been set up and knocked down, and then a great yell for infidelity is heard. And some good people who believe the Bible, but know little about it, are troubled.

Dr. Howard Kelly of Baltimore, the distinguished scientist, physician, and surgeon, with degrees from a dozen or more colleges and universities in the United States and Europe, says, “Mere scoffing at the Bible has never disturbed me in the least. Scoffing is invariably the child of ignorance, and blindness to obvious facts. I was disturbed more by the critical attitude of sundry learned men with large reputations, often my professional colleagues, than I was by any scoffing. But this critical attitude, too, has always been due to ignorance of the Bible’s teachings. I have never in my whole life met a man who knew the Bible and rejected it.”

Neither have I ever read a book criticizing the Bible adversely, but the writer betrayed his ignorance of the Bible. But of this fact he was ignorant, and, of course, did not know that he was ignorant.

All this talk by evolutionists and skeptics in general, that the Bible is not a scientific book, I have never seen supported by any proof. We all admit that the Bible is not primarily a treatise on science, but that it teaches anything contrary to science, I have never seen proved. Where does the Bible teach the earth to be flat? Nowhere. I have never seen, nor seen the chapter and verse pointed out by others. The whole thing is a jumped-at conclusion by those unfriendly to the Bible, with no proof whatever. The Bible attempts no proof either way, but assumes the earth to be round. This may be a surprise to some who have not thought about it: But Jesus tells us that when he returns to this world, some will “be in the field”—day-time; others will “be in bed”—night-time; while others “will be grinding at the mill”—morning. How can these, and other similar statements of Jesus, be reconciled with the idea of a flat earth? They simply cannot. The poetic statement of God through the prophet, of Jehovah “sitting on the circle of the earth” cannot be reconciled with the idea of a flat earth. The statements, “things under the earth,” and “the waters under the earth,” can only mean on the “under” side of the earth from us. Are they not “under” us? Being on the opposite side of the earth from us. Down and under being relative terms—being toward the center of the earth from us, things on the opposite side of the earth are under us, in this sense, and in the true sense.

There is much ado made by those unfriendly to the Bible about the “four corners of the earth,” as if the Bible taught the earth to be flat and square. They cannot see, and it seems do not want to see, that the expression, the “four corners of the earth,” simply means the “four quarters of the earth,” and is so translated in another place. An expression that includes the entire earth. These fault-finders of the Bible are like a pig in an inclosed field, that can never see the hole he got in at, when you try to get him out. They see what they want to see, and that through glasses of prejudice and ignorance. No one unfriendly to the Bible can ever understand the Bible. There must be an open mind and an open heart. There must be a spiritual approach as well as an intellectual approach. And this the average scientist does not have. He approaches the Bible with a cold intellect and an unfriendly, antagonistic heart. He turns his back to the light, or shuts his eyes to the light, and then finds fault with the light, and then professes to be very wise—scoffing and sneering at the Bible, the church, and religion. Many of these are the ones who are leading our boys and girls away from God, the Bible, the church and religion. And what will the harvest be? It is fearful to think of it!

Another thing that should have been noticed in another place, is Joshua’s commanding the sun to “stand still.” There is much ado made over this. But where is the ground for it? Nowhere. Joshua used language in harmony with the appearance of things, just as we do to this day—astronomers and all. The almanac says the sun rises and sets. It does not say that the earth revolves, but that sun, moon, and stars rise and set—language in harmony with the appearance of things. So this great ado of Bible haters proves nothing. The language is used by believers in both the Ptolemaic and in the Copernican system of astronomy. As to what Joshua personally knew, or believed, about astronomy, this statement of his does not tell us. As already said, it is simply language in harmony with appearances, and proves nothing either way. Of course God knew, and does know, the facts as they are, and had he revealed the matter to Joshua he would have revealed it as it was and is. Joshua knew what he wanted, the day lengthened, and he got it. So this great ado of the infidel and modernist vanishes away when we approach the subject with a little common sense.

Jonah and the whale are old and stale, but we must give them a passing notice. In the first place, nobody knows that a whale swallowed Jonah. It was a great fish or sea monster, and is so translated in some passages, called a “great fish” in the book of Jonah. “Sea-monster” in the margin of R. V. “Great fish” in Hind’s N. T.

Now it is a known fact that many fish have been caught with mouth and throat sufficiently large to swallow a man, and then room to spare. And then there are cases on record where a man has been found in the stomach of a whale, by whale fishermen, and the man still alive, and did live. We have never seen these facts disputed. These infidel scientists forget that there are different kinds of whales even. But it does not matter how many facts in absolute and unquestionable refutations of these infidel quibbles are produced, they are like the pig in the field, they can never see the hole or crack in the fence where they came in. They do not want to get out. They want to stay in. Did anybody ever hear of the devil’s being convinced, or changing his mind? When he is beaten he will slink off for a while, but when he returns he is the same old devil that he was before. So of these infidel friends of his, they never change. They profess to be seekers after truth, but truth that does not suit them they will not receive. They profess to be very sincere and honest in the matter, but their whole attitude toward the Bible contradicts their profession.

Some get troubled about Cain’s wife, and quote something for scripture that is not in the Bible, saying that Cain went to the land of Nod, “and there he saw his wife and knew her.” They infer that he had never seen her before, and became acquainted with her on arriving in this place of banishment. The truth is, the word “saw” is not in the statement, neither the word “knew” in the sense of becoming acquainted. If some quibblers would be a little more careful in reading the Bible, and consult a good dictionary occasionally it would be quite a help. How old was Adam when Cain and Abel were born? Nobody ws. He was 130 years old when Seth was born. Where does the Bible say that Cain was Adam's first-born? Nowhere. There may have been many sons and daughters born to Adam before Cain. This is not an impossible nor unreasonable supposition. And out of his father's family no doubt Cain got his wife, and carried her with him to the land of Nod. And there she conceived and bare a son, Enosh. And Cain builded a city and called it after his son.

Persons come to wrong conclusions by assuming things without proof, for instance, that Cain was Adam's first-born—an entirely gratuitous assumption. God saw fit to place representative persons in these ancient records. The great mass of the people are not named. Only three of Adam's children, Cain, Enosh, and Seth. None of his daughters is named, though he doubtless had many. His first-born might have been a daughter—who can say nay. Nobody.

Adam being 130 years old at the birth of Enosh, how many sons and daughters, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren could have been born to Adam during this more than 100 years? And the additional statement is that Adam lived 800 years after the birth of Seth, and begat sons and daughters. There is no account of premature death in those days because of disease. There may have been, but so, it is not recorded. So they multiplied upon the earth in those days—they were prolific, living hundreds, and well up to thousands of years, and no birth-control cranks in those days, we may safely infer. So a little arithmetic will surprise you, in arithmetical, or geometrical progression, and show that there could have been as many, or well-nigh as many, persons on the earth at the Flood as there are now.

But this is beside the question: the whole Bible teaches that the first man was Adam, and that the entire race has descended from him, Cain's wife and all, without mixture of monkey, baboon, ape, chimpanzee, gorilla, orang-outang, missing-link, or what not.

J. F. Dosier.

HE WAS CONTENT WITH TWELVE.

By Mildred Welch.

"But, Horace, you are wasting your life here, a life that for its sheer quality and essence should be given to the world. It isn't my fault that we need a man who combines the modern scientific spirit with broad vision and firm grasp on the deep elemental things of the human spirit, but you need the university. You would find there the sympathy, the freedom of thought and speech you can never get here. You would have a laboratory equipped with everything money could buy, there would be instructors and assistants and hundreds of students eager to follow on any quest you might set them—while here"—he gave a look around the room and shrugged his shoulders. "Of course," he went on, "for a college like this you have remarkably good stuff here, how can I get it, I don't see."

The other man smiled: "By cutting down the paint and fine buildings and professors' salaries—unnecessary luxuries, you know."

The university president made an impatient gesture. Both men had the spare, lean frame, the studious look of the scholar, but there the likeness ended. One was tailored and groomed almost to a fault, his hands were white and shapely, his hair silvered and abundant, his whole bearing distinguished, superior, complacent. The other carried himself more loosely, wore his shiny clothes with careless ease and had a kind of luminous look in his face that held the gaze.

The class room in which they sat was small. The floor planks were uneven, the blackboards old, the benches rough and hacked with initials, the few cases and shelves and tables were crowded with jars and models and specimens. But its wide windows looked out upon the campus. Five or six other buildings could be seen through the trees. They were of red brick with white pillars and trimmings and with the passing of time had acquired a softening of tint and outline that blended in with the mellow sunshine of the late April afternoon. The two men had been friends and classmates, both had made a specialty of biology and finished their studies abroad. Langdon had come back to rise by rapid and brilliant steps to the head of a great university; Owens had accepted the chair of biology in the same college in which he and Langdon had been students. From time to time a paper written by him had attracted attention from scientific men but offer after offer from universities and schools had failed to move him. Now Langdon had come down to his old college determined to secure him for his own university. But an hour's argument had failed to convince and he was becoming irritated. "Of course, I know you are an idealist and I have not insulted you with the offer of a larger salary but I have put before you a great field of service, service for our country in training her future men of science. You must be mad to insist on staying here in this narrow and—yes, I will say it, this bigoted denominational atmosphere, when you might have freedom wide as the heavens in which to work."

Owens, absently toying with a pencil, had been looking out at the window. Spring was in the air. Far down at one end of the campus there was a flash of blooming dogwood among the maples. Below the bluff the river ran golden in the sun. The boat crews were out for practice and the sunshine caught the wet blades of the feathered oars; two of the track team ran by the window, voices came up from the tennis court, here and there under the trees a student stretched full length on the grass was studying, another with his book over his eyes lay fast asleep.

Owens turned, "I'm sorry, old friend, but I think you misunderstand. You have had your say out, it is my turn. You will not interrupt?" "No, go ahead, so sure am I that I'm 'playing safe' that if you can persuade me you are not wasting what you call that priceless thing—life, I will see what I can do for this precious laboratory of yours here."

"When I first got back from Germany," Owens began, "I'll confess I was somewhat adrift. Then I had a breakdown and the doctor ordered me to the woods. I spent a winter in the far northwest, living in a shack doing my own cooking, with no company but my books and an occasional talk with a trapper or lumberjack. After awhile in the quietness and stillness of those great solitudes I began to understand the significance of the words written above the Delphic Oracle, "Know Thyself." Those silent spaces were my patmos where I found myself and—something that had been lost. I had always intended teaching biology but expected to do it in some college where I would be, as you may say—free. But now in the companionship of those forest aisles, the wide air, the stars, old things came back and long silent voices spoke in my soul again. Quite suddenly there emerged into my consciousness the vision of One, who, judged by the scholarship of this day, was merely an unlettered peasant but to whom the world, if it grants nothing else, awards the laurel of the greatest teacher of all time. To me, He is infinitely more than that but it is because He is the Great Teacher that I am here today. In a light, gentle and radiant, but revealing, I saw Him confronting a world task, the setting in motion of a power that was to overturn the Roman empire and affect the destinies of little islands in the far South Seas. And I saw that after a night in a desert place spent in solitude and prayer, He chose for the launching of His plan, twelve students, young fishermen, mostly. Thirty years after He had died a felon's death on a hill without the city walls, these students and others who had learned of them, were now in distant Roman provinces as men who were turning the world up-side-down. The charge was true, you know yourself that they did. One phrase came to me out there and sang itself over and over in my ears: "He was content with twelve."

I read the other day of the frame of reference which some scientists working on a certain theory had made for themselves. Here it is as I copied it. "In an effort of many years to find 'a place to stand' they hitched their frame of reference to first one thing and then another. Nothing would do, nothing was fixed, everything moved, moved with shattering velocity. At last they took the ether, took it on faith because they don't know whether there is such a thing or not but they had no further choice."

"It was just this that was the secret of His power, the reason He could be content with only twelve in His school. He offered them no buildings, laboratory or equipment, but He could and did give them something worth more than all of these. For a short while He taught them, with only a bird, a flower, the night wind, a child, evening and morning skies, simple things of their everyday lives, as object lessons. Then He left them to work it out for themselves. They did work it out—with their frame of reference. That 'place to stand' which you will remember Archimedes also tried to find can be expressed, as they found it, in a short formula: 'In the beginning, God—revealed in Jesus Christ His Son.' After three years, these men knew one thing only, you may say, but to that one thing they could relate everything in an unknown, changing and hostile universe and their power to shake the world, to turn it entirely around on its track came from their tested knowledge of that one but eternally important fact. Yes," he divined the thought in his friend's mind, "you are thinking of Judas. But even Judas knew, didn't he? You get a strong impression from the end of the story that at the last, even Judas had no doubts."

There was a pause. A vagrant breeze brought the fragrance of locust blossoms through the window.

"Out there in the woods," he went on, "I, too, found my place to stand. Afar off and in my poor stumbling way, I try to follow in His steps. This small church college is my desert place, my Galilee; these farmers' and ministers' sons, these lads from the mountains and small towns with their dreams and visions, are my twelve. I teach them to follow truth to its shining end and in everything I teach of proven fact, I try to lead them to relate it to the same frame of reference that freshman class in Galilee was given—'In the beginning, God—revealed in Jesus Christ, His Son.' If I can send my students out having given them that sure, steadfast, certain, immovable place to stand and something to which they can relate whatever the years may bring of terror or pain, or joy and opportunity, because they know, I shall feel that life everlasting, immortal and complete has begun for me already!"

There were fire and passion behind the quiet words. But Langdon did not reply. The setting sun threw long, slanting bars of gold across the lawn, a bird in a nearby tree was singing to his mate. Owens, glancing at his friend, saw that pride and complacency had dropped from him and in their place had come the look of the dreamer. It was very still in the old classroom. For after many years, Langdon had come back and once again was following the Great Teacher along the shores of Galilee and in the lilled fields was listening to Him who taught not as the scribes but as one having authority.—Selected.

This week's report is exceedingly interesting as it places on the roll of one or the other of our budgets the names of all charges but eleven. There are now 62 answering to roll call on the A. C. B., and 57 on the G. C. B. We welcome the new names. There are four—Bessemer City, Shelby, Democrat and Mecklenburg—new to both budgets and contributions from 24 charges. That is fine. Had as many been reporting each week of the half-year just closed, what a fine half-year's work it would have been. Everybody make an effort to send in something every week during the remaining half-year. Stewards, see the people, and people, if you do not call on you, you call on them.

There are a number of the charges that could go over the top with a very little effort, and, pastors, I am calling on you to put forth a strenuous effort to put these charges over. Some pastors and charges have done very little yet on either budget and eleven have done nothing. I am asking you to make a diligent effort to pay up. Half your budget is due. The Kingdom needs it.

On the A. C. B. Mt. Pleasant with a fine payment held her place. Concord gained three points, going to third. Stanly also gained three points and went to 14. Saxapahaw gained two points, going to 34. On the G. C. B. there was good work done, 23 charges sending in payments. Look for yourself and see where you are. A number lost ground because others sent in good sums on this budget. Now let us not stop but keep at work and at paying until we are paid out in full. You might as well do it now as later. Some charges never fall short. Some pastors, no matter where they serve, never fall short. So I know you are going to do this, please do it now, and so help lift the burdens right now.

Faithfully yours, A. G. Dixon.

A SPECIAL AND URGENT REQUEST.

We are planning for great things in June at the High Point College and the Children's Home. Our Pastors' Summer Conference and our Young People's Summer Conference will be held at the same time, and the opening session of each will be held at the evening hour on June 15. We are anxious to have every pastor to arrange to stay through the entire conference, which will close on June 26. A fine program is in preparation. We need the inspiration of your presence through this entire meeting, and you need to be there with your young people to help us see that they get the very most possible out of the meeting.

This request is threefold. I am hereby asking all pastors to please plan to be there for the entire meeting. I am also asking that the charges give their pastors the ten days' time that they may be there. And I am also asking that the charges pay the expenses of pastors to these meetings. Of course if your charge gives the pastor this vacation, and pays his expenses you will do it with the understanding that he will attend these meetings. Most heartily I thank you for your co-operation in this. Yours faithfully,

A. G. Dixon.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Important.

The figures showing standing of charges on the A. C. B. and the G. C. B. as published in the Herald from time to time show just the amounts sent to Rev. S. W. Taylor, our conference treasurer. They do not show any amounts raised by the woman's missionary societies. We are endeavoring to secure these figures now through pastors' reports for second quarter. The missionary women will please help pastors to get the exact amount that you have raised, which may be counted on the General Conference budget.

Half the year is gone. Another six months will bring up to conference. Up to date all charges but 11 have reported some amount paid on one or the other budget. See if your charge is omitted. The charges reporting have paid a total of $3,829.75 on the A. C. B., and a total of $2,540.75 on the G. C. B., leaving a balance of $17,265.25 on A. C. B. and a balance of $47,549.25 on G. C. B. to be raised during the next six months if we are to do our share in Kingdom service through the budgets. Just six months of the twelve left in which to do this heavier end of the work, and if we wait to do it within the last six weeks of the conference year we are apt to disappoint our Lord.

Out of the 62 charges having made payments on the G. C. B. during the first six months of the conference year fourteen of them have paid over two-thirds of the total receipts. And out of the 57 charges having made payments on the G. C. B., eight have paid over one half of the total receipts. Conference directed that we make monthly payments on the budgets. God expects great things of us—we must not disappoint Him.

Among the Churches.

On Saturday, April 25, we were privileged to be with the people of Kernersville charge in a splendid circuit rally at Sandy Ridge church. There was a fair attendance of the people. Addresses were made by Dr. S. K. Spahr, Mrs. A. G. Dixon, Rev. N. G. Bethea, and me, and the second quarterly conference was held in the afternoon. The people who were present seemed deeply interested in Kingdom affairs. The pastor and the people, I think, are very much encouraged over the work. They prorated the allotment for college endowment among the churches and directed that the pastor with his committees canvass the membership for this amount. We predict for them a good year.

Two Happy Events.

On Thursday evening, April 23, we had the privilege of taking supper with the people of Grace church in their hut, and then of sitting with them in a business meeting where they agreed to proceed at an early date to begin building their entire new church plant, the building to cost about $125,000. They also canvassed those who were present and raised around $40,000 that evening. That, together with cash in hand amounts to around $85,000, and their committee is to continue the canvass among many members who were not present in their last meeting. The pastor and the people are happy in the prospect for a new church. Really the people gave happily.

High Point.

The second happy event was the opening services in the new church in High Point. I cannot tell what it cost. These facts, together with many others, will doubtless be given by another. But I can tell you that it is a thing of beauty and will be a joy forever to our people in that city. To my way of thinking, it is the most complete church plant in all its apartments I have ever seen. For the greater part of my ministerial life I have dreamed of a great plant like that in which God's people may worship Him, and through which they may serve Him. Sunday, April 26, was a happy day for Dr. Geo. R. Brown and his people. Dr. T. H. Lewis, president of our General Conference, preached a very appropriate sermon to a large audience at the morning hour. On the platform with him were four of us who have had the privilege of serving the High Point church as pastors, together with Dr. R. M. Andrews, Rev. Paul S. Kennett and Rev. N. M. Harrison, Jr. In the audience we noted Dr. J. F. McCulloch, Rev. J.

H. Stowe and Rev. E. G. Lowdermilk, besides visiting laymen from many of the surrounding communities. The day was beautiful. The music was most inspiring. The preacher was at his best. The pastor and the people were happy, so the service was a memorable one. At the close of the service 31 were received into the church.

At the evening hour I had the privilege of preaching to another large audience, and tried to do my best. Thus ended the greatest day in the history of that great church.

We could but feel that the spirits of Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Welch, Mr. W. P. Jickett, Dr. and Mrs. J. R. Reitzel, Aunt Sallie Wilborn, Mr. J. C. Welch, Mr. B. F. Montgomery, little Evelyn Penny and many others hovered over the scenes of yesterday in our First Church, High Point. God bless all our faithful workers there.

Yours in His blessed service,

A. G. Dixon.

FAITH'S OLD SWEET SONG.

The song his baby lips could first repeat
He learned in Mother's arms. With voice so sweet,

At twilight hour in the long ago,
She sang it—"Jesus loves me, this I know."

A few more years—a merry-hearted boy,
Where lilies breathe of Easter's holy joy,
He stands with other children, face aglow,
And sings it—"Jesus loves me, this I know."

Now, full of years and honors, wisdom's quest
Leads but to truth learned at his Mother's breast;

He finds life's sweetest song, the balm of woe,
That old song—"Jesus loves me, this I know."

His Mother's smile returns with that old song,
Earth's staff of faith, the joy of Heaven's throng;

And, facing Jordan's flood, he murmurs low—
"Forgiven! Jesus loves me, this I know."

MOTHER'S DAY PRAYER DELIVERED IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

"Almighty God, we honor Thee by setting apart a day to hallow our mother's name.

"Thou hast held in thy keeping one universal heart and close to it in safety and peace thou hast put the babes to whom thou hast given life in this world.

"We cannot lose our whole life while we feel the touch of her hand.

"The symbol of her power today is the white carnation, more beautiful than our words, more fragrant than our praises, more pure than our thoughts.

"Amid the rush of life, may we this day go back in holy memory to this pure fountain of life, and may we come forth in the innocence and peace in which she gave us to our life's task.

"Enthroned once more in every place of power the scepter of mother love. For Christ's sake. Amen."—Rev. F. J. Prettyman, D.D., Chaplain.

Fortitude implies a firmness and strength of mind that enables us to do and suffer as we ought. It rises upon an opposition, and, like a river, swells the higher for having its course stopped.—Jeremy Collier,

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE AND LIFE-WORK RECRUITS.

By Lena Martin.

Included in a questionnaire sent out by the Student Volunteer Movement to Life Work Recruits in diverse sections of the United States was the question, "What had the most influence on your life work decision?" A large majority replied, "A convention address." This is proof sufficient that our Young People's Summer Conference would be worth while if the only good accomplished were to furnish the opportunity of hearing inspirational addresses.

But this is just one of the manifold reasons why the summer conferences are necessary to the lives of our Methodist Protestant young people, and especially the Life Work Recruits. If one secret of the great usefulness of the young people's movement is influencing life decisions, another is the broadening of the vision. The young people get away from the idea that the men and women devoting their lives to unselfish ministry to the many and various needs of the peoples in distant lands are the only missionaries. They learn that those who perform similar offices for the neglected inhabitants of the hill towns of Kentucky, of the sparsely settled prairie or godless mining center of the West, and of the congested, vice-sodden slums of our great cities are equally deserving of that honorable name. Missions in its broadest sense is presented, and the young people are given a wide choice in their selection of a vocation.

A Southern gentleman was once questioning rather jocularly an old negro who had recently become converted. "Well, Sam," he remarked with a smile, "I should like to share your joy and assurance; but you see I have never become convinced that I am among the elect." The old negro thought for a moment and then replied, "Maybe, Marse Tom, but I don't member anybody's bein' 'lected what wasn't a candidate."

However much we may regret the fact, it is true that in our own Methodist Protestant Church there are hundreds of precious young lives that have never had the gospel presented to them in such a way as to arouse in them a desire to consecrate their lives to Christian service. They haven't become candidates for work in God's vineyard because they have never been trained to hear the call of God. Should we not then give them the opportunity of having the different phases of Christian work presented to them while they are plastic and receptive and ready to be developed and perfected? That is one reason why each year the young people of our beloved Methodist Protestant Church are called together in conference that they may get inspiration as well as vision.

To those who have already chosen their life's work the Young People's Summer Conference is of inestimable value. Some are facing financial situations that tend to make them give up the thoughts of being ministers or missionaries, and going into the business world to make money. Such problems presented and discussed by the young people in their group meetings are happily solved, and the candidates are encouraged to forge ahead even if the battle is hard. Another feature of the program is the presentation and discussion of the many and varied phases of Christian work. Each phase, with its virtues and disadvantages, is taken up in detail and men and women of wide experience give counsel and guidance.

It has been said that when a young man comes to another as counsellor and sincerely asks advice about his life work, the spot where those two men stand is holy ground. I wonder if that is not the reason why when the word "Weaverville" is spoken, all Methodist Protestant young people smile and look happy, for many life decisions have been made at Weaverville and the place is held dear in the hearts of the young people. This year we are hoping the number of Life Work Recruits will be doubled, and the name, High Point College, will in the future hold an even warmer place in the hearts of the young people because it is the college of our own denomination and our own conference.

CLEAR THE DECKS!

We are now approaching the close of the fiscal year of the Board of Home Missions in the Methodist Protestant Church. April 30 is "settlement day" with the board, and May 1 is our "New Year."

In "taking stock" preparatory to submitting our annual reports to the board at the annual meeting to be held in Indianapolis on May 13, we find many very encouraging items. We find that the instructions of the board have been carried out in every particular. We find that all of the missions under the care of the board have been continuously supplied with pastors, except First Church, Seattle, Washington, which has been vacant since April 1, 1925. Plans are under way which we hope will adequately provide for this field. Within the year the church at Arkport, N. Y., has completed the payment of its debt, and the appropriation made by the Board of Home Missions which was to be due and payable under certain conditions has been fully paid. Within the year, our work at Montgomery, Ala., has taken on a fine development, with rapid growth in both numbers and influence. A fine new $6,000 parsonage has been erected on a part of the church property, on which there is an indebtedness of about $3,500 to be paid by the local congregation.

Within the year, adjustments have been made at the Southfields Church, Chicago, and the appropriation arranged for to be paid in installments. Obligations of the Board of Home Missions have been placed at the service of the local congregation, and will be cared for as they mature.

Within the year, nearly one thousand new members have been added to our churches, and very substantial net gains have been reported by our pastors. Our Sunday schools are being organized upon the most approved lines, and the membership is growing in every field.

Within the year, the Harger Memorial Sunday school, in Detroit, has so completely outgrown its equipment that it seemed to be absolutely necessary to complete the building as planned. This church had worshiped in the basement unit of their permanent building for some time. Work is under way, and the walls are practically all up at the present time.

Within the year, plans have been developed which we expect soon to result in the beginning of operations on the new building enterprise at Mt. Lookout, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Within the year our work at Gordon Place, Kansas City, Kans., has grown until the new building here is almost compulsory. The work at Westheight and University churches is a quite prosperous.

Within the year, Emmanuel church, Philadelphia, Grace church, Indianapolis, Avondale Park, Chicago, and Seaview, Seattle, have developed until building plans must be developed to adequately house and properly equip for our work.

Throughout the year God has been good to us. The secretary has been kept in perfect health. The members of the board have not suffered serious affliction. Our constituent has been gracious and kind, and many special contributions and courtesies have helped make the year a blessing, and to keep our work in a prosperous condition. We cannot enumerate either our mercies, or our opportunities. Our limited space will not permit to be done.

Clear the decks for action.

Charles H. Beck

THIS IS VERY GRATIFYING.

The response to our request for the prompt return of the order cards which were sent with the samples of the 1925 Children's Day Service to our Sunday school superintendents and pastors is very encouraging.

It is being recognized that to secure the supplies at an early date makes it possible to have sufficient time for practice of the musical selections by the schools, and for rehearsal of the other features of the program, and thus be prepared to render a very creditable service.

It is hoped, therefore, that our superintendents will speedily send to me their orders for the special cards sent to them, or in any other convenient way.

It is greatly regretted that every year heretofore a great many of our Sunday school superintendents have failed to order Children's Day supplies and made no effort to hold a special service in the interest of foreign missions.

Some may hesitate because the music is new, but it is not difficult, and was specially written for this service, can be found in other publications, and the composer has had long experience in preparing such selections for Sunday schools, and knows well their needs as he is in the active work in charge of a progressive church.

Others may hesitate because the program calls for a little time and labor to train the children and young people, but that ought not to be a great tax on any one, and anything else appropriate can be used to form the program in addition to such parts of the United Board's suggested program as may be used.

But a serious matter is involved in holding a Children's Day service in every Sunday school.

It has been authorized by the General Conference as one of the agencies of the United Board, and as a part of the missionary education the churches are expected to impart to those entrusted to their care.

Nothing is plainer than that the children and youth of today will be the leaders, members, workers of the church of tomorrow, and to meet the new and enlarged opportunities and responsibilities of the future there must be a fully informed, trained, consecrated and working membership, and that can only come from present teaching and active participation in the work of the church which will tend to hold them in loyal devotion to Christ, and in unselfish service for the world's uplifting.

Furthermore, every child, every young person now holding membership in a Methodist Protestant church, or holding any relation thereto by being in any of its organizations, or sharing in its services, can justly claim the right to know what the church is, and what is its mission in the world, and to what extent it is fulfilling that mission today.

As to its operations in the heathen world, the Children's Day service is one explanation thereof, and all connected with holding a service by the Sunday schools is for the purpose of informing and enlisting the young in the work of the church.

The Sunday school that does not hold a Children's Day Service is depriving its members of what they ought to have, and of what the General Conference, through the Union Board, has provided to help each local church do its duty to the young, and it is a very serious matter for any to withhold the means of helping the young to be taught the work of the church, and enlisted therein.

Send your order for Children's Day supplies to Rev. Fred C. Klein, Berwyn, Md.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—MAY 3.

A Sound Mind in a Sound Body

Lesson Text: Dan. 1:8-17.

Golden Text: Dan. 1:8.

The Central Truth: The boy or girl, man or woman, who has a clean heart and a clean life is in line for large usefulness and high promotion in the kingdom of God.

Scriptural Points.

1. Nebuchadnezzar was a strong believer in higher learning. He wanted the best equipped men possible to whom he might entrust the affairs of government. He selected four youths out of captives from Jerusalem to train for posts of honor and responsibility.

2. He accorded them most royal treatment. The best instructors in the realm were to be their teachers. The mere pittance given the captives was replaced by royal dainties from the king's table.

3. But these royal dainties ran counter to the laws of Moses which were the rule of conduct for the Jews. The king's meat was no doubt swine's flesh and strictly forbidden by the precepts given from Mt. Sinai. The king's wine was most likely intoxicating, and therefore wrong and sinful.

4. Daniel, along with his three companions, determined in his heart that he would not violate the law of his God, defile his body, and outrage his conscience by partaking of the king's meat and wine. And he requested that he might be excused from partaking of them.

5. In response to his noble resolve and conscientious courage "God had brought Daniel into favor and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs." It is one of Solomon's wise sayings: "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him."

6. The prince of the eunuchs was afraid to yield to Daniel's request. He feared that his charges could not thrive so well on any other diet. And he trembled for his own life if Daniel and his companions should lose in flesh and good looks by the change. He couldn't understand that anything could be so good for them as the king's meat and drink.

7. Daniel proposed a ten days' test: Let him and his three friends live on a vegetable diet, while the rest of the student body partook of the king's allowance. And to this Melzar agreed. And the test proved entirely satisfactory. These four gained more in flesh, had fairer complexions, and their general appearance was more attractive than that of those who partook of the king's meat and drink. And these four valiant youths were allowed to subsist upon a permanent diet of pulse and water.

8. The change in their acquisition of knowledge was even more marked than it was in their physical condition. Their healthy vigorous bodies enabled their minds to become clearer, more receptive, and more vigorous. And God helped them in their studies, and gave them a grip on the subjects being taught beyond their natural capacity.

9. And Daniel was specially favored of the Most High, because he was the leader of this group of boys. He was endowed with the gift of prophecy. The secrets of the mind of God were revealed to him.

Practical Points.

1. In every crisis of apostasy there is a remnant of faithful worshippers of Jehovah. Daniel and his companions belonged to this remnant. Their parents were doubtless also faithful to the God of heaven. They possessed such strong stamina of character as to be able to resist successfully the most attractive and powerful of evil influences. They were Israelites indeed in whom there was no guile.

2. They possessed the courage that characterizes heroes of the first class. They maintained a whiteness of soul in the midst of a maelstrom of iniquity. They stood firm when a flood-tide of unholy example and influence swept over them.

3. Their godly training stood them in good stead in this dark and trying hour. They were true and loyal sons of Abraham, of whom God had testified: "For I know him that he will command his children and household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him."

4. A holy, unflinching purpose is half the battle in every conflict with the powers of darkness. All omnipotence sides with the man who takes an immovable stand with God. "They that be with us are more than they that be with them."

5. A future of large usefulness is guaranteed to all who take a bold stand for the right. Such are enlisted to fight the battles of the Lord, to rescue the perishing, and to impart momentum to the progress of the kingdom of God. By the co-operation of such, "Our God is marching on."—The Word of Life.

—Truth needs no color, beauty no paint.

SERVICE THE MEASURE OF SUCCESS.

It isn't the cut of the clothes that you wear,
Nor the stuff out of which they are made,
Though chosen with taste and fastidious care,
And it isn't the price that you paid;
It isn't the size of your pile in the bank,
Nor the number of acres you own,
It isn't a question of prestige or rank,
Nor of sinew and muscle and bone;
It isn't the servants that come at your call,
It isn't the things you possess,
Whether many, or little—or nothing at all
It's service that measures success.

It isn't a question of name, or of length
Of an ancestral pedigree,
Nor a question of mental vigor and strength,
Nor a question of social degree;
It isn't a question of city or town,
Nor a question of doctrine or creed,
It isn't a question of fame or renown,
Nor a question of valorous deed;
But he who makes somebody happy each day,
And he who gives heed to distress,
Will find satisfaction the richest of pay,
For it's service that measures success.

—The Cave Scout, Boy's Life.

THE DEDICATED LIFE.

We can say "Thy will be done" without fear. I went one night to a near-by city to hear an address on consecration. No special message came to me from it. But as the speaker kneeled to pray, he dropped this sentence, "O Lord, thou knowest we can trust the Man that died for us." And that was my message. I rose and walked down street to take the train. As I walked I pondered deeply all that consecration might mean to my life, and—I was afraid. And then, above the noise and clatter of the street traffic, came to me the message, "You can trust the Man that died for you." I got into the train to ride homeward. As I rode I thought of the changes, the sacrifices, the disappointments which consecration might mean to me, and—I was afraid. And then again, above the roar of the train and the hubbub of voices, came the message, "You can trust the Man that died for you." I reached home and sought my room. There upon my knees I saw my past life. I had been a Christian, an officer in the church and a Sunday school superintendent for years, but had never definitely yielded my life to God. Yet as I thought of the darling plans which might be baffled, of the cherished hopes to be surrendered and the chosen profession which I might be called upon to abandon—I was afraid. I did not see the better things God had for me. So my soul was thinking back. And then, for the last time, with a swift rush of convicting power, came again to my innermost heart that searching message: "My child, my child, you can trust the Man that died for you. If you cannot trust him, whom can you trust?" And that settled it for me. For in a flash I saw that he who so loved me as to die for me could be absolutely trusted with all the concerns of the life he had saved.

Friend, you can trust the Man that died for you. You can trust him to lead you in the path which is the very best in this world for you. You can trust him to baffle no plan which is not best to be foiled, and to carry out every one which is for God's glory and your highest good. You can trust him to ask no obedience which will not end in highest blessing both for your life and the kingdom of God.—James H. McConkey in the Dedicated Life.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES FOR SUNDAY, MAY 10.

Where and How Should We Spend Sunday? Daily Readings.

- Mon. Sunday as rest-day. Exod. 31:12-17.
 Tues. Sunday as worship-day. Rev. 1:10.
 Wed. Sunday as Bible-day. Ps. 42:1-11.
 Thurs. Sunday as praise-day. Ps. 92:1-8.
 Fri. Sunday as service-day. Matt. 12:1-13.
 Sat. Sunday as fellowship-day. 1 Cor. 11:23-34.

First of all the Sabbath is a day of worship, and every child of God should spend a part of the day in worshiping the great God who made us all.

We go to places which attract us. What attraction has the church? (v. 1). If there is no attraction in the church and its services for us we are getting on dangerous ground.

Sunday is not to be a day of idleness, though we should rest that day from our ordinary occupation. It should be a day of service for those who need us, as well as a day of worship.

Jesus expects us to be sensible in our understanding of His day and its use; but He also expects us to be Christian. He set a splendid example for us in His observance of the Sabbath day, under the old dispensation; and we, under the new dispensation, should be interested in making the day mean the very most possible to our lives and to the lives of others. If we do as we know Jesus expects us to do, upon His holy Sabbath day, we will help others to do likewise. But if we are careless and indifferent about it we will influence others wrongly. It is well to spend a part of the day in God's out-of-doors, but nothing should take us away, or keep us away from God's house at the appointed hours for worship.

Things Taught in Our Lessons.

The Lord's Day should be a happy day. People should be glad to go to God's house. Within the gates of the temple is the very best place for our feet on Sunday. Our faces should be lighted up with the divine radiance as we meet with others of God's children in our accustomed place of worship.

Giving thanks in the Lord's house on the Lord's day should be natural. The soul which once understands prayer in this respect, and the possibilities of worship when meeting with others in the church, can never be satisfied otherwise. Our souls are made for God, and we can never keep them true to Him unless we use a great part of each Lord's Day for worship in service in His name.

Proper observance of Sunday in worship and service fortifies our souls for the tasks of the week. We need the spiritual strength the day gives us, when used in such a way as to win the Master's approval.

Heb. 10:25. Neglect is the first law of death. Spiritual death comes on apace when Christians begin to neglect the assembling of themselves together in the Lord's house.

Every ounce of our influence, as Christians, should be turned in the direction of strengthening our own souls and the souls of others, through proper assembling on this day of all days.

Every Day Lessons.

From the very beginning the Lord set apart one day in seven for rest and worship because it was necessary.

It is fundamental in the constitution of the universe; it is necessary to the well-being of mankind, physically, mentally and spiritually; and it is vital to the spiritual ongoing of society in general. Had it not been necessary God would never have planned the Sabbath.

Business is the supreme thing with most men all the week, and they need the Sabbath that they may turn their minds in the higher things in life for one day in the week at least.

Sunday should be a day of rest. A day of turning entirely from the ordinary affairs of life which claim our attention on other days. God's day is a fine time for godly deeds. On this day we find it possible to put our profession into practice by doing deeds of mercy. Going to church, visiting the sick and the shut-ins, praying with those who are spiritually distressed, and going out of our way to help those in need, are among the blessed privileges of the Lord's Day.

Where we spend Sunday and how we spend Sunday is at bottom a question of heart desire. Folks generally do those things which they really want to do. We must really desire to worship and serve our Master on that day, or we will do it to no good purpose.

Christianity must stand firmly for the Lord's day, or it will never be restored to its original and proper use. Our country is declining rapidly from the right spirit in the observance of Sunday, and she will pay the price in decadence and ruin, as have other nations, if there is not a turning back to proper Sabbath observance.

Christian Endeavor has always stood foursquare for the proper observance of the Sabbath. If we can train our young folks to proper Sunday observance, we need not worry about the future of our country.

Things to Pray About.

1. Thank God for His one day's rest in seven.
2. Thank God for the growth in spirituality, which one day set apart for His worship and service makes possible.
3. Thank God for all of that which brings us back to our best selves on the Sabbath day.
4. Ask God to help each of us to properly observe the Sabbath.
5. Ask God to bless us while we study this vital topic.
6. Ask God to help each of us to banish from our lives habits which tend to tear down the good use of the Sabbath.

Other Gifts.

Belk-Stephens Co. of High Point donated .80 or more pieces of underwear to the Home.

On yesterday six children of the Home joined the first M. P. Church at High Point. Their names are as follows: Annie Mae Dawkins, Virginia Beam, Mary Crickmore, George Crickmore, Charlie Crickmore, Howard Bird.

Howard and Herbert Garmon of Charlotte, who had been on the waiting list for some time, were added to the Home last week. Additions to the Home call for weeks in collections. Thank you one and all.

E. G. Lowdermilk, Superintendent.

Shelby.—Our revival meeting began Sunday, April 19, and will close about May 1. Rev. C. E. Phillips has been preaching very effective sermons and the services have been largely attended. A more complete account of the meeting will appear in the Herald next week.

The writer preached in our Lincolnton church last Sunday night for Brother Phillips, who was at the Shelby church. We enjoyed a visit in Brother Phillips' home and spent the night with him and his family.

C. B. Way, Pastor.

State Street, Lexington.—Our revival closed Friday night, April 24. Brother Gerringer did fine work. His preaching was of a fine order throughout. Our people appreciate his faithfulness. Numbers from other denominations attended. The pastors from the other churches showed their interest by being present. The bulletin boards of the Presbyterian and M. E. churches were used freely in advertising our services. And this was done without our request, too. There seems to be an unusual spirit of co-operation here among the churches. Brother Gerringer remarked that he had never had as many pastors to attend in any meeting he had ever assisted in before. This is as it should be for where the Spirit of the Lord is there is unity.

The Lord was with us in power in these services, as was shown by the saving of quite a number of souls. There were about thirty in all. We have received eighteen so far and we have the names of five others to join and still others are talking of coming.

Our little band here were in high spirits Sunday morning when all who had given their names to join our church that were present were taken in at one time. All were received on profession of faith except three. It was an encouraging service to our folks, for most of them have labored hard to build up the church. In fact, all who attend may be counted as faithful laborers.

Our Sunday school reached high water mark yesterday, as there were eight present and a new class for junior girls was organized. The same for boys will be started soon. We praise the Lord for all the good done and for the promise of future usefulness for this organization. We only lack three now of doubling our membership this year and when we take in all that have given their names we will have more than done that. Most of them are children, but there are eight grown people among the number received. Please pray for us, we need your prayers. Sincerely,

N. G. Bethea.

Calvary News.—The work is still making good progress at the Calvary church in Greensboro. On Easter Sunday fourteen were received into church membership, two by certificate and the others on profession of faith. Last Sunday three more were received on profession. This makes a total of 22 that have been received since the charter membership list was completed. All who united with Calvary up to and including our formal opening the third Sunday in January were counted as charter members.

Brother Bethea preached the plain gospel truth during the two weeks he was here and the people appreciated his work among us. They showed their appreciation not only with their presence at the services but with a check for $75 when he was ready to leave. To say that Brother Bethea is a good gospel preacher would only be saying what most of those who read this already know, for there are not many churches in our conference where Brother Bethea has not held meetings.

Another fine gift came our way last Sunday. Mrs. Riddick, daughter of the late Rev. J. R. Ball, presented Calvary church with a silver baptismal bowl. The inscription on the bowl reads, "Presented to Calvary M. P.

Church, in Memory of Rev. J. R. Ball, by His Daughter Pattie." Mrs. Riddick has the sincere thanks of the Calvary church for this beautiful gift.

The Sick.

Quite a number of our people have been sick recently. Mrs. J. A. Cox, Mrs. M. H. Greer, and Mrs. Haynes have recently returned from the hospital, where they underwent operations. We understand that all three are regaining their health. Brother W. T. Jennings had his tonsils removed yesterday. He is doing nicely. Mrs. A. E. Causey, who has been ill for several days, is improving.

The Sunday school is still on the increase. We now have fifteen classes. We are exceedingly fortunate in having as much good teaching material as we have. I think we have more than the average church the size of ours. The Easter program given Easter Sunday evening at eight o'clock was one of the very best I have heard in years. We had set as our goal for an offering $50 but went far beyond that. The offering was $70.

Our budgets are almost paid. We owe only $16 on annual conference budget and $25 on the general. However, we do not feel that we are on flowery beds of ease financially. There are a number of outstanding obligations that will come due in time that must be met. We realize that we have a good sized job here at Calvary. And yet I have heard not a word of complaint. The members are shouldering their obligations right manfully.

Since our last reporting the pastor and family have been substantially remembered by a number of our people. Mrs. J. H. Coble on two occasions remembered us with various articles, such as four dozen eggs, two hens, preserves, jellies, laces, handkerchiefs, and other dry goods, Mrs. J. F. Williams, dozen and a half eggs, Dr. J. F. McCulloch, potatoes, Mrs. T. F. McCulloch, dozen eggs, H. I. Brooks fish, Henry Hunter $1.60 worth of groceries, Mrs. W. G. Coble two dozen eggs, Mrs. W. F. Medearis cake on two occasions and four quarts of vegetables, Mr. W. F. Medearis $5 cash, Mrs. L. W. Jobe a cake. And the largest donation we have had I believe I have not mentioned in writing to the Herald. The pastor was given enough of the old lumber that came out of the old Grace church to frame and floor his garage. This was, of course, a gift from the Calvary church. Brother A. E. Causey also gave me $5 off of his bill for labor in building the garage. We appreciate all these remembrances. And if any one has been left out it was not intended. We thank you all.

The thing that the pastor appreciates most of all is the fine spirit of co-operation and of appreciation. Not only do the members co-operate with the pastor but they seem to be able to work with one another without much friction.

The pastor appreciates the good work being done by our publicity man, A. C. Dixon. It pays to keep the work of the church before the people through the medium of the newspapers. No preacher with religion and the right spirit wants himself advertised but he does like for the public to know what the church is doing. L. W. Gerringer, Pastor.

April 29.

DREADING AND WORKING.

Dreading is harder work than working. A little girl learned this lesson. Her mother had told her she must pick the pods from a row of peas in the garden the next day.

"O, mother," cried Martha, "all those dreadful peas?"

"There are not many. Only the ones I have left to dry for seed," answered her mother.

"But I do hate to pick peas. It is so tedious," grumbled Martha.

She thought of the morrow's task the last thing before falling asleep, and the first thing next morning, and the thought made her miserable.

"Why don't you pick them and be done with it?" asked her brother who heard her complaining about them. But no, Martha dreaded her work so much that she put it off as long as possible. She didn't pick the peas, and yet the knowledge that she had to do it kept her from enjoying anything else she tried to do the whole morning through.

In the afternoon her uncle drove up in his car and asked if Martha might go for a ride with him.

"O mother, may I go?" cried the little girl.

"Yes, if you have gathered the peas," said her mother.

"Please let me go, and I will gather them as soon as I come back," begged Martha.

But Martha's mother felt that her little daughter needed a lesson, so she said:

"No, dear," and Uncle Fred drive away alone.

"I might just as well pick the mean old things now that they have spoiled my whole day," Martha said to herself.

She was surprised to find that there was only a small handful of them, and felt a bit ashamed when she carried them to her mother.

"Martha, it has just taken you 15 minutes by the clock to do the task which you have been dreading and putting off for more than 15 hours," said her mother.

"Yes, and I missed a ride, and I am just as tired as I can be besides. Why, mother, I believe dreading to work is the hardest work there is," said Martha. Which was a very wise remark, and a true statement even if it was only a little girl who made it.—Selected.

BINGO'S BIT.

Bingo was not handsome; he was not a dog one would pick out as being good to look upon. No, that certainly was not the reason why John Kelly paused unseen by the roadside one beautiful spring morning to watch Bingo as he played with Mistress Marjory among the daisies and buttercups under the shade of the newly-leaved apple trees.

Marjorie tied her doll's cap on Bingo; then she put a sweater over his head while Bingo patiently held up first one front paw, then the other, for Marjorie to slip through the arm holes. It was a green slip-over sweater, one which Marjory had knit herself. She placed a basket in his mouth saying, "Bingo, go get some food for my children, they are hungry."

John Kelly leaned over the fence to see what would happen. Off trotted Bingo, straight in the direction of the kitchen, up went one paw to scratch the door, which was opened from within; then Bingo disappeared. In a minute he walked carefully from the kitchen, still carrying the basket; slowly he approached Marjory, who took the basket from his mouth while she said: "Good old fellow! Good Bingo! You shall have a cookie!" From the basket Marjory took a paper napkin filled with fresh cookies and a bottle of cool milk. As she began to set the dollies' table she was startled by a voice saying: "Would Bingo care to enlist and go into training for his country? He seems a fine fellow. Just the kind we need to help win the war!"

Marjory looked hard at John Kelly, wondering who this strange man could be. Where had he come from? Could he, by chance, be poking fun at her? Whoever heard of a dog going to war?

John Kelly swung his legs over the fence and sat down near Marjory, taking one of her dolls on his knee while he smoothed its glossy, golden curls. Marjory decided John Kelly was all right, that he was not laughing; so she asked politely, "Will you have a cup of tea?"

John Kelly replied: "I am hungry; I would enjoy one very much."

Marjory and Bingo never knew just how it happened, but quicker than I can tell every one was having a perfectly beautiful time. John Kelly sipped his milk from the tiny cup. Bingo passed the basket of cookies.

John Kelly and Marjory talked of dolls, of parties, of horses, of war, of everything. At length John Kelly repeated his strange question: "Would Bingo care to enlist? Would you approve of his going over to do his bit?"

"My brother Dick has gone over to fight, but how could Bingo go? How could Bingo help?"

Then John Kelly told Marjory he was looking for dogs like Bingo; dogs who would fetch and carry and do what they were taught to do quickly, without fussing. John Kelly said that Bingo already knew more than many people, for he obeyed without stopping to think why.

Marjory began to understand, and when mother came out to see what all the talk was about she joined Marjory in giving her consent, for as Mrs. Mullen said, "I've let my boy go, I guess my little girl's not the one to keep her Bingo home if he can help win the war!"

So after some good-by hugs, some whispered secrets, some smiles and some tears, behind the barn, Bingo walked forth from the old, white clinking gate. Just then the sun went behind a cloud and of a sudden the daisies and buttercups looked cold and very lonely. Mother asked Marjory to come in and help hull the first strawberries of the season. But for some reason Marjory did not sample one single strawberry as she dropped them one by one into the big glass dish.

Over there in France, brother Dick was busy doing his bit; doing it along with all the other brave boys. At first everything went well, but there came a day when bullets and things grew pretty thick and as brother Dick started to wade through some deep mud something hit him in the shoulder and down he went. After a time brother Dick dreamed a strange, strange dream. He dreamed he was home again; that war was all over! that everything was all right. He dreamed he was in his own soft bed, just a little tired, and having a good rest. He dreamed Bingo came to his bed and licked his face and hands.

Without opening his eyes, brother Dick whispered: "Faithful friend—home again! Home again!" Then, in his dream the licking ceased and his cap was gently lifted from his head. But Dick was so tired he kept right on sleeping.

And when he woke he wasn't at home! He was in a hospital tent just back of the firing line. A white-capped nurse was whispering: "We don't allow the Red Cross dogs in here, but I can't seem to do a thing with this one. He won't move! Look at him! Ever since they followed him to find the owner of the cap which he brought back to camp, no one can make him mind! Up till now he has been our best helper. No dog has been more intelligent or tireless than Bingo; but there he sits without eating or sleeping, just looking at that soldier boy!"

"Bingo! Bingo!" echoed a sleepy, faraway voice.

A loud bark answered and before the nurse could stop him two paws flopped on the spotless white cot bed and Bingo's head rested lovingly on brother Dick's good shoulder. When brother Dick opened his eyes he thought he must be very ill; he called for the head nurse but held Bingo close while he waited. When she came Dick said: "I thought I was over there in France fighting, but here's Bingo, my little sister's dog and"—But Bingo interrupted again with three sharp barks! He looked straight in brother Dick's eyes, trying to explain how Marjory had whispered to him behind the barn at home to "Go find Dickie! Go find our Dickie!"

No one seemed to know much about it at John Kelly was not there to tell, but after while a much delayed letter came telling about the tea party, about John Kelly and about Bingo's going. At the same time Marjorie sat under the apple trees reading a letter from brother Dick telling all about Bingo's bit, telling how he had really saved his brother's life; for only a few hours after the finding of the cap the Germans had taken the very place where brother Dick had been found.—Exchange.

THE TWIN'S LUCKY DAY.

By Daisy D. Stephenson.

"I don't care. It's a nice garden, if it's ours!" Jack declared, with one fist doubled up, ready to fight any one who disputed the plain fact.

"Course," said Jill, calmly. Her name had been truly Jane Louise a misty decade back and her twin's name was John Gilbert, but they had achieved their nickname in the toddler days. They were always together sharing everything, whether it was nibbling a lolly-pop or lugging a pail of water. Being a sensible pair, this Jack and Jill never stubbed toes and broke crowns. Naturally their garden plots were side by side. The posy plot was Jack's, and the vegetable row belonged to Jill, who was thought to have even more gumption than Jack.

Jill had counted on getting quite rich off the garden, and she would not accept defeat without a fight. She sat at the end of the radish row now, chewing a grass blade and scuffing a sandaled toe. She eyed soberly the little wagon heaped high with tempting array of crisp lettuce, rosy radishes, and fresh onions that fairly cried to be made into a salad.

"Course it's a fine garden," she told Jack, rather scornfully, as if asserting the fact merely gilded the lily. "It ought to be, with us working our arms off, weeding, and watering, and chasing hoppers! Mummy says we know every radish by name. And now," Jill's eyes were stony, "we can't sell anything except to Mummy! Everybody out here had to go and have a garden this year!"

"Looks like it," agreed Jack, gloomily, taking grim pleasure in turning the hose on an impudent grasshopper that dared trespass on their property. "Looks like we'd have to eat our garden ourselves, and smell it. Isn't this a beauty bunch of sweet peas, Jill? Same color as violets. I'll give a lot to Auntie James. She can't buy them, but she'll lie there in bed and love 'em all day."

Jill nodded, yanked on her pink bonnet and made ready for another hopeless trip about the neighborhood. "And I'm going to give some of my nicest veg-tubbles to Mrs. Watkins. She's so busy ironing and—and s'porting those four little stair-steps, she can't raise anything else, she says. If we can't make money off our garden, I guess we'll give it away to 'preciative folks, anyway." She stopped a minute to pick a four-leaf clover and tuck it into her worn sandal.

To their pleased surprise, luck seemed to change immediately. There was young Dr. Fields just starting out to make morning calls, and he greeted the twins warmly. "Hello, there, you J's! If you aren't the twinniest twins I ever saw! And so healthy I never get to dose you the year around. How much for those gorgeous sweet peas? Can you spare me a bunch for a little girl who can't run around on her own feet all summer?"

"Oh!" Jill's eyes were sweet with sympathy. "Take her half of them. Give him that pinky bunch, Jack! They are fairy bonnets, tell her."

"No, you don't," declared the doctor. "This is my treat, and it's lucky for me you cheered up the scenery right now. Only a quarter, sure? Dirt cheap. Pop around often, won't you? Mother needs green stuff once in a while. I'm too lazy to garden and she's too rheumatizy."

"We will! Thanks, Doctor!" came the delighted reply as he drove off with a wave of his hand.

"There now; maybe we'll sell things and not half try," Jill said hopefully as they trotted ahead in the hot sun. But house after house was well supplied, and the gardeners halted in a little park that separated the modest suburb from the avenue along which towered mansions that always reminded Jill of castles and fair princesses.

"Let's walk down that way and see the wistaria vine on that pagoda," urged Jill. She meant "perzola," but Jack didn't know the difference.

"Oh, look! Isn't she lovely? Just like Princess Gloria in my new book!" whispered Jill, stopping in her tracks as a slim young woman, all in white, came out of a big house and hurried out to a waiting closed car. She drove away, with Jill's eyes following her in admiration, but Jack, with an exclamation, darted across the street to the curb.

"Look, Jill!" He raced back with awe on his freckled face and a beaded bag in his hand. "She dropped it as she got in." As his adviser remained speechless, he urged, "What'll we do?"

"Why, take it back, of course!" said Jill, promptly. "I'm not scared to bang the knocker and tell the maid. Oh, maybe we'll see a real live butler!" Jill's eyes sparkled. They were having a regular adventure, and she forgot the discouraged little waiting wagon of unsold produce.

"You do the talking," said Jack uneasily. "It's easier for girls."

Off started the children, Jack clutching the bag, Jill rehearsing what she should tell the "butler." But as it happened, they had not quite reached the massive gate when a car rolled swiftly to the curb and the lovely white lady called to them eagerly: "Oh, you dears! You found it, didn't you? She leaned out, and her smile fairly dazzled them.

"Yes'm. Jack found it and we were going right up to return it," Jill smiled back. This was even better than the butler!

"I'm such a careless person," sighed the young lady confidentially. She took the bag and opened it. "I missed it at once, for I stopped at a florist's. I had tucked in some jewelry that needed repairing, so you see you have done me a great favor, and I want to reward you." She held out a crisp green bill, but to her surprise the twins shied as if it were a six-shooter.

"Oh, no! We couldn't!" gasped Jack, though his eyes bulged at the wonderful "V" on the bill.

"We didn't do anything" (Jill shook her blond bob) "but just be honest."

The lady's blue eyes were shining sapphires. "Just be honest!" she echoed softly, but she put the bill back and studied the twins thoughtfully. Then she glanced across at the waiting wagon and put one and two together. In a businesslike way she inquired: "What have you in your wagon, Let me guess! Nice, fresh garden things! No, that wasn't fair!" She bubbled over. "I saw the tail of a radish wiggle. And don't I smell sweet peas?"

The twins beamed, and Jack had the wagon on the spot in a jiffy, and displayed the contents.

"Oh, it makes me hungry just to look! And how lucky that I came back! Why, those posies are much finer than the florists!" declared this wonderful modern fairy godmother. "I'll take them all, please. I was on my way to see some kiddies at the hospital."

In a daze Jack handed her the dainty masses of fairy bonnets, pink and violet and snow-white. There were starry daisies, too, gay phlox, and sweet alyssum. "Now if you'll come with me to interview Cook Katie, we'll see if she doesn't want these nice vegetables. You see, we just moved here and have no garden this summer."

Jill took one long breath and flashed Jack an eloquent glance. Here was that rare and unlooked-for goal—a gardenless house! Cook Katie did need vegetables, it turned out. The twins felt they had almost saved her life as they skipped away, the empty wagon rattling merrily behind them.

"Goody, goody, grand! Veg'tubbles every day all summer!" sang Jill to a little home-made tune. "We're rich, Jack! We can buy our own school clothes and get Mummy a birthday present." So this Jack and Jill skipped down a hill to tell it all to Mother. "Do you s'pose the four-leaf really brought us luck?" asked Jill, earnestly.

Her mother hugged her tight. "There was a good deal more to it than the clover," said Mother, with happy eyes.—Exchange.

WORKING TOGETHER.

One very cold winter night old Northwind and Little Jack Frost had a long talk, and I happened to overhear them.

Northwind called Jack Frost to see a snow-drift which he had blown into a fence corner, and it certainly was a beautiful snow-drift, although Jack Frost turned up his nose and laughed, saying, "I can make just as pretty things; just watch me!"

Northwind decided to see what Jack Frost could do, so he wrapped his cloak about him and went to see Jack Frost work in a pond not far away.

As they flew on and on, Jack Frost peeped in a window, and saw a little boy sleeping. "Let's do something for Jackie Boy," whispered Jack Frost.

"We will!" shouted Northwind, and soon they were hard at work, Northwind puffing little flakes of snow against the window pane, while Jack Frost fastened them on, and at the same time drew pictures of trees on the outside. Then Jack Frost hurriedly tasted the water in Jackie Boy's silver cup, which turned the water into ice, and crept out of the key-hole.

When Northwind and Jack Frost passed a tiny pond, old Northwind fairly held his breath a moment with delight; then he, being older, said, "Let's work together this winter."

"Agreed," laughed Jack Frost. "Will you ripple the top of this water while I freeze it?"

"That I will," answered old Northwind.

As Northwind and Jack Frost were going home next morning they saw Jackie Boy looking at the pretty pictures on his window. They tried to talk to him, but they rattled the window so noisily that Jackie Boy ran away to sit by the fire.

After breakfast Jackie Boy begged to go outside, and Jack Frost and Northwind were waiting to play with him. One pinched his nose and the other blew off his hat.

When he went in the house his cheeks were as red as roses and his fingers as purple as Jack Frost could make them; and he said to his mother, "I guess Jack Frost and Northwind do their work so well because they work together."—Iowa Story Teller.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

High Point.—Last Sunday morning, April 26, the handsome new First Methodist Protestant church at the corner of North Main and Richardson streets was formally opened for worship. Since the first of January services have been held in the Sunday school assembly room, but Sunday morning marked the opening of the auditorium proper for the first time. The services were conducted by the Pastor, Rev. Dr. Geo. R. Brown, and Rev. Dr. Thomas H. Lewis, president of the General Conference, delivered the sermon. On this happy occasion there were present the following former pastors: Rev. J. S. Williams of Asheville, Dr. C. L. Whitaker of High Point College, and Dr. A. G. Dixon, president of the North Carolina Conference. In addition to these Dr. R. M. Andrews, president of High Point College, Rev. Paul S. Kennett and Dean N. M. Harrison of the College; were seated in the pulpit. Owing to the illness of the organist, Mrs. Minnie P. Harrell, the music was directed by Mrs. R. M. Andrews, wife of President Andrews of the College, and Miss McIntyre of the music department of the College played on the splendid pipe organ. A select choir of 22 voices rendered the anthems.

The order of services for the day was as follows:

Morning service, 11 o'clock: Organ Prelude. Doxology. Invocation. Anthem, by Choir. Hymn No. 192. Responsive Reading, Selection No. 20. Gloria Patri. Scripture Lesson. Hymn, No. 407. Offering. Anthem by Choir. Announcements. Sermon, by Dr. T. H. Lewis, D.D., LL.D., President General Conference. Hymn, No. 418. Benediction.

Evening service, 7:45 o'clock: Organ Prelude. Hymn, No. 15. Prayer. Scripture Lesson. Hymn, No. 401. Offering. Anthem by Choir. Announcements. Sermon, by Rev. A. G. Dixon, D.D., President North Carolina Conference. Hymn, No. 403. Benediction.

The day was beautiful and auspicious, and at the morning service every available seat in the main auditorium and the spacious gallery was occupied, the audience numbering approximately 1,000. At the close of the eloquent sermon by Rev. Dr. Lewis, 31 persons presented themselves for membership, some on confession of faith, others by baptism and transfer from other churches.

The church, a magnificent structure and a model of simple classic beauty, is a type of English Renaissance architecture, being built of face brick trimmed with Indiana limestone. The plans were drawn by Herbert B. Hunter, local architect, and the building was constructed by R. K. Stewart and Son, contractors of this city. The dimensions are 88 by 146 feet. Entrance to the main auditorium is made by a broad flight of steps, thence through a portico, flanked by four tall solid columns, and into a broad vestibule, the whole being surmounted by an imposing spire 100 feet in height. On either side of the portico is a porte cochere with a driveway leading to it. A very unique and handsome lantern, suspended from the top of the portico, lights the front of the building at night.

The auditorium proper is large and spacious, having a seating capacity of nearly 1,000, including the gallery, which runs the entire width of the building. The side-walls and ceiling are finished in ivory, and the overhead lights are circular and concealed, there being besides a number of wall brackets. The floor of the auditorium is covered with elegant carpet, and the pews, which are arranged in three tiers with four aisles, are of walnut finish and colonial design. The pulpit is surrounded by a beautiful balustrade of ivory surmounted by a mahogany rail. Immediately behind the pulpit is the console of the magnificent pipe organ, which was built by the Tellers-Kent company of Erie, Pa. It has two manuals with echo and chimes in the tower, and the numerous pipes are all enclosed and invisible. The organ, one of the best and most handsome in the State, is the munificent gift of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. T. Penny, in memory of their only child, a lovely little daughter Evelyn, who died three years ago. The pulpit furniture was donated by the Reitzel family as a memorial to their sainted parents, Dr. and Mrs. J. R. Reitzel. The clock in the assembly room of the Sabbath school is the gift of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Gray.

The rear of the church is three stories in height, and contains 42 rooms. On first floor is a large assembly room for the entire Sunday school, a commodious kitchen with modern equipment including an elegant kitchen cabinet, the generous gift of Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Montgomery, two smaller assembly rooms with seven Sunday school rooms adjoining each, and two mothers' rooms. On the main floor in rear of the auditorium are five large class rooms and pastor's study. On the second floor are two assembly rooms with eight class rooms opening into each, a library, and an organ room.

The First Methodist Protestant church was organized October 20, 1895, and the Sunday school was opened at the same time. The congregation built and occupied the former church on the adjoining lot, and it was used continuously with some additions and renovations until a few months ago, when it was sold to the Masonic Order. Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk, who died March 9, 1917, was the beloved first pastor, and also superintendent of the Sunday school. There were 13 charter members as follows: W. P. Pickett, J. M. Sechrest, F. M. York, J. W. Guyer, Mrs. J. J. Welch, Mrs. J. M. Sechrest, Miss Lou Pickett, Mrs. J. C. Welch, Miss May Turner, Mrs. F. M. York, Mrs. J. W. Guyer, Mrs. Tannie York Shelton, and Miss Permelia Cole. The Sunday school was organized as a union school, was held on Sunday afternoon, and the first teachers were the following: Dr. J. W. Burton, D. H. Parnell, N. W. Beeson, Miss May Turner, Mrs. J. N. Crouch, Miss Venetia Smith, Miss Nannie York, and A. J. Dodamead, nearly all of whom were members of other denominations.

Rev. Mr. Lowdermilk served as pastor from 1895 to 1900, and was succeeded by Rev. William Porter, who served three years. Rev. J. S. Williams, now of Asheville, came next and was pastor in 1903-4. During his incumbency the parsonage at 609 N. Main street was erected. Rev. C. L. Whitaker, now connected with High Point College, was pastor from 1904-6, and was followed by Rev. J. D. Williams, now of Reidsville, who remained until November, 1908, and was succeeded by Dr. A. G. Dixon, president of the North Carolina Conference, who served nearly nine years. The present incumbent, Dr. Geo. R. Brown, came here as pastor on September 9, 1917. He is a native of Stewart county, Ga., and was educated at Bowdon College, Ga., and Western Maryland College, Westminster, Md. He has held various positions of trust and honor, having been editor of West Virginia Protestant for four years, president of West Virginia Conference, associate editor of Methodist Recorder, Pittsburgh, Pa., secretary of the Board of Ministerial Education for 10 years, and has been delegate to General Conference six times. Dr. Brown is held in the highest esteem and affection by his people, besides having many friends outside his own denomination. He is prominently identified with the best interests of the city, being president of the Civitan Club and secretary of the Board of Public Welfare. During his pastorate the church has made a rapid growth. The membership now numbers 535, and the Sunday school has an average attendance of approximately 460.

The members of the building and finance committee, a most important factor in this huge task, are the following: Messrs. Geo. T. Penny, V. W. Idol, C. C. Robbins, H. A. Moffitt, J. W. Hinkle, J. S. Pickett, A. M. Rankin, Sr., J. A. Gray, S. S. Coe, J. R. Montgomery, M. P. Sechrest, W. A. Davis, R. H. Shaw, H. A. Garrett, D. E. White, J. H. Pritchard, Lewis E. Teague, A. J. Koonce, S. C. Vuncannon, S. P. Montgomery, Mrs. S. S. Coe, Mrs. J. A. Gray, and Miss Pearl Leonard.

The members of the congregation are to be congratulated sincerely upon the consummation of the hopes and dreams of many years, and this day, which witnessed the fruition of their patient toil, sweet service, and happy sacrifices, was indeed glad some and auspicious. May the Great Master, to whose honor and glory this building is erected, pour out His richest blessings on this great work.

English Street, High Point.—Our quarterly conference met Monday, 13th inst. We had a good attendance, and very encouraging reports from the pastor and superintendent of the Sunday school. Our part of the A. C. B. for the first half of the year has been paid in, and the financial condition of the church is good. The writer was examined and granted a license to preach. We are arranging a special program for Mother's Day services, and trust that it will be a day of much spiritual blessing to the entire membership of the church.

We are thankful for the new song books which were presented to the church by the Christian Endeavor society.

Welch Memorial, High Point.—We held our second quarterly conference, on Friday evening, the 17th; had good attendance of the official board. The business of the church was well looked after; everything seemed to be in perfect harmony. At the conference we decided to have a home-coming day the first Sunday in June. We are hoping to have a large attendance, all those who once lived here and worshiped with us and have since moved away are requested to come back for the home-coming day. We aim to have an interesting program, with several speakers and special music. We will have three services, 11 A. M., 2:30 P. M. and 7:30 P. M. Everybody will be invited to attend these services.

Sunday, the 19th, was a record-breaking day with us at Welch. We had 215 in Sunday school, and large congregations for preaching service, both morning and evening. We are planning to begin our special meeting the third Sunday in May. Brother J. L. Trollinger of Albemarle will be our pulpit help.

We ask an interest in the prayers of all the readers of the M. P. Herald.

T. E. Pierce, Pastor.

Pleasant Hill.—On April 20 the friends and relatives of Mrs. Lelia Alston were saddened and shocked by her sudden death. She was the widow of the late Joseph J. Alston. Since his death December 12, 1917, her life would have been often lonely, if it had not been for her faith and trust in God. So many times I have heard her say that when she was alone, or working among her flowers, she felt nearer to God, and that her trust in him was so great. She knew He was always with her, and would take care of her.

Lelia Toy Ferguson was born August 10, 1863. She was married to Joseph J. Alston of this place December 11, 1883. To this union God gave two sons. The youngest one was taken to heaven in infancy. She leaves to mourn her loss one son, Willard L. Alston, four grandchildren, of Weldon, N. C., one sister, Mrs. Rose L. Crew, two nieces and one nephew of this place, besides a number of cousins and friends. Our loss is great, but her gain is greater.

At a request made by her several years ago, Rev. J. B. O'Briant conducted the funeral service from the M. P. church here, after which her body was laid to rest by the side of her husband in the family burying ground. Brother O'Briant also conducted the funeral service of her husband eight years ago. Since that time she has esteemed him as one of her best friends.

The many and beautiful powers which covered her last resting-place showed the number of friends she had.

By One Who Loved Her.

Hollister, Halifax Charge.—We have not been heard from in some time, not because we have been idle—just almost too busy to report. Brother Spencer gave us another one of his good sermons yesterday, the fourth Sunday. His sermons will make a body feel good whether they want to or not. Mr. Spencer is doing good work.

April 17 the second quarterly conference was held at Eden, all churches represented except one. The work seems to be moving along nicely. Finance is not coming in as we would like to see it, but we are working and praying that every cent of every claim will be paid before annual conference.

Easter service was real good; children all did well. The usual offering for home missions was taken which amounted to $10. Mr. Ellington, our superintendent, gave the children an egg hunt Easter Monday which was enjoyed by all, for the grown people hid the eggs, they could not find them. Our Sunday school is getting better all the time.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society

held their April meeting in the home of Mrs. E. T. Ellington. Six new members joined, as follows: Mrs. E. T. Ellington, Mrs. W. A. Ellington, Miss Van Lee, Mrs. W. D. Wood, Mrs. E. L. Wood, Mrs. A. W. Crawley. We are glad to see those people take hold of this work. Since the mill was burned so many of our members have moved away our society had gotten very thin.

Mr. Willie Knight, who has been confined to his bed for six weeks, is able to be out again.

Mr. Spencer is having some repairing done on parsonage, which was greatly needed. Guess when his wife returns home from her daughter's she will feel like she will be going into a new home.

Our special meeting will begin fourth Sunday in August. Please pray for us. Best wishes to all.

Salem, Saxapahaw Circuit.—On last second Sunday we held our Easter service. There was a good congregation present. Our pastor, Rev. H. L. Isley, was with us and gave us a very inspiring address. Our Sunday school is progressing nicely and seems to be growing each Sunday. We are planning on having Children's Day soon. With best wishes to the Herald,

John M. Baxter, a well known citizen of North-Brook township, Lincoln county, received a second stroke of paralysis April 21, 1925. He was not able to talk any after the stroke, and only lived three or four hours. Mr. Baxter had been sick for some time, but at that time was able to walk about the house. He was fifty-seven years, nine months and five days old.

March 25, 1891, Mr. Baxter married Miss Ida Mouney, who is still living to mourn the loss of her faithful husband. Five children, two girls—Mrs. Sallie Craft and Hattie Baxter—and three boys—Earl, Boyt and R. G. Baxter—were born to this union and are still living. He has one brother, George Baxter, still living, and one sister, Mrs. Laura Self, and one brother, Charlie Baxter, deceased. Mr. Baxter's father, so well known as Uncle Tom Baxter, died November 24, 1922, and his mother July 28, 1924.

Mr. John Baxter professed faith in Christ at a camp meeting at Bess Chapel when only a boy and joined Bess Chapel M. P. church. He has been faithful to his church since that time. He was regular in attendance as long as his health would permit. Some time before his death he said that he was prepared to go when God called him.

He was loved by all who knew him. His neighbors have many good things to say about him. He always got along fine with his tenants. They have been known to move back on his place the third time. He will be greatly missed by his wife, children, friends, church and community. May God's blessing comfort those who mourn their loss, and help them to look forward to another meeting on the other shore.

The funeral was held at Bess Chapel by his pastor, assisted by Rev. C. E. Phillips, a former pastor, and Rev. Mr. Houser, pastor of Bethlehem M. E. church. The church was more than full of friends who came to show their last respect. The grave was covered with beautiful flowers. The Junior Order had charge of the service at the cemetery.

E. A. Bingham, Pastor.

Hawkins Chapel, Littleton Circuit.—We did not have preaching service at our last appointment, it being Easter. Pastor O'Briant gave way for the Easter program by the children. Under the leadership of our loyal superintendent, Mr. Baldy Green, and his faithful companion who is not only a music teacher, but a primary trainer, these with the assistance of Miss Maggie Hawkins and Misses Berryman and Bratt (public school teachers), an Easter program was demonstrated through the children that was not only pleasing but inspiring to an audience that overcrowded the church. The harmony with which the children rendered their part showed they had had excellent training, and the church feels intensely grateful for the co-operative service of all who helped with the program, and thus assist in helping the children to be of service in the church while they are young. Offering for home missions amounted to $13.

At the close of the service the pastor made a brief address regarding the spirit of Easter, after which he administered the Lord's supper, of which more of the young people partook than we have ever seen at any one time before.

The entire service was inspiring and we feel that good was accomplished, especially among our young people.

We reorganized our Christian Endeavor society today, receiving one new member. We feel encouraged and hope to make better progress this year, but there are yet many who are not loyal and we shall need so much, oh, so much prayer!

Our finance on this charge is very much behind as was reported at the second quarterly conference of April 11. Our people are passing through a grave adversity owing to the shortage of production last year, but so far our people at this place are responding loyally under adverse conditions. May God bless the work and cause it to prosper through the service of His people.

April 26.

Davidson Circuit.—The second quarterly conference met Saturday, April 25, at Pleasant Grove church. All of the churches represented and the business of the conference transacted in a spirit of harmony. The different reports showed we are making progress. The following brethren were nominated for delegate to the next annual conference: Ransley Surratt of Pleasant Grove church, Ed. S. Morris of Lineberry church. Either of these brethren will make a good representative.

Lineberry church is going to have a Children's Day exercise first Sunday in June. I am asking the other churches on this charge to fall in line and arrange for a Children's Day exercise during the month of June.

I have just closed a singing at Lineberry church and the subscription, which amounted to $30, was sent to Brother Taylor as part payment on our G. C. B. I think this an honorable way to raise funds, and as a result Lineberry now has a good choir and the interest is growing, about 60 per cent in Sunday school last Sunday. I gave my services free in the singing but to my surprise on last Sunday night the good people of this church handed me $5.50 as a token of appreciation for the work I had done. Thanks. I also have one now in progress at Alleghany church.

Since first quarterly meeting there has been some work done on parsonage and there is no indebtedness on it. Just a little more work will complete it, and this will be done right away. Pleasant Grove church has the amount already subscribed to recover the church and Alleghany people are going to remodel and cover their church before their special meeting in August. We are trying to plan our work well and are doing our best to work our plans. Pray that we may win souls for the Master while we labor in this field.

C. E. Ridge, Pastor.

Democrat Charge.—It has been some time since we let the readers of the Herald hear from us. There have been a few things taking place here since our last report. The driveway in to the church and parsonage has been greatly improved by filling in and widening the road. The lawn in front of the church has been leveled up, which adds much to the appearance and convenience of the grounds. The Asheville Construction Company was very kind to furnish the dirt, as we had none whatever to spare.

Quarterly Meeting.

We held our second quarterly meeting with the Terrys Fork church on Saturday before the first Sunday in April with a very good attendance. Rev. C. W. Bates was present and delivered a most helpful sermon at 11 o'clock. After partaking of one of the biggest dinners that this preacher ever saw spread at a quarterly meeting, we reassembled for the business session. The usual business of the conference was gone through with. Brother S. W. Angel and Brother Jeff D. Carter were named as delegates to the annual conference. Reports showed finances badly behind. We hope to make a better show along this line soon.

Sunday Schools.

I had the privilege of attending two of the Sunday schools today. For some reason the school at Democrat was not as large as usual, but a good interest was manifested.

The Sunday school at Mountain Valley was encouraging, 53 in attendance, most of them young people. They had discontinued their Sunday school for the winter; reorganized the fifth Sunday in March, and have been steadily growing since.

Special Meeting.

The fourth Sunday we begin a union meeting at Pensacola. The Rev. Mr. Nancy of Ball Creek will be our help from the Baptist church and Brother Fred Love of Weaver-ville will also be with us. We desire the prayers of all Christians for the success of this meeting. Yours in the Kingdom service,

L. S. Helms, Pastor.

April 20, 1925.

Bessemer City.—Our Christian Endeavor attendance is improving, and they still have prayer meeting at the homes. We want the prayer of all that we may succeed and live for Him through every day and our Christian Endeavor work grow more and we be more interested in His blessed Word. Our Christian Endeavor society seems more interested now. We are trying to do as the Master would have us to do and hope to do more for Him through prayer.

Anna Seates.

Winston-Salem.—The pastor and the local societies felt that it was a privilege as well as a pleasure to entertain the Branch Meeting of the Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Societies. Surely an annual "come-together," where we interchange interesting views and get new ideas about the work of the Kingdom of Christ, become better acquainted, form new friendships, and renew old ones, cannot but result in substantial and lasting benefit not only to the ones present but to the organizations represented.

Rev. W. A. Sunday is conducting a six weeks' evangelistic campaign in this city; it started April the 19th, and many, many thousands have already listened to the great evangelist. The Piedmont Warehouse, located on Trade street, is the place of the meeting; it has a seating capacity of something over 7,000 including the choir, which is quite too small for a Billy Sunday meeting, judging by the people turned away.

With his unusual personality, his unmatched delivery, his great knowledge of the Bible, ancient and modern history, his wonderful flow of words, coupled with his untiring efforts and forgetfulness of self, Billy Sunday grasps his hearers with his first word and holds them spell-bound until he bids them goodby in his own unique way.

Eleanor L. Orrell, Reporter.

Charlotte.—Our church has experienced one of the best revivals in the history of the church. The membership manifested a willingness unusual and the Holy Spirit attended the efforts put forth. The services began Easter Sunday and lasted for two weeks. Rev. J. D. Williams, D.D., of Reidsville did the preaching for nine days and the pastor concluded the meeting, due to Brother Williams' absence on account of his wife's illness.

The men had their separate prayer services prior to the revival, and so did the women. The people also during the meeting resorted to the prayer room half-hour before the evening services and prayed for the preacher and for the saving of the people.

Between 50 and 75 reconsecrations and confessions were made during the meeting. It was not difficult to get the unsaved to go to the altar. Twenty-seven have united with our church already, the pastor is securing certificates for three more and it is anticipated quite a large number will join the church as a result of the recent series of services.

We trust the revival has not yet closed, as the prayer service before the Sunday evening service will continue. The membership desire to continue the evangelistic efforts. There will be more news later. H. Freo Surratt.

At a small country school the scholars were having a lesson on animals. The teacher had asked a number of questions which were easily answered. At length she said:

"Why does a dog hang out his tongue when running?"

A lad who had not answered before held up his hand.

"Yes, Tommy, what is it?" she inquired.

"To balance its tail," was the reply.—New Orleans Times-Picayune.

THE MOTHER.

She never touched with skillful brush the canvas
And left a painting that the world might praise;
Or with the inspired fingers on the key-board
Sent down an echo through the length of days:
But once with eyes tear dimmed yet looking upward,
With smiling face she passed beneath the rod
Descending almost to the vale of shadows
To bring a little new-born babe from God.
She never sung a song of joy or gladness
In clear, sweet tones to make us smile or weep;
Her voice, too weak to win the world's approval,
Was only good to hush a babe to sleep;
She never penned a book whose glowing pages
Might lift us up and help us in the fight;
But day by day she sought through loving patience
To guide two little stumbling feet aright.
And yet, methinks, when at the gate of heaven
She paused—God looked up at her and smiled;
With hands outstretched His kind voice spoke a welcome
To her—the mother of a little child.

THE THINGS I LOVE.

These are the things that I love best,
These are the dreams I'll hold
Against my faintly thrilling heart
When I am old;
The color of the sky at night,
When it still throbs with sunset light;
The dawn's first gold;
The shading of the trees that turn
So scarlet, and the fires that burn
On my hearthstone—
These are the things that I love best,
That I will hold against my breast
When youth has left me, and I face
The end, alone.
The purple pansies that I plant
When early summer wakes,
The green of leafy, dew-kissed woods
When morn first breaks;
The iridescence of the sea
That creeps so far away from me;
The blue of lakes.
The wonder of a baby's eyes,
That seems to speak of paradise,
And love's first kiss—
These are the things that I love best,
That I will hold against my breast
The while I whisper, "Life itself
Was less than this!"

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Salie Surratt Smith, born June 20, 1843, died April 18, 1925. She was married to Bran- Smith at the age of 22 years. To this union were born nine children; four sons and five daughters survive her: James, George, Elard, Dockery Smith, Mrs. Nannie Loflin, Mrs. Sarah Coggin. The deceased are Mrs. Sarah Varner and Mrs. Pallie Lanier and Miss Annie Smith. Her husband preceded her to the great beyond 29 years ago. She also leaves grandchildren and five great-grandchildren, besides a host of friends and relatives. She professed faith in Christ at an early age and united with the M. P. Church at Pleasant Grove, and later moved her membership to Chapel Hill, where she lived a faithful member until death. She was faithful to the church, and loved her children and her home. She was a good woman, a good neighbor and a good mother. Every one who knew Sister Smith regarded her as an ideal Christian woman. She will be greatly missed at church, in the community, and in the home. Aunt Salie always attended Chapel Hill camp meetings, and it was an inspiration to be in her company, for she was a woman full of the Holy Ghost.

Her funeral was conducted under the arbor at Chapel Hill camp ground Sunday, April 19, 1925, P. M., by her former pastor, Rev. J. W. Lin, and the writer, in the presence of a large gathering of people. Her body was laid to rest in the grave in the church cemetery to await the resurrection morn.

May our Heavenly Father comfort all the bereaved ones in this sad hour.

By her pastor, C. E. R.

Walter Scott Crowson was born in Asheboro, Randolph county, July 22, 1846. He was the eldest son of Elisha and Eliza Crowson. He was a soldier in the Confederate army. On April 11, 1869, he was married to Miss Elizabeth Johnson near Raleigh. To this union five daughters were born. Miss Lilian left this life December 15, 1889. In her twentieth year Annie, wife of O. W. Rich, followed next on November 3, 1917. The youngest, Lucy, wife of L. F. Ross, was next taken on January 14, 1923. At this death he was heard to say he could not see why the Lord did not take him and spare Lucy to raise his sweet little children. The wife, two daughters, Mrs. M. W. Parish and Mrs. A. R. Wingham of Asheboro, and nine grandchildren, and a large host of friends are left to mourn for him, for those who knew him best loved him most. On April 13, 1925, at the age of 78 years, eight months and 21 days, his spirit went home to be with God.

He was a kind husband and father, a good citizen, a loyal and devoted member of his church. He professed faith in Christ in early childhood, and later united himself with the Methodist Protestant Church at Charlotte, and lived a consistent member until God called him to join the church triumphant. He loved his church and his pastor—he seemed like a father to me. His place is vacant in his home and in the church. We miss him, but that kind word and smile that he greeted every one with still lingers in our life and helps us still to press on. I have not words to express what his life meant to me. May God comfort the bereaved ones.

On April 14, 1925, funeral service was conducted by the writer, assisted by Rev. H. F. Fogleman of Asheboro. Representatives from the Randolph Chapter U. D. C. acted as flower bearers. Honorary pall bearers were Messrs. Winborn Andrews and Louis Sugg, Confederate veterans; active pall bearers were J. O. Redding, Earl Bulla, W. F. Redding, J. B. Humble, Wilson Free and C. L. Cranford. He was gently laid to rest in Charlotte cemetery, beneath a blanket of flowers. The many beautiful flowers and the great throng of people that gathered spoke of the high esteem in which he was held. He is gone to sleep, to awake in that Beautiful City. C. H. Hill.

THE LADY AND THE HOBO.

Miss Barelay sat by the car window looking out at the moonlight. It was wonderful moonlight. This moon must have wandered away from the tropics up to the Northern, far West country.

Miss Barelay was a school teacher from New York City. She had been teaching ten years, and naturally her nerves were somewhat impaired. So she had leave of absence for a year, and was intending to spend part of her vacation out here in a Western town, with a relative. She was nearing her objective point now, and had a sense of pleasurable anticipation of meeting her kin-folk, having a rest, and enjoying new sensations. Yes, it was all pleasant to think about. The train stopped at a station and her attention was momentarily diverted. Several women stood in a group on the platform eagerly watching the passengers who left the train at this point. A man or two joined the group, and one of them had a vaguely familiar look. But the train went on, and she turned her attention once more to the moonlit world through which they rushed.

It was late September but warm for the time of year, and for this climate. The harvests had all been gathered, the fields were bare. But under the moonlight they looked golden. Oh this moon light! It was more than light, it was a haze of enchantment covering the earth. It was a magical spell, woven by

"That radiant maiden
That mortals call the moon."
With white fire laden,

And then she was brought back to the earth with a jolt.

The conductor entered the car and on seeing her still there, he said, "Why, lady, that was your station we passed back there—why didn't you get off?"

She looked at him in perplexed bewilderment and amazement. "I did not know!—I did not understand!—What shall I do?"

"Well, I think this will be the best thing to do. We are coming to a little water tank station where this train does not usually stop. A man is there almost always, and he can walk back to your station with you. It is only a mile and you can go right up the track. But there is no light in the station, you had better go on to the next place and stop over and then wire to your folks you'll be back tomorrow."

In a few minutes, the train began to slow up, and the conductor came back hurriedly.

"We'll have to hurry up. We are late now. But it is all right. There is a light so somebody is in the station. Sorry this happened. Good luck to you, and good night, Mam." And all in a breath she found herself on the platform with the train rushing away from her, making up for lost time. She saw the dim light through the window, and hurried across to the door. It was locked. She shook it. Then she pounded upon it. Nobody came in answer to her summons. She went to the window and looked in. Silence—vacancy. And she saw, too, the trick that fair enchantress, the Lady Moon, had played her. There was a lamp hung up on the wall, one of the old, old fashioned sort, with a tin reflector behind the lamp. The moonbeams shining at a certain angle through the side window, struck the tin reflector, giving the appearance of a light in the lamp. No one was anywhere about. Utter silence, save the faint bark of a dog from some unseen farmhouse across the distant fields. A terrifying sense of loneliness came over her. A blind unreasoning terror that was rapidly growing into panic. Again she shook and beat upon that closed door. Then she called, "Hello! Hello!" and the very sound of her own voice frightened her. She hurriedly seized her traveling bag that she had dropped, and started almost on a run up the track, with hardly a sense of what she was doing, or where she wanted to go. She was only conscious of an overmastering desire to get away from that evil spot. For it was evil. There was something wicked that was real, tangible, almost like a horrible stench in the air. She had gone but a few steps when there came a rustling in the bushes that grew by the side of the track. Then they parted, and a man stepped out of them. He must have been six feet or more in height, and brawny and massive in size. His hair was shaggy, his face covered with stubble, his features moulded on the devil's own plan. His clothes were torn and ragged, and he carried a short club or cudgel in one hand. He came slowly toward her with a hideous grin on his face.

"Pleased to meet you, lady," said he, "I heard you hollering 'hello,' and I come right along. Nice bright night, ain't it? Ain't nothin' to hinder us from having a real sociable time."

The woman swayed on her feet. She thought, for a moment, her heart had ceased to beat—that she was dying. She threw her arm across her eyes to shut out the sight of that loathsome face, and a quick, intense prayer went up from her heart.

"O God! Save me from this man!"

—What was this? An enveloping sense of warmth, of tenderness of being protected, came over her. A lightness, an almost dizzy exaltation flooded her heart—Afraid? No! An invisible host of unseen celestial ones were about her. She was filled with a supernatural courage. Almost without her own volition, she took a step toward the man. In a firm, distinct, authoritative tone, she said to him,

"I am God's child, and He is taking care of me. You dare not harm me."

Then she walked past him, directly up the track without another glance in his direction. She heard him walking behind her, following her, but not coming hastily. In fact, she thought he stepped in a hesitating manner. They had gone several yards when he called to her in what she was sure was an apologetic tone,

"Lady! Oh Lady! Stop a minute, will you? I got something to tell you."

"Well, what is it," she answered, walking a little slower that he might overtake her.

"There is a lot o' the boys along here in the bushes, and it ain't safe for you to be walkin' by yerself. You'd better let me carry your bag and walk side of you so's they'll let you alone." And he took her bag and stepped to her side.

Presently the track made a little bend. As they rounded the curve they could see a fire blazing a short distance from the foot of the little embankment of the track. There were five men grouped round the fire. One was evidently so drunk he was helpless, and was sprawled on the ground, with legs and arms flung grotesquely about. Another one was not quite so bad but was able to help himself a little. The other three were sitting about the fire, and one drank from a bottle, as the two pedestrians came near. One of the men was telling something that seemed to highly entertain the others. They were laughing uproariously. Foul, filthy, obscene laughter, that was born in the pit. Even the drunken man who was not quite helpless clapped his hands clumsily in applause. When they saw the man and woman walking up the track, the three leaped to their feet and started toward them, calling out to them as they came.

"Well! If here ain't our friend ole Hank out walking with a lady!"

"Who is yer friend, Hank, ole boy? 'Tain't the Governor's lady, is it?"

"Interduce us to her, Hank. Don't be stingy."

And the man by the fire also raised himself to a half-sitting posture, and sent a stream of blistering profanity at them as his contribution to the conversation.

Miss Barelay's escort handed her bag to her, and changed his club to his right hand.

"You walk on while I settle these fool boobbs. 'Twon't take me long, an' then I'll ketch up with you." And he started down the embankment to meet the approaching men.

Miss Barelay walked calmly on, as one without fear. She held her head high and felt like one who steps in unison with the peal of golden trumpets, "played upon by the choir invisible."

She heard something of a commotion amid the knot of men she had left behind her. Loud, angry tones. Sounds of scuffling and of blows given in a masterly manner. Then there was stillness broken only by the sound of the steps of her companion walking hurriedly after her.

When he overtook her, he was breathing hard, but otherwise uninjured. He said,

"I settled them guys. Put one of 'em to sleep, an' hammered up the other two. Hope you wasn't skairt," and then he took her bag again and fell into step by her side.

They walked on in silence, for quite a distance, until another turn of the track brought them in view of the station for which they were bound. A few more steps brought them close enough to hear the voices of the people on the platform. The man stopped, then, and held out the bag to her. "Say, lady, I ain't anxious to get no closer to them folks at the station, so I think I'll go on back."

She took the bag, thanked him, and got out her purse to give him some money. He waved her aside as he said, "I don't want no money but I do want to say something before I leave.—Say, lady, I dunno what's the matter with me tonight. Mebbe I'm gettin' softnin' of the brain." And turning abruptly, he walked away. He had gone but a few steps when he called to her,

"Say! Lady! I'm sorry I frightened you tonight."

And then he was gone, out of sight, around the curve of the road.—Angele Cox, in Our Home.

THE PASSER'S SONG.

"Some birds," says John Burroughs, "passing north in the spring are provokingly silent. Every April I see the hermit thrush hopping about the woods, and in case of a sudden snowstorm seeking shelter about the outbuildings; but I never hear even a fragment of his wild silvery strain. The white-crowned sparrow also passes in silence. I see the bird for a few days about the same date each year, but he will not reveal to me his song." On the other hand, the white-throated sparrow is decidedly musical in passing, both spring and fall. He sings on his way up and down. Nearly all the warblers also sing in passing and are to be heard in orchard and grove and wood, as they pause to feed in their northward journey.

It is an interesting difference, that is not confined to birds. There is something parallel to it in the human life. Some people seem too preoccupied with the end of the quest to sing on the way there. To them the goal is everything, and the road nothing except a means to the desired end. Others, less preoccupied, scatter songs as they go. And theirs is surely the more excellent way.

Jesus apparently liked the style of the way-side—occasional, spontaneous.

"As he passed by" is the keynote of most that Jesus said or did. A woman comes to a well to draw water and that well became a shrine, and the evening hour one of tender and healing revelation. There is hardly a page of the Gospels that is not resplendent with some similar wayside word or deed. It makes one wonder whether the fine sermon at the end of the road is really the all-important thing it seems, and whether we may not be judged by some action or inaction, some word or some silence as we passed on the way.

Of this I am sure, the loveliest of all services and all songs are those of the wayside. One I saw, years ago now, is still unforgotten. In a railway compartment was a mother nursing a child in arms. Opposite to her was a woman of refinement. They were complete strangers. Yet presently that mother was opening her heart to the stranger and they communed together of the things that matter in the training of children. In a simple and most charming way, the one gave to the other high and noble thoughts, the best that refinement and goodness could give. For the time being she was completely at the service of this her sister and her first born. She told her of the Mothers' Union, and how they prayed for one another each day and what its sense of comradeship meant to many a lonely mother needing guidance and help. She wrote the address on a stamped postcard. It was beautifully done, without a touch of unctuousness or of condescension—a fragrant wayside ministry. After all, is not our cherished reserve in these ways thoroughly selfish? Are not people everywhere, in most unexpected places, hungering for some Samaritan, who not officially but just humanly can speak the helping word or do the healing deed? The world wants our songs by the wayside. And as we shall pass this way but once, let us sing as we pass.

In a village I know is a girl who sings and plays well. She has indeed no ordinary voice. Her father is an insurance agent and on Friday evenings she collects part of his round. She finds it impossible just to go in and out of those homes. The people ask her to listen as the children play, ask her how she thinks they are getting on. Then they ask her if she has just time to play and sing one piece for them. She does so, in house after house. Though pressed for time, one night, for she was going away the following day, she sang Liddell's "Abide With Me," at the request of one invalid woman. Before her next visit that woman had died, and the girl was glad she had sung, setting those so lovely words in the woman's heart. She had more joy in that song than if she had sung for a high fee. That girl, singing as she goes, has the great secret. She also knows the more excellent way.—F. C. Hoggarth, in N. Y. Advocate.

HILLS AND STRENGTH.

By Mary Joan Wheeler.

I sought to have an easy track
To greet me as I went along,
But now I find as I look back
It was those hills that made me strong.

I sought to pass those hills that rose
Before my path from day to day,
But now I find that at the close
It had been best to pass that way.

That easy road without one loss,
Without one tear, without one cross,
Could never make my heart more strong,
And so I passed the hills along.

And as I passed each hill that rose,
I found them easier toward the close,
Ah, they grew easier all along,
For then my heart had been made strong.

"RELIGIOUS EDUCATION."

When is religious education successful? It can be successful on one condition only: that it educates a regenerated soul. To offer religious education to an unsaved person is like trying to make useful citizens by sending dead men to college. There is nothing there to educate! The sad failure of much of what is called "Religious Education" today is that itaves out regeneration, or the necessity of the new birth, and attempts to substitute natural educational processes. It is strikingly significant that the journal of the Religious Education Association in its August number publishes an article on the question, "Can the Educational Method Produce a Genuine Religious Experience?" It frankly states that many leaders in the field of religious education today (and unfortunately that means chiefly Modernists), while dissatisfied with the old methods of religious training, find that the "newer plans" do not "produce spiritual results commensurate with those to which they have been accustomed." And so they are calling upon their fellow-workers to see if they can develop "vital religious experience through new experiments in religious education,"—still newer, that is, than the "modern" and "progressive" experiments that have been tried out with barren results for the past generation. There is pathos and tragedy in this frank, naive, unsophisticated confession of failure and blindness to the cause of failure. There is a text-book that solves the problem: it is God's Word. When all religious education seeks first to bring the unsaved to Christ as Savior, and then to build them up in Christ in accordance with the revealed truths of the New Testament, there will follow convincing, thrilling, satisfying results such as only God himself can bring to pass.—Sunday School Times.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—MAN VS. GOD.

Recently two men, father and son, were electrocuted for the murder of two prohibition officers, under very aggravating circumstances.

Rev. W. A. Stanbury, the pastor of an important Methodist church in Raleigh, was the spiritual adviser of these unfortunate men, and, as such, he had to witness their death. The launching of two men into eternity naturally affected his emotions to such an extent that he lost his sense of justice, being able to see only one side of the matter. Under the stress of his feelings, he wrote a letter to the Governor in which he urged a change in our laws whereby there would be the substitution of life imprisonment for the death penalty.

Our Governor, in keeping with the character of his Scotch forbears who placed the authority of God's Word above the weak sentimentality of men, gave as his opinion that the welfare of society depended upon capital punishment, which, however, he said, should be administered only in extreme cases.

Whenever a murderer is electrocuted, we have a fresh outbreak of this anti-capital punishment sentiment.

That the average man of the streets should let his feeling take the place of his reason, we are never surprised; but when a minister of the Gospel, whose training has been to interpret the Scripture and to instill a reverence for the inspired Word, ignores the plain commands of God with reference to murder, we must confess that we are surprised.

One explanation is that his sensibilities were so shocked by his unaccustomed experience, that he could only see one aspect of the case, the deliberate killing of two men, while he could not see the other side—the cold-blooded murder of two faithful officers of the law, who were doing the duty they had sworn to perform.

Our Governor has been trained to prefer the praise of God far more than the praise of men, and he remembered God's command to man when the human race began a new start, after Noah came from the ark.

That command has never been revoked, and all the reasoning of sentimental men cannot remove it from God's statute books.

It cannot be misunderstood nor reasoned away on the ground that it passed away with the other Mosaic laws, because this was given long before Moses and the ceremonial law. That law reads thus: Genesis 9:5,6: "At the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man."

"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man."

Editor Harris, of the Charlotte Observer, presents another side of the question, which is in striking contrast with the views of this expounder of God's Word. We have before this expressed our admiration for the high moral tone of the Observer's editorials. Now we commend, not only the moral tone of his editorial, but also its sanity. We quote a paragraph:

"Too many people are inclined to see only one side to the picture. Much commiseration has been manifested for the families of the executed men. What of the families of the murdered men? And what of ushering them unprepared into the great unknown? Did these murderers give their victims time to so much as say a prayer? On the other hand, the murderers had 'the benefit of the clergy.' The Scriptures were read to them and prayers were said for them. They were advantaged by every possible preparation to meet their God. They were the objects of distinguished consideration. They perished by the sword they had taken up."—Presbyterian Standard.

WHAT DO YOU READ?

This is one of the most important questions we can ask. Next to, "To what God do you pray?" What we read enters into our whole mental and moral make-up. Whether our character be sturdy, firm, and dependable; or weak, shallow, and vacillating, depends largely on what we read, or do not read. Better read nothing at all, than to read much that is written and printed these days. As has already been said, what we read enters into the whole mental and moral fiber of our being. If what we read is good and ennobling—containing high and holy ideals, by so much do these things enter into the warp and woof of our character. If what we read is light, foolish, frivolous, or untrue, so will be our character. Or if it be vicious, vile, irreverent, or irreligious, so will our moral nature be. All this has to do with an eternal, immutable law of our being that cannot be ignored or evaded.

As well attempt to take coals into one's bosom and not be burned, as to read much of the present-day literature and not suffer morally and mentally. It is light, foolish, irreverent—untrue to life, untrue to God, religion, and the Bible. It carries profanity, obscenity, and oftentimes sneers, jeers, and denunciations of the Bible, the church, and religion. We do not permit our children to associate with the profane and the vulgar, but permit them to read books, magazines, and papers, containing profanity and obscene, indecent words, insinuations and plots. Even the best of them are worldly. Many of them, if not the greater number, written by men and women of the world. Being of the world they write of the world. They are utterly incapable of writing anything to feed the spiritual man. But it is not only worldly, but much of it is interspersed, and sometimes filled, with skepticism and infidelity. Sneers and denunciations of the Bible, the church, the Christian ministry, and religion in general. Ignoring, when not openly attacking, the Bible, the sanctity of the sabbath, and the marriage relation, and every fundamental of our holy religion and our Christian civilization. It is shocking to find leading articles in our leading magazines and papers carrying the rankest infidelity and skepticism. It seems that the time has come for the boycott to be employed by the Christian people of the land. We would not permit a profane, vulgar person to enter our houses and spout out his profanity, obscenity, and infidelity—and where is the consistency in letting this same kind of filth, irreverence, and blasphemy come in quietly in books, magazines, and papers, and take up its abode? We are very much afraid of the deadly germs of tuberculosis that may be lurking in books, papers, and dark rooms. As dangerous, and as much to be dreaded and avoided as these are, the deadly germs of sin, vice, immorality, and infidelity that lurk in the most of the world's literature today, is far more deadly. The former destroys the body, the latter the soul. All this hellish, damnable poison is entering into the very moral fiber of the rising generation. And what will the harvest be? God only knows. We are going to reap as sure as effect follows cause. It is inevitable. When the young plastic mind and heart are brought under the molding influence of such skeptics, infidels, socialists as H. G. Wells, Upton Sinclair, Winston Churchill and scores and scores of others of a like kind, what can we expect but a harvest of a fearful kind? And especially when there is almost no reading of a real solid, evangelical, uplifting, ennobling kind, to help counteract this worldly, vile, skeptical kind that is being so generally devoured.

A person had better read nothing than something damaging. Better fast than to eat poison. There is plenty of good books and papers, but the majority seems to have no appetite for them. But the literature of the world and the devil is flaunted in your face at every turn. The church used to warn the young of the danger of bad literature—the dime novel, detective stories, etc., but somehow it's toned down or taking a nap, and the world and the devil are "making hay while the sun shines." There are a few devout people who read and study the Bible and religious books and papers—but they are few indeed, compared with those who do not. The schools used to have readers, like McGuffey's with high-toned, moral, religious reading in them—even extracts from the Bible, but now, matter of this kind, in school books, is about as scarce as a snow-storm in the tropics. We are becoming paganized, to say the least. We are desperately afraid of real religion in the public schools. We are desperately afraid of displeasing infidels, Jews, and Catholics. And while we are making a desperate effort to please this Godless minority, our children are being paganized, and educated for the devil.

Did you ever think what kind of men and women are feeding you and your children, through the daily press, the magazine, and the novel—the prevalent fiction of the day? Men and women of the world, to say the least—some infidels, and any and all kinds of religious perverts. Have you ever thought of this? But it is even so. What kind of character are you and your children going to produce on such diet? There are very few secular prints now that are fit for a Christian home. Nearly all of them do not scruple to use profanity in their columns—permit infidels and skeptics to "knock" the Bible, the church, and the ministry. These are patent facts, evident to every thoughtful, careful reader.

"Reading makes a full man," said Bacon, but what kind of man will he be, full of what the "world, the flesh and the devil" produce?

There is a great deal said these days about dietetics—a "balanced ration," etc., for the body; but it is far more important that the soul, the mind, the spirit, have a wholesome dietary. Who lays any stress on this? Very few. How few of the young people read real wholesome books and papers? It is stories, stories, stories, good, bad and indifferent, and after one has read what a mogul engine could pull, he is no wiser than he was before. Time wasted, to say the least. No real information gained.

People are often very careful about their horse feed, corn feed, hog feed, chicken feed, and even their dog feed, but careless, indifferent, or absolutely ignorant, as to the mental and moral food of themselves and children. We have pure food laws to protect our bodies, but where is the law to protect our children from the moral religious poison that pervades the great mass of our reading matter today? Of course we know that we have a law against obscene literature being carried in the mails. This is helpful, but in the very nature of the case cannot reach all cases. The only remedy is for parents, guardians, and teachers to examine, judge, discriminate, and throw out all books, papers, and magazines that are unfit for the home. Boycott the devil and his dirty sheets and books.

We do not want our children to use profane, obscene language, or hear it from others—then why let them read it? Why read it ourselves? Can one go among the pots and not be smutted? Can he take fire into his bosom and not be burned?

Persons who spend their sabbath, or largely so, over Mutt and Jeff, Bringing Up Father, Andy Gump, and all such worldly tomfoolery, are to be pitied. What do they really learn? Nothing. Time wasted, the sabbath desecrated, making character for hell!

It used to be that Sunday school libraries contained religious books exclusively; publications of the "American Sunday School Union," "The American Tract Society," and the church publishing houses. But now this is not always the case. Perhaps rarely so. We have seen some of the common, ordinary fiction of the day occupying the leading place in some Sunday school libraries. What is a Sunday school for, anyway? To stuff the children on the things of the world? If that be the case, we had better join the role of the Hard-shell Baptists. Why not make our Sunday school libraries, all of them, intensely evangelical and spiritual? It seems that now, in some quarters, that there is a morbid fear of being really religious. This is a very great mistake. Children and young people used to be drawn, or attracted, by real religion; and it is a mistake to suppose that they have changed in their nature. We'll never save the young people by feeding them on the literary husks of the world and the devil—the average fiction writer of the day. Again we say, What do you read? You will be just what you make yourself, by what you read—good or bad, weak or strong, wise or ignorant. Fitting yourself and children for heaven or hell, by what you read. It enters into and becomes your very mental, moral, and spiritual being: It is an inexorable law that we cannot evade nor break with impunity.

J. F. Dosier.

A TRAGIC END TO LIFE.

A tragedy, sudden and dramatic, brought to a close the dinner of the National Press Association held on Tuesday of last week at the Trocadero Restaurant in London, when George Whale, who presided, suddenly collapsed and died in the presence of the two hundred guests of the evening. The banquet, which was held in honor of the centenary of the birth of Thomas Huxley, was intended also to encourage a campaign against the Christian churches. Mr. Whale, responding to a toast to the Association, said: "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die. Do I say that? No. I say take heart and help, for today we live." He also delivered a speech in which he attacked the dogmas of Christianity and its ministers. He had just ridiculed a statement the "light of the Holy Ghost has guided church for nineteen centuries." "When light does come, I predict it won't have dazzling effect of the light which fell upon the apostle en route to Damascus—a light which left him dazzled for the rest of his life." Mr. Whale said, while the guests cheered appreciatively. A little later they were just beginning to applaud the first sentence of a toast in his honor presented by Rev. G. H. Putnam, American Civil War orator, when Mr. Whale collapsed. Hushed whispers and awed, stricken faces replaced laughter and smiles. Then followed a tense silence, broken only by the dying man's gasping breathing. The incident may be explainable in a perfectly natural way, but it at least gives emphasis to the need of a deeper reverence for those things that many people hold sacred. The Bible speaks of sin against the Holy Ghost. The Whale, such as reported comes perilously near to a type of transgression.—Zion's Herald.

CHILDREN'S PRAYERS.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

Sometimes a child, of its own accord, takes the habit of prayer. It adopts the Lord's Prayer, or some other that it hears, or it composes a simple form of its own. As it uses it it derives great benefit from them, and, as increasing years, grows into a larger and deeper appreciation of prayer.

Usually, however, children are dependent upon older persons to teach them to pray and lead them to understand and to value the privilege of prayer.

As a rule, I think, children are easily taught to pray. One of the precious privileges of the father and mother is to do this teaching—especially when the child is going to bed.

The bed-time prayer may be made the occasion of valuable instruction. The day is passed. Its joys and disappointments, its successes and failures may be brought in review. Reasons for thankfulness, for forgiveness, the necessity for the heavenly Father's aid may be spoken of. Now and again the child asks the meaning of words and expressions used in the prayer. At such times the mind is specially open to receive the truth and to its needs.

The language should be such as can be easily understood. It is well that the prayer be read over and over again the explanations flow out of the prayer itself, so that as it is read over and over again the explanations become a part of it—recurring naturally to the child's mind.

The child should be trained to repeat its prayers in a becoming tone of voice. It is important that care be taken with reference to the speed and manner of speaking. All will seem fitting and reverent. Thus, as the child grows up and leads in public prayer it will not be handicapped with unfortunate mannerisms.

The evening prayer—"Now I Lay Me"—has many versions of varying value. The words "soul" and "die"—sometimes used—theological, too difficult for a small child. The version I give here the expressions are chosen as to easily fit into the mind of even a very young person; and they have a fullness of meaning adequate to meet the needs of one well advanced in years.

Now I Lay Me.

Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray Thee, Lord, to watch and keep.
And in the morning, when I wake,
Help me the way of love to take. Amen.

The other prayer I am giving—"Loving Jesus"—is longer. It is suited for use either at night or morning, at the bedside or in the family circle. I like the simple, beautiful, reverent expressions with which it abounds. Much fine teaching may be brought out through the years in answer to the child's questions.

However, one should remember that prayer is prayer. The desire and effort to instruct the child should not be allowed to dispel the spirit of reverent devotion, which should always prevail.

Loving Jesus.

Loving Jesus, meek and mild,
Look on me, a little child.
Make me gentle as thou art.
Come and live within my heart.

Take my childish hand in thine,
Guide these little feet of mine.

So shall all my happy days
Sing their pleasant song of praise;
And the world shall always see Christ, the Holy Child, in me. Amen.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

At the call of Rev. T. H. Lewis, D.D., president of the General Conference. I spent last Wednesday and Thursday, May 13 and 14, in Indianapolis, Ind. in attendance upon the All-Boards meeting, and the Meeting of the Presidents of the Annual Conferences. It was in every way a good meeting. The addresses were of a very high order, and a spirit of hopefulness pervaded the meeting. A full account of the meeting will be published in the church papers.

Among the Churches.

Sunday, May 17, was spent on Flat Rock charge, with Rev. Joel B. Trogdon and his people at Palestine and Bethel churches. Brother Trogdon has made a splendid start on Flat Rock in this first half of his first year with these good people. They have repaired and painted the parsonage, and have made of it a good home for the pastor and his family. This parsonage, like all other parsonages, should be near one of our own churches.

The charge is doing better this year than usual on the budgets.

Pastors' Reports for Second Quarter.

We are now in the third week of May and 63 pastors out of 81 have reported for the second quarter, and we thank the 63 for their promptness. But that also means that 18 pastors have not yet reported. Conference requires all pastors to report quarterly, and a blank was sent you for this purpose. Please let me have it soon. From these 63 reports we note that these charges have lost 210 members for the first half-year, and have gained 375, making only a total gain of 165 members in six months. True, we have not yet passed through our real revival season, but even when that comes we must be on the alert lest we lose more members than we gain.

Last fall pastors in their fourth quarterly reports showed a gain of 1,166 members for the year, and then about ten days later those same pastors made report to the Annual Conference and their reports showed a loss of 356 members for the year. I cannot believe that we lost members last year, and yet the reports to conference were the ones which had to be accepted.

Let us be careful with our figures this year, not just to count numbers, but that we may know that our records are right.

Pastors' Salaries and Budgets.

We are giving budget showings in another column, and we note from the 63 reports in hand that some pastors have received very small amounts on salary up to date. Their families cannot possibly live on these small amounts. We also note that other pastors are receiving their salaries by the month, which is as it should be.

This fact is also noted. Where the salaries are largest the people pay up best, and where they are smallest, pastors so often have to wait until toward the end of the year. Each pastor should receive at least one-twelfth of his salary each month until it is all paid.

Children's Day.

Be sure to prepare for Children's Day and plan for a good offering. Twenty-five per cent of the G. C. budget should be raised at that time unless you have a better plan.

Appointments.

May 24, Pageland, S. C. Commencement Sermon at closing of high school.

May 30 to 31, District Rally at Mt. Hermon church, Mt. Hermon charge.

Yours in the Master's service,

A. G. Dixon.

SPECIAL REQUEST.

Some one has suggested that my special request, written in the midst of my other notes will not be read, and if it is not read it will not be heeded. That is a slam on me, but here goes all by itself.

We are asking all pastors to attend both the Pastors' Summer Conference and the Young People's Summer Conference June 15 to 26. It will be well worth your while to do this. You are needed.

We are also asking the charges to give your pastor a vacation for these ten days, and pay his way to these conferences. Please do not fail your pastor in this. The ten days will cost him $15 plus his expense of travel.

Yours for a great conference

A. G. Dixon.

THE TENTH COMMANDMENT.

This is a unique commandment. Search all the laws of the world, and you will not find one which resembles it. The Tenth Commandment is the complement of all the rest. It shows that God requires of us not only outward virtue, but inward holiness; that He demands in us the sacrifice of the will, from which wicked actions spring; that sinful imaginations are a crime against Him as well as wicked acts.—Dean Farrar.

"Beg pardon, sir, but could you tell me if there is a man living in this hotel with one eye named John Hardy!"

"Maybe I could help you out. Do you know the name of his other eye?"—American Boy.

Winston-Salem.—The Home Circle held its regular monthly meeting at the home of the president, Miss Frances Martin, in Ardmore, with 12 members and four visitors present.

The devotional period was conducted by Miss Martin; then an interesting study of the Pittsburgh Mission was entered into, a number of papers were read in connection with the work.

After the business session, the hostess served ice cream and cake.

Miss Joem Davis, on West Fourth street, will be hostess to the Home Circle next month.

The members of the Philathea class, numbering about 25, were delightfully entertained by Mrs. Hunter and Mrs. Hunt, at the parsonage, on Monday evening, May 4.

Rev. R. A. Hunter led the devotional period. The class voted to send a delegate to the Young People's Conference to be held at High Point College June 16-26. The treasurer was instructed to pay $10 toward erecting a bulletin board in a conspicuous place in front of the church.

At the close of the business session a very interesting contest was entered into, "Cupid and the Flowers." Miss Leota Loggins proved the most successful contestant and was presented with a beautiful bud vase.

The Sunday school attendance was splendid for last Sunday; there were a number of visitors present and several names were added to the roll.

At 11 o'clock the pastor preached an appropriate sermon for Mother's Day, his subject being, "Mother, Home and Heaven." The main auditorium of the church was crowded. An earnest appeal was made to the congregation that for the sake of mother, for the sake of home and for the sake of reaching heaven at last, all strive for a deeper consecration to God and to His church. A number of familiar hymns were heartily sung by the congregation and a beautiful duet was rendered by Misses Blanche Hanes and Rosa Reynolds.

The majority of the pastors of the local churches are not holding services on Sunday evening on account of the Billy Sunday evangelistic campaign. It is a great inspiration to gather at the Tabernacle and unite our prayers and efforts with the throng of people coming from the churches in the city and surrounding country. One of the inspirational features of the meeting is the splendid singing by a choir composed of the best voices from the city churches and directed by Mr. Rodeheaver of the Sunday party. There has already been a revival of religion as the result of this meeting. Church members have been blessed, and have caught a broader vision of their mission in the world. Quite a number of men and women and boys and girls who had never professed Christianity have been influenced through these services to take their stand for Christ. With the united effort of the ministers and Christian people of the churches in connection with this great religious movement, eternity alone will be able to reveal the good that will come out of it.

$158.50 ISN'T $500.

Who said it is? Not I, sir. I said it isn't. But if I could add $341.50 to it it would be. And I'm counting on you folks who haven't sent your checks to help me do it. The response has been very good, but it could have been better. Indeed, it could have been the full amount.

This is the situation: An appeal was made by Dr. Leigh Layman, backed by Dr. Fred C. Klein, for $12,500 for a church at Nagoya College. For years the student body has been worshiping in a converted cow barn. While the student body this year is more than 1100, only 400 of them can find standing room in the old church. If the religious work at the College is to be carried on as it ought, we must provide church facilities.

Dr. Layman, in speaking of the attitude of the Japanese, especially the non-Christian, says they are gauging the emphasis we place on Christianity by the provision we make for carrying it on. "You," they say to Dr. Layman and our other missionaries, "provide splendid buildings for education. This cow-barn is what you provide for your religion." The point is obvious. Shall we put the emphasis where it belongs? Not poorer school buildings certainly, but better church buildings.

But there is still another reason for this contribution: Brother J. Clyde Auman, one of our own North Carolina boys, of whom we have every right to be proud, is the principal of the Nagoya College. Are you praying for his success? Back up your prayers by giving him the means by which he may succeed. I don't know any better way to assure him you have him in your hearts than to make this church that he so sorely needs possible. And the quicker you give it, the greater will be the expression of your interest in him.

As I said at the beginning, I have received to date $158.50. We must raise the full $500. Won't you send me a check for your part of the balance? Send it to C. W. Bates, 165 Hillside Street, Asheville, N. C.

Thomasville.—Our special meeting at Thomasville has closed with good results. As near as we can get it, there were 36 conversions and reclamations. Many of these were church members reclaimed. To date there have been only three additions to the church, but others will join later. Brother Bethea did most acceptable work and greatly endeared himself to our people here who will always be glad for him to return. As pastor we greatly appreciate his good work.

The interior of our church has been painted and the outside will soon receive its much needed coat. The Junior Baraca room has become one of the most beautiful rooms in the church. The boys seem to have put forth special effort and the result is a beautiful room. The same can be said of the Philathea rooms. The Senior C. E. society, under the leadership of Mr. Clyde Watts, is doing good work, as is also the Junior society with Miss Friendlys Harris as leader. These societies are led by young people.

At the Grove, something over $200 has been spent in cash and labor in beautifying front yard. Last Sunday there were 114 in Sunday school, which was the largest attendance in years and perhaps ever. Superintendent Teague is very much pleased with results. There are great possibilities for this church. One of the smaller classes has an enrollment of 45 with a good average attendance. No teacher can do justice to such a large class of little folks. Not until Sunday school rooms are built can this school develop as it should. So far as we know there is no opposition to the building of Sunday school rooms, however, some think we should get money in the treasury before building, while others think we should build at once using all the fund we have and can get and borrow balance. We believe these opinions will be harmonized and the rooms built this year. More is involved in this step than many of the church think.

Our second quarterly conference was held at Thomasville Wednesday night, May 13. I. R. Connell and W. J. Loftin, both of Thomasville, are the nominees for delegate to annual conference. The nomination of these brethren insures the circuit a good delegate, for either will fill the place most acceptably.

Brother Hubert Payne has given us 1 gallons oil for the Ford and five gallons kerosene oil for stove. We wish to thank him for this act of kindness and good will. From Brother I. A. Teague we have received a fine lot of strawberries, cabbage, and other vegetables. To him and his good wife we extend our thanks. To all others who have given us needful gifts, we wish to express our sincere gratitude.

Our special meeting at the Grove began second Sunday in July with Rev. A. D. Shelton as pulpit help. Geo. L. Reynolds.

Burlington.—Yesterday was another great day with the Burlington church. Four hundred and sixty-four were present in the Sunday school, and the church was filled at the 11 o'clock preaching service. The spirit of evangelism was much in evidence in both the Sunday school and the preaching service. Several testified to the goodness of God, and many asked for prayer, both for themselves and for others. One young man was saved at the close of the Sunday school. Thirty-five were received into the church at the morning service, and more than twice that many have been handed in for church membership. The doors of the church will be opened again next Sunday, and several more will, no doubt, be received at that time.

The Ham-Ramsay meeting is making a very profound impression on our community. The Lord is certainly in our midst and the people are yielding to His presence in great numbers.

The meeting will continue for two weeks yet, and we are expecting a great harvest of souls in these last days. S. W. Taylor.

May 18.

—Henry Ford is willing to buy the four hundred remaining small ships built by the Government during the World War if the Government will set a "fair price." This was announced by Mr. Ford last week. He would "scrap" most of them and use the material in the Ford factories. A few, perhaps twenty-five or thirty, would be repaired and used by the Ford Company for Great Lake and ocean traffic.

Hendersen.—Our faithful reporter, Miss Katie Cook, has not yet sufficiently recovered from her operation to give us the news, though she is making good progress and we hope will soon be able to attend services again.

We observed Mothers' Day a week ago with a goodly number present, fine music and a sermon appropriate for the occasion. Our attendance at all the services is very good. The Sunday school attendance seldom ever drops below 190 and seldom ever goes above 220. We expect to have our regular service next Sunday morning but at the evening hour (8:00 o'clock) we will have another musical program. Some weeks ago we had one of these evenings of music and had a packed house. The first effort was so successful that we are trying it again next Sunday evening.

In the absence of the pastor last week in attendance upon the board meetings at Indianapolis the midweek prayer meeting was led by Rev. E. R. Nelson, a Baptist minister who lives in this city. Our people are always pleased to hear Mr. Nelson and especially since he married one of our good Methodist Protestants, Mrs. Glenn E. Wills of Brinkleyville, sister of our Rev. N. M. Harrison, Jr.

Mr. Walter R. Vaughan and family of Vaughan, N. C., have moved to this city, where Mr. Vaughan is agent for the S. A. L. Railway Company. We welcome them to our church here.

J. E. Pritchard.

Allison Grove.—There were 25 at Sunday school May 17, collection 49c. Mr. W. P. Sherrill is our superintendent. Allison Grove church will be dedicated on May 31. Dinner on the ground. Everybody come and enjoy the day. There will be both morning and evening services. Rev. Mr. Brittain and Rev. Mr. Ridge will be with us. The pastor, Rev. D. A. Braswell, preached a good sermon today. We enjoy hearing Mr. Braswell.

Don't forget the date, May 31.

Reporter.

Burke Chapel, Connelly Springs Charge.—Our faithful pastor, Brother Gurtner, has been with us three times since the last report, and is preaching some fine sermons. Our Sunday school is moving right along, has increased for the last few Sundays. We are still at work on our Children's Day and we believe the children are very much interested and are trying to do their best. We want to ask the prayers of all Christian people for our young people in this community. Pray that they may see their condition and turn before it is too late. Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

Jessie Greenhill, Reporter.

Orange Chapel, Saxapahaw Circuit.—The W. F. M. S. met with Mrs. W. M. Ferguson for their regular monthly meeting Sunday, May 17. The meeting was opened with Scripture lesson and prayer by the president, Mrs. J. J. Crawford. The secretary being absent, Mrs. J. L. Maynard acted in her place. The treasurer reported $11.25 collected on dues for the year. We used Tithing for our subject and had a very lively discussion of the same. A real interesting letter from J. F. Minnis was then read.

The meeting for June will be held at the church the third Sunday in June at 10:30.

Mrs. Foust Thompson,
Corresponding Secretary.

Palestine, Fat Rock.—It is time we reporters come out of winter quarters and refresh ourselves in the beautiful sunshine of spring.

Sunday school today has 551 on roll with quite a number of visitors. It seems to be growing very much. Hope it will reach 100 during next month. Have a goodly number on our Sunday Egg Club roll. Our member solicitor has been getting names this month. By the next third Sunday our secretary will be getting egg money.

Our church was almost filled today at the 11 o'clock preaching hour. We were very much surprised by Dr. A. G. Dixon's being with our pastor. We all enjoyed having him come. It was his first time to visit our church since he has been president, and the first time many of us young people had ever met him. So we say, Come again, Dr. Dixon. Dr. Dixon's sermon was sweet and impressively spoken. May we all take his message and live it.

We noticed by glancing over our congregation today members of the M. E., of the Christian, and Baptist churches worshipping with us. We welcome them every service.

Since my last report we have had Brother H. A. Garrett, former superintendent of our orphan home, with our pastor in our home for a few minutes, Brother Garrett being field agent for College.

Sorry Mrs. J. B. Trogdon is on the sick list again.

General health of our community is good so far as we have learned.

Glad to have Aunt Haily Ann Tucker at church today for the first time since October, and also Mrs. Bettie Tucker after a long illness. Best wishes.

Grace R. Tucker,
Reporter.

Philadelphia, Greensville Circuit.—Pastor Powell preached a splendid sermon last night. We enjoy his sermons very much as they are so plain and we feel that much good is accomplished.

Our Sunday school seems to be growing a little for the last few Sundays. We are planning on having Children's Day the first Sunday in June. Everybody come. Best wishes to the Herald.

Reporter.

Zoar, Mecklenburg Circuit.—Our pastor filled his appointment Sunday with two powerful sermons. Our congregation Sunday was pretty good. We were glad to see so many out that had not been out for quite a while. We want them to help pull things together and get right to work for the Master. Let all come together with one accord and co-operate with our pastor and we will all do much in serving our God.

We are planning to have a few days singing, with our pastor in charge, beginning on Thursday night before the fifth Sunday. Everybody that can come and join in and help us as we are going to have new books. We hope the interest will be good.

Best wishes to all the readers.

Mrs. T. J. Atkins, Reporter.

May 18,

SOMEBODY DID A GOLDEN DEED.

Some years ago the papers carried a news item of a man utterly discouraged, sitting upon the banks of the Delaware river. He was a lumberman, and the drought had stranded his raft of logs. Bankruptcy seemed to stare him in the face. A stranger stopped his steed and said, "Friend, what seems to be the matter?" "My logs are stranded, and I cannot do anything until next year. My wife and children will suffer." The stranger said, "It seems that you are in hard luck, but you are honest and industrious; come to my bank and I will tide you over."

Years after when this lumberman was wealthy, and on his death bed, he said, "Son, I would have been ruined had it not been for a good man who helped me, and if you ever have a chance to help Simon Cameron I want you to do it." Years after, when Simon Cameron was a candidate for the United States Senate this son cast the deciding vote for his father's benefactor.

"Somebody did a golden deed;

Somebody proved a friend indeed;

Somebody sang a beautiful song;

Somebody smiled the whole day long;

Somebody thought, 'Tis sweet to live';

Somebody said, 'I am glad to give';

Somebody fought a valiant fight;

Somebody lived to shield the right;

Was that somebody you?"

THE OLD WAGES.

There is a story of a certain unprincipled feudal lord who gathered about him men of like stamp, employing them from time to time in his lawless raids. Finally one of these men, having displeased his lord, was summoned into his presence to be punished.

"What is thy trade, varlet?" asked the tyrant.

"I am an ironsmith, sire," was the reply.

"Go home and make a chain three feet long," was the command. The unhappy wretch did so, and in time brought it to the tyrant, who examined it and said, "Now go home and make it twice as long."

This was done, and again the unfortunate presented it, and was commanded to make it still longer.

After the third inspection the tyrant was satisfied, and exclaimed, "The work is well done. Bind him with it and thrust him into the dungeon. Thus," he cried, "do I reward those who serve me and displease me!"

It is not hard to find the application of this little story. The devil is a hard task-master, and in much the same manner does he reward those who have given their lives to his service.—Selected.

—American-made automobiles are being shipped to England at the rate of one thousand a day. The reason for such big shipments is that a tax of one-third of the value of foreign-made cars will soon go into effect in Britain. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced some time ago that the tax would become effective July 1. However, the "dumping" of many American cars in Britain to avoid the tax has alarmed the British Cabinet and it may decide that the tax shall begin June 1.

Owing to absence from home the report has skipped two weeks. There are so many changes that everybody will have to look for themselves and both pastor and people see where they are. If you have gone up we rejoice with you and if down then we urge you to "let no man stand in front of you in the King's ranks." If a soldier in a physical fight which in all probability would mean his physical life could feel that way about it how much more ought we who are fighting for the King of kings and it means our success as well as his? While space will not permit us to mention all the changes yet there are some that stand out so prominently that we feel they should be mentioned. Yarbrough, for instance, climbed from 26 to 12. That was a fine climb when so many were climbing and many others sending in contributions large enough to hold their own. At the same time on the A. C. B. Yarbrough climbed from 26 to 39. Quite a number of new names entered the G. C. B. High Point perhaps made the best entry, coming in at 24. We welcome Pageland to both budgets and Greensville the G. C. B. We all must note how Spring Church keeps steadily climbing. Some have got to get busy or lose to Spring Church. Only 55 cents kept her from taking 10 from Enfield. And look at Gibsonville and Fountain Place going from 18 to 10 in the G. C. B. Splendid amounts were sent in by a number but the banner for the largest contribution for the two weeks goes to Mt. Pleasant, sending in $75 on the A. C. B. Mt. Hermon sent $51.20 for the two budgets.

This is a fine report but we must work harder and get more money as our year fast passing. God lead every one to do the best.

Yours for a full year's service,

A. G. Dixon

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT.

Mrs. J. M. Stone, Editor.

What Will You Do About It?

Will you picture yourself as sick, and far from friends and sympathy?

In contrast to this, picture yourself sick among friends who showered you with beautiful, fragrant flowers, and dainties that brought you from a lack of appetite to a sense of thankfulness for the food and its strengthening power, and from a feeling of helplessness to a sense of gratitude for the blessings of friends.

You have probably experienced the thrill of joy in giving something to some appreciative friend or neighbor who was in need of sympathy. Would you like to befriend the friendless, to whom you can not carry your beautiful flowers, nor a tray of appetizing food?

In the districts of Japan, China and India in which the Methodist Protestant church has assumed the responsibility of carrying the gospel, there are thousands who are hungering for human sympathy and the tender ministrations of earthly friends. These people have not heard of our Savior. If we would like to know how we may help some soul we can find out by reading the Missionary Record.

Besides the people in foreign lands, there are the mountaineers in Kentucky, foreigners in our own country in Ohio and "The Strip" in Pittsburgh. It was my privilege to attend a "Settlement House" meeting in New York City once, and I wish we could all realize what a wonderful work is done in these missions.

Friends, only a few more than one out of every four of our members are reading "The Record" if the figures I have are correct. Do we mean it when we pray, "Thy Kingdom come"? Are we doing all we can to bring that kingdom? What if Christ should come before we have finished the task he set us? Remember "the shortest way to the heart of the heathen is by way of the throne of God." If you can neither go nor give you can pray.

Find out what to pray for from The Missionary Record. It is only 75 cents a year. I will be glad to send in your subscriptions or you can send them direct to Mrs. H. E. Amos, 918 Gaston Ave., Cambridge, Ohio.

I will be glad to have a sample copy sent any man, woman or child who will send name and correct address.

Yours for a great increase in subscribers in the next thirty days,

Mrs. R. M. Andrews.

Report of Woman's Home Missionary Meeting.

The 32d annual meeting of the Woman's Board of Home Missions was held in Victory Memorial church, Indianapolis, Ind., May 8-11, 1925.

Mrs. A. G. Dixon, president, and Mrs. W. C. Hammer, recording secretary, were present and filled their offices most efficiently. Others attending from North Carolina were Mrs. J. W. Boyles, Thomasville, and Mrs. H. A. Garrett, High Point.

Reports from the various branches showed very satisfactory progress. Two new branches have been formed and quite a number of societies organized in the other branches.

The work in Ohio among foreigners, started by Miss Grace Brown nine months ago, has been very gratifying and she plans greater things the coming year.

Reports from the Children's Home and Bethel Home show that both are doing good work.

Pittsburgh Mission is still helping to better the lives of many foreigners.

The past year has been very successful at Pine Ridge and plans were made to erect a new high school building at a cost of $20,000, half of which is to be raised this year.

The budget for North Carolina was made the same as last year and in addition we are asked to raise $600 for the new building at Pine Ridge.

Please send all money raised to the branch treasurer so that it may be properly credited. Mrs. H. A. Garrett.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

The difference between home missions and foreign missions is one of territorial limitations. There can be no distinction in the realm of world citizenship. Home missions are not provincial, and should not be urged merely as a matter of national economy. Nor do foreign missions hold a monopoly in the matter of world enterprise for the Kingdom. Both are a part of the great task, and both are world-wide in their influence and accomplishments. Both should be studied as equally important departments of the world-wide responsibility of the church. Both approach a common problem, with a different method perhaps, due to differences in the fields of service, but with a recognition of the universal obligation "to the uttermost parts of the earth."

The Missionary Record for May lies before me. In that number is a report of the annual meeting of the Ohio Branch of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. This report illustrates in a very striking way, the truth to which I have called attention in the preceding paragraph.

Take for instance the matter of elections. The president, Mrs. Rosenberger, is the wife of the pastor of our Grace church, Columbus, a church organized and brought to self-support by the Board of Home Missions. The first vice-president is Mrs. George Greaves, of the Hyde Park Church, Cincinnati, another church developed by our board. The second vice president is Mrs. C. J. Morton, the wife of the pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Cincinnati. The thank-offering secretary is Mrs. S. F. Denman, the costume secretary is Mrs. W. F. Barnes, and the reporter for the meeting was Mrs. Ely D. Miller, all members of our First Church, Columbus, a church organized and assisted to self-support by our board. The young people's secretary is Mrs. Frank Krapps, of McConnelville, a church which was given some assistance at a critical time in its history by our board. The tithers and intercessors secretary is Mrs. R. C. Tolbert, wife of the pastor of the church at Mt. Vernon, a church which was given substantial assistance by our board during its building period. The very helpful devotional services were conducted by Mrs. Morton of Cincinnati. The evening devotional service, "Over the Teacups," was led by the ladies from the First Church, Columbus. The pageant, "Canton Pearls," was presented by the ladies from the Grace church, Columbus. The "centrally located and conveniently appointed Methodist Protestant Church" in which the meeting was held, and the courtesies of whose pastor and ladies were so greatly enjoyed during the meeting of the branch, is one of the churches assisted by the Board of Home Missions.

I am most happy in calling attention to the part the Board of Home Missions has played in the development of the home base, which makes possible this larger development of the work for foreign missions in the Ohio Conference. The work of our Home Mission Board underlies every other denominational enterprise.

This story of the work in Ohio could be repeated in connection with all of the other leading conferences of the denomination. We want to do more to help reach "the uttermost parts of the earth." Charles H. Beck.

PUT ON CHRIST.

"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ,"—Rom. 13:14.

"We are to 'put on' Christ. We are to make our own every separate element of His righteousness and holiness. We are to make His humility ours, and His courage, His gentleness, and His invincible integrity; His abhorrence of sin, and His mercy for the penitent; His delight in the righteousness of others, and His patience for their infirmities; the quiet submission with which He endured His own sufferings, and His compassion for the sufferings of others; His indifference to ease, and wealth, and honor, and His passion for the salvation of men from all their sins and all their sorrows. We are to make His perfect faith in the Father ours, and His perfect loyalty to the Father's authority; His delight in doing the Father's will; His zeal for the Father's glory. The perfection at which we have to aim is not a mere dream of the imagination, but the perfection which human nature has actually reached in Christ. The foundations of my life are in Him. It is the eternal purpose of the Father that as the branch receives and reveals the life which is in the vine, I should receive and reveal the life which is in Christ.—Dr. R. W. Dale.

RIGHT BIBLE READING.

No one can tell any one else just how to read the Bible—or any other book, for that matter—in a way which will give the most profit. Each of us needs to develop a plan of his own, in order to get the greatest amount of good from the reading. Yet there are certain principles of profitable reading which are especially valuable in the case of such an important work as the Bible; and some of these are referred to below.

Certainly the first principle in helpful Bible reading is that one should distinguish between wrong methods and right methods. One very wrong but not at all neglected method of reading the Bible is what may be called the hit-or-miss method.

Somehow, too many people still hold on to an old superstitious idea of the Bible. They seem to think that there is a species of magic in the mere paper and ink that make up a copy of the Scriptures. To such persons any verse in the Bible seems to have application to any problem that they may be facing just then.

The logical result of such a mental attitude is the ludicrous custom of picking up a Bible on any given day and reading the first passage on which the eye happens to light. To be sure, this often will bring spiritual help; for the word of God is quite permeated with spiritual power. But how much greater help one can receive if only he reads the Bible in the right way!

What, then, is the right way? In general, it can be stated as reading thoughtfully, with common sense and with a definite plan. God has inspired the Scriptures, but His inspiration most effectively reaches our hearts through our minds. And minds work according to law, the law of mental common sense.

In order to get the most out of our Bible reading we must, first of all, follow this principle: Read the Bible as you would any other book in order to get the most profit from it. Read it as God's word, but read it thoughtfully, carefully and systematically.

Read by Topics.

Perhaps the simplest method of right Bible reading is that of following a course of "daily readings." Such, for example, as the readings bearing on a young people's prayer meeting topic, on a Sunday school lesson or on a mid-week prayer meeting topic. This method has its value, particularly for beginners, but there are more excellent ways.

Read by Books.

No one who has not tried it realizes the inspiration and surpassing interest that lies in reading the Bible a book at a time. Not one of the 66 books in the Bible requires for reading nearly so much time as even a short novel. And some of them are vastly more thrilling than many novels.

Read by Characters.

Another helpful and similar method is reading at one time the story of one or another of the numerous fascinating characters of the Bible. Few people, for instance, have read all the story of David, yet it can be read in an hour. This is true also of Joseph.

Read the Bible with any well considered plan you please; but with all your reading, read the Bible.—P. P. Faris, in The Continent.

—The war game that the United States fleet has been playing off the Hawaiian Islands has come to an end. And the island have been "captured" by the "invading" squadron of the fleet! Major General Hines, Chief of Staff, and other high officers of the Army, took part in the "defense" of the islands. As a result of the war game, Army officers will ask Congress to set aside money to fortify the Hawaiian island of Oahu and to increase the size of the Army from 118,000 to 150,000. Nearly all the additional 32,000 men would be stationed on the islands. Less than 15,000 men are there now. Oahu is a natural stronghold and, it is said, could be made so strong that it would be impossible for an enemy to take it.

—Photographs were successfully sent by wireless recently from Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, to New York, a distance of more than 5,000 miles. The photographs were sent by the Radio Corporation of America at the request of the War Department. The pictures were views of the "war game" in Hawaii, and portraits of some of the Generals and Admirals. The tests proved that the "photoradiogram" is valuable for military purposes. Last December photographs were sent by wireless from London to New York by the Radio Corporation of America.

What is nature? Art thou not the living government of God? O Heaven, is it in very deed He then that ever speaks through thee—that lives and loves in thee, that lives and loves in me?—Carlyle.

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Society in Indianapolis.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Society convened in its thirty-second session in Victory Memorial Church, Indianapolis, Ind., on May 8. For several days the convention was in session, and the officers and delegates were considering the work of the year and laying plans for the future work. Representatives of the different phases of the work were present and spoke. Most gratifying reports were given, showing more interest, better co-operation and greater accomplishments. Miss Emily Grace Brown, the worker among foreign-speaking people in the Ohio Valley, gave a detailed account of her activities during the nine months which she had been engaged. She began by gathering children in a park; next, she was offered the jail, in which she taught for some time before receiving the present location, which is a store building. Miss Brown is optimistic over the work and impresses every one with whom she comes in contact of the great need and wonderful opportunities. Dr. and Mrs. T. R. Woodford, who have been in charge of the Alvin Drew Mission school, Pine Ridge, Ky., were present and were even more interested and enthusiastic over the work than ever before. They gave some comparisons which are not only evidences of growth, but which will be read with interest. They are as follows:

"In six years we have grown in acres of land, from 42 to 125; in number of buildings, from 4 to 12; in value of property, from $10,000 to $35,000; in regular salaried workers, from 2 to 11; in boarding students, per year, from 12 to 110; in total enrollment of scholars per year, from 64 to 154; in amount received for board and tuition per year, from $440 to $8,800; in largest receipts for any one month, from $99 to $1,278. Total number of girls and boys who have attended our school in six years, 351; coming from six states, sixteen counties."

Miss Lula Cash and Bert Callahan, who have been students at Pine Ridge, accompanied Dr. and Mrs. Woodford to Indianapolis, and upon numerous occasions gave readings. They are indeed fine young people, and are full of hope and promise. Everyone was pleased with them, and were determined to stand more loyally by the work which is doing such great and permanent good. The time has come when more room is needed and it was unanimously decided that a high school building should be erected at a cost of $20,000, the same to be paid for, in the space of two years. A part of the funds has been subscribed, the people of the local section subscribing around $1,000. Mrs. Sarah Roach of the Indiana Branch left a legacy of $733 which will, according to the direction of the Indiana Branch, be used in some memorial in the new high school building. It was decided to immediately put forth efforts for the building fund in order that the building may be ready for use in the fall. The Pittsburgh Mission is not only continuing its splendid work but is laying plans for opening a new work along the same lines. Pittsburgh is a Mecca for foreigners, and all of the Christian people feel that it behooves them to care for the foreigner in their midst. Their persistent, consecrated efforts have indeed been crowned with success. Many of the young people who have been in the mission schools are making American homes and are filling positions of honor.

The members of the Maryland Branch continue their interest in the Home for Business Girls, and lose no opportunity in planning for a permanent location.

The reports of Mrs. H. A. Garrett of the Children's Home in North Carolina showed that, as the years go by, interest increases, and many opportunities present themselves for caring for children bereft of parents. The young people who have reached 18 years of age, and have gone out, are filling responsible positions. Two of the girls are married, and one has two beautiful little children. Inasmuch as the splendid new Methodist Protestant College is within a stone's throw of the Children's Home, better educational opportunities are offered. A scholarship loan fund has been started, by the North Carolina Branch, from which loans are made to worthy young people to assist them in securing an education. This is especially beneficial to those who have been reared at the Children's Home and have no one to finance their college expenses.

Bethel Home, a Tubercular Home for Christian Men, which is under the supervision of the Rev. Homer Casto, himself a tubercular, continues its splendid mission.

The Woman's Home Missionary Society is the only organization which contributes to this undertaking. Mr. Casto submits an annual report which is most gratifying. The only other means of support is from interested friends. Since the establishment of the home six years ago, around fifty patients from twelve states have been cared for, a number of these are now earning a livelihood for themselves. The home has had a few women patients, among whom is a former teacher at the Children's Home. The memorial cottage fund which was started by a ten-dollar Christmas gift to Mr. Casto by the little son of a mother who died at Bethel Home, is slowly increasing, and when sufficient, will erect a much needed place in which women patients may have treatment.

The general work is growing, as evidenced by the reports of Misses Mabelle Shaffer and Laura Reid, field organizers. Miss Shaffer, although a student in the Westminster Theological College, has visited the Northern and Eastern conferences, Miss Reid the Southern and Southwestern conferences. Both of these capable young women have done splendidly. The work was made through the various committees, everyone agreeing the first and most needed being the erection of the high school building at Pine Ridge.

The invitation of the North Carolina Branch was accepted for the next board meeting. Mrs. E. A. Craig and Mrs. H. E. Risler were named as representatives to the meeting of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions in Washington.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. A. G. Dixon; first vice president, Mrs. H. E. Risler; second vice president, Mrs. B. S. Gadd; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Jane A. Gordon; recording secretary, Mrs. William C. Hammer; treasurer, Mrs. W. B. Gilligan; auditor, Mr. T. R. Matthews; secretary of literature, Mrs. Arthur Hinkle; secretary of thank offering and blessing boxes, Mrs. John Feth; secretary of scholarships, Mrs. Charles Knight; secretary of life, memorial and perpetual members, Miss Mary Marshall; secretary of Christian stewardship, Mrs. C. F. Stroup; secretary of temperance and moral reform, Mrs. H. E. Risler; secretary of young people's work, Mrs. L. S. Hockmeyer; secretary of Bands of Hope, Mrs. T. L. Spreas; historian, Mrs. E. E. Stewart; editor, Mrs. George B. Greaves.

The pastor of the hostess church, the local auxiliary, and the members of the Indiana Branch, and many of the ministers were lavish in their kindnesses. The meeting was pronounced one of the most pleasant and profitable in the history of the organization.

NOW IS THE TIME.

The two beautiful illustrated posters are being sent to the Sunday schools as their orders reach us. This began Monday, May 10.

All the schools which received their package of supplies without the two posters and two copies of the pageant, entitled "The Cal." have had posters and pageants sent to them in envelopes ere this.

It may be one or more have been overlooked, and if your school received its supplies but did not get the posters or pageants, please drop me a postal card at once at Berwyn, Md., and you will be supplied immediately.

These posters must be seen to be fully appreciated, and they are being praised on all sides for the clearness of the pictures and the fact that for the first time all the church's missionaries and all phases of its work are set forth.

The pageant will be found to be a great feature of the Children's Day service, the hymns used are familiar, and any school can render it.

Wanted—Wanted.

We are calling for every Sunday school in the Methodist Protestant church to hold a Children's Day service this year. We have about 2,000 schools, and all ought to share in the benefits of such a service.

Especially those schools which have not held a service at any time and those that have not held a service regularly every year, no matter what reasons may be assigned, ought to send for the supplies now and prepare to hold a service. This ought to be done every year. Put your school in the front rank.

The children and young people will be delighted to participate; it will advertise your school in the community as alert, as discharging its obligations to all those committed to their care, and will be doing what the General Conference expects, and the foreign missionary work of the church will be helped and also your local church, because the offering will count on its budget.

The number of orders, thus far this year, is ahead of any former year. We want yours also.

Send on your order for the Children's Day supplies, and do it today, please.

Remember the new postal rates and prevent delay. Fred C. Klein.

Sat. Purity. 1 Pet. 1:22-25.

Sunday. Topic. Phil. 4:4-8; Matt. 18:1-6.

Some Bible Hints.

Joy is a Christian duty, and if we realize what Christ is to us we shall be truly happy (Phil. 4:4).

Forbearance or gentleness indicates a great soul, just as impatience shows lack of control (Phil. 4:5).

We should learn in all things to trust God, and this drives out anxiety and impatience. Trust is a habit (Phil. 4:6).

Humility and simplicity are signs of true greatness. Ambition is often but pride, selfishness, or an attempt to win praise from men (Matt. 18:4).

Suggestive Thoughts.

A hopeful spirit is worth striving for. Half of our troubles come from doubt and fear.

A clean mind is worth cultivating; that is, a mind that harbors no evil thoughts, and plans no evil purposes.

Unselfish service lies at the heart of Christianity. It is but another name for love, which is the mark of a Christian.

Self-control is worth attaining, no matter how great the struggle to achieve it. The lack of it means disaster.

Points for the Leader.

The Christian has certain characteristics by which he is distinguished from the non-Christian. The world has a right to expect the Christian to be different from the person who makes no profession, and the disciple of our Master must feel his responsibility in this respect. If a Christian is different he must do differently, and here is where the Christian traits appear.

The Christian life is one of growth. Every individual should be a better character each day than he was the day before, and each year should mark a decided improvement. Christian traits are the marks of the everyday life.

Christian Endeavor's greatest word is strive. In the pledge, we promise to "strive to do whatever He would like to have us do." The degree in which we come to measure up to His ideals for us constitutes the growth of the Christian in accordance with the various Christian traits.

Thoughts on the Scripture References.

The Bible is the measuring-rod which helps the Christian to gauge his growth in Christian virtues.

Phil. 4:4-8 brings us a happy message from Paul. A Christian should be happy, if anybody should. He should "rejoice always." The Christian has something in his heart which others do not have, consequently he should be happy.

Patience is certainly worth striving for. Christians need to develop this very essential virtue, if they would conquer themselves and the world.

Paul also teaches us that the Christian is not to be overly anxious about anything, and to be positively thankful as he prays to his heavenly Father. This may not be easy to attain, but it is most certainly worth the price. And as a result, "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding," will guard us in the upward path.

Our thoughts largely govern our lives. As we think on the just things, the honorable things, the pure things, the lovely things, of life, we are transformed into His likeness; for He is the pattern of all these great things in life. Matt. 18:1-6. Here Jesus gives us His plain teaching about the virtue of humility. Now, as then, we must become as little children if we would enter into the kingdom.

Lessons in Life.

Faith is a foundation virtue. It contains the germ of all the rest. Faith in God and in His Son, and in their power, gives us the incentive to strive, and also furnishes us the power. Hope keeps us striving, and hence is a very practical and powerful Christian virtue. We keep on striving because we have hope in Him. Love is the keystone of the arch of Christian traits. It is the virtue which cements together all the rest, and without which a Christian can make very little progress.

Truth is perhaps one of the most neglected of all Christian virtues. Nevertheless, truthfulness will ever remain one of the distinguishing marks of a Christian.

Justice is a thing too seldom practiced today, but Jesus would have us "do justly and love mercy."

Honor is an old-fashioned word, but a good word, nevertheless, and Christianity bids us live "in honor preferring one another."

Purity is the very essence of holiness, and without this ideal young people cannot travel far in the Christian life.

Courage is also one of the greatest traits needed for the practical present.

Things to Pray About.

1. Thank God for Christianity as the greatest influence for good in human lives.
2. Thank God for Jesus, the one perfect Christian.
3. Thank God for the Holy Spirit, our ever-present help.
4. Ask God for grace to yield to the leadings of His Spirit.
5. Ask God for more personal consecration to His eternal purpose.
6. Ask God to help all of you to make this meeting very beneficial to all present.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES FOR SUNDAY, MAY 31.

The World's Need—the Unfinished Task.

Daily Readings.

Mon. A lost world. Eph. 2:1-9.

Tues. The world's hope. Rom. 1:13-17.

Wed. A preaching church. John 17:20, 21.

Thurs. Gentle Compulsion. Matt. 22:1-10.

Fri. A world-call. Isa. 40:9-11.

Sat. Prayer for workers. Matt. 9:35-38.

Sunday. Topic. Matt. 28:16-20.

Some Bible Hints.

Do we make appointments with Jesus that He may tell us His will regarding the world? (V. 16.)

There are some that doubt today even when Jesus speaks. Doubt the wisdom of missions, or their ability to face the task (v. 17).

Missions would be the most hopeless of tasks if we did not have the power of heaven behind us. With that power, nothing can prevent victory (v. 18).

Our duty is to "go preach" and leave results with God, who has ways of getting His will done (v. 19).

A Newspaper-Clipping Meeting.

I like the C. E. Quarterly's suggestion that we make this a newspaper-clipping meeting. Our newspapers are full of the happenings of the world, and many of the items show the great need of the Gospel of Jesus as nothing else does. The Gospel is the remedy for the sin of the world, it is the cure for the diseases, the balm for the sorrow and the relief for the poverty.

Ask all Endeavorers, either personally or by post-card, to come to this meeting with a newspaper clipping which has some bearing on the topic. Have them read the clipping, make some comment as they may wish, and answer the question, "What can this Christian Endeavor society do about it?" After the reading and comments some might lead to prayer, praying especially along the line of the clipping just read.

The Size of the Task.

The world's need is a big subject, and an important one—that is growing larger every day as the population of the world increases. There was a time when the known world was not so large and much might have been done to extend the Gospel to the then known "utmost parts of the world," but exploration and discoveries have added to the task tremendously. For a time the difficulties of travel and the hardships of living in the heathen lands, food, disease, savagery and the climatic conditions made it an almost impossible task. Through prayer and a great desire on the part of His children to reach the "utmost parts of the earth," God has transformed many of these hardships. Travel has become easy and safe and enticing, cannibalism and savagery are almost a thing of the past, the handicaps of climate are being overcome, medical science has gone a long way in conquering diseases, commerce supplies the right kinds of foods, and clothing, and even the languages have been simplified and reduced to systems so that they are no longer great barriers, and in every way God seems saying to His church, "I'll open the way if you wish to try." With many of the former difficulties met and conquered no matter what they may be for the future Jesus can meet them—and He will.

Means of communication has been so developed that there is now no excuse for ignorance of the world's needs. We know them if we want to know them. The newspapers are full of them, religious literature is full of them, returned missionaries and tourists, merchants and other world-travelers bring us the news and the needs from all parts of the world today. This is another of God's great ways of leaving us no excuse. We know if we wish to know, if we do not know our ignorance is our sin.

The task is great but there is time enough, power enough, workers enough and money enough if we take Jesus at His word and do our utmost to carry out His orders.

Prayer and the Unfinished Task.

Helen Barrett Montgomery says, "The church needs to recapture its fine careless rapture" of prayer. Many things have led to the neglect of prayer; the swift and only half digested progress of scientific knowledge, the sudden accumulation of material gains, the failure to maintain habits of church-going and Bible reading; the decay of family religion. But its neglect, if continued, is fatal. Our only power, now or ever, is of God, and any study that will bring professing Christians face to face with the facts will bring us to our knees. The Bible may bring the knowledge of Christ to a nation or an individual, but if there is no appropriation of prayer-power there is no life, no movement. It is important that men should know the Gospel, it is more important that they should pray the Gospel. If they pray, the Gospel proceeds; if they do not pray the Gospel halts. Its victories are wholly wrought by prayer; its defeats proceed from prayerlessness.

The Vision of Jesus.

Jesus saw the whole world. He saw the needs of all people for all time. He healed past, present and future. May God give us this same vision and the faith that Jesus is the remedy. And He will if we pray.

SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.

Destiny.

Text: "If the tree fall toward the south or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be." Eccl. 11:3.

This is a short parable of destiny. The soul is immortal, because it is the breath of Almighty God, part of His eternal Spirit. The body will share this innate immortality of the soul after the resurrection. Where shall the soul and body spend eternity? is a most vital question. There is no concern of life that is more important. Let us most prayerfully consider the conditions, character, and fixedness of destiny. We will first take note of

The Conditions of Destiny.

The condition of a falling tree is its leaning, the way it has grown through the years. The conditions of man's destiny are his choice, his faith or unbelief, his conduct, and his service.

A man's choice is his moral leaning, or inclination, or decision, concerning right and wrong. It is a choice between two ways, two masters, and two eternal abodes. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

Salvation by faith in Jesus Christ is the appointed preparation for destiny. In his natural state man is a sinner, lost, and condemned. He is helpless to save himself. Christ alone can save, by virtue of the all-embracing atonement. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

Conduct is the fruitage of faith or unbelief. Faith and unbelief cannot stand alone. Both produce deeds. Faith in God will inspire the good works. Unbelief is the parent of all sorts of sin and neglect. God has appointed a day in which he will judge every man according to his works.

The extent of reward or punishment will be in proportion to service; of good done, on the one hand, or harm done, on the other.

"None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." We live and die to make this world either better or worse. "If any man knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

In the second place let us consider

The Character of Destiny.

The two kinds of destiny are as wide apart as the poles, as different as day and night; the one is happiness inexpressible, the other is untold misery; the one is fellowship with God, the angels, and all the redeemed, the other is fellowship with demons, the damned, and the scum of all the ages. The wicked shall eat the fruit of their own doings, reap the harvest of their own sowing. "They that sow to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but they that sow to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

The unsaved will undergo eternal remorse of conscience, "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." The outer darkness of separation from all that is good will mean unspeakable wretchedness. And the lost will be assigned to "everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

"Then shall the righteous shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." They will share in an inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." In the many-mansioned home of their Father, they will reign as kings and priests unto God.

In the third place we will consider

The Fixedness of Destiny.

"If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth there it shall be." They know no changes in the world to come. The day of opportunity will have been forever past. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." To the redeemed it will be an everlasting union with the Lord. "The dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

"Are you ready for that day to come?" Where will you spend eternity? "Prepare to meet thy God."—The Word of Life.

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SOCIETY AND THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE.

In discussing this subject it seems that we should be concerned primarily with two words: Problem, Solution. At some time in life every one faces these two words and feels their reality. The sincere individual knows the potency of these terms and realizes that his influence for God and righteousness will largely be determined by the way he solves life's problems.

No doubt every Christian Endeavor society has its problem. The problem of some societies may be more serious and perplexing than those of other societies, yet each society has its own peculiar problem. There may be various things: the meetings may lack variety; the prayer meeting committee or other committees may fail to function properly; the lack of good singing may hinder the true spirit of worship may not prevail throughout the service; or there may be problems of a different nature. The leaders, in their respective societies may feel as though their face is against the wall and they do not know what to do or which way to turn. They are faced to face with a problem. They realize its weight. The moment is crucial. However, it is never so late as the problem to end our mission here in this world. It may be a problem for the terrified to carry his house on his back, yet because he carries it he saves his life. So it is with the problem which confronts the Christian Endeavor society. It must be borne and the easiest way to bear it is to solve it.

But by whom and how shall it be solved? We believe that youth will solve the problem. Youth is full of enthusiasm, determination, zeal. Youth is dynamic! Youth does things! However, study, preparation and training are necessary for the solution of any problem. If a task is to be done well, training is an essential. Of course, in case of an emergency, some one without training may have to "carry on" and learn through experience, but sometimes the experience is very costly. In our Christian Endeavor societies the answer to many of our problems is: "Trained Leaders." In order that our church may have more trained leaders is the reason why we hold our Young People's Summer Conference, and this conference lays particular emphasis upon Christian Endeavor work. Do problems confront you? Does your society lack in leadership? If so, do not fail to come to the Young People's Conference in June. The conference will last just a few days, but it will be time well invested and will bring forth an abundant harvest.

THOUGHTS ABOUT HAPPINESS.

1. It is not like trouble; it is seldom found by seeking for it, trouble always is.
2. It can not be bought, if it could, the rich would all be happy. As a matter of fact some of them are very unhappy.
3. It is not confined to the physically well. Many with perfectly well bodies are miserable.
4. It is not confined to any special race or country. It can make its home anywhere.
5. It is neither an aristocrat nor a commoner. It has been known to walk down the street with a king on one side and a beggar on the other.
6. It is not driven away by sickness, old age, trouble or even death.
7. It stays longest with those who are busiest doing something for others.
8. It loves to come into a home where there is little criticism, fault-finding, egotism and jealousy.
9. It laughs with joy when it finds a soul with a clean body and a good conscience.
10. And best of all, happiness is found with all those whose faith in God and love for men keeps them from the black sin of all the ages, selfishness.—Dr. Sheldon.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Giles Chapel, Richland Circuit.—Our pastor, Rev. C. H. Hill, filled his regular appointment here last Sunday, and delivered us a very able sermon. His text was, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Think every one present enjoyed the sermon.

We are sorry to say the congregation was not near what it should have been. Brother Hill has filled all his appointments this year so far. Church members, have you filled yours? Your pastor expects you to be there. If you do not want your reporter to go into winter quarters, as someone has said, come out to church, and make her feel like she has something to report. Do not elect a reporter and stay away from church yourself.

Our Sunday school is not near what it should be. We have school part of the time. It is hard to get enough of grown people out to get teachers. Parents, do you feel like you can afford to rear your children in a community without a Sunday school? Will leave the question for you to answer. If you do not want the school to go down, you will have to come and help keep it going.

On the third Sunday in June at 11 o'clock is the time set for memorial services at Giles. We hope to have a large congregation on that day.

We have the debt on the parsonage all paid off except about $175, for which the bank holds the note. This note will be due the last of June. If any one has anything to give on the parsonage, will you please give it by this time?

Since my last report, one of our oldest members passed away. Mr. Isaac Diffie was buried on Easter Sunday at 11 o'clock. We believe a good man has gone to his reward.

Best wishes to the Herald. Reporter.

Elbaville, Mocksville.—May 3 we had a beautiful service. The communion service was held at this time, and after that we had "an old-time Methodist hand-shaking."

Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Markland united with our church. We welcome these young people in our church.

Yesterday we observed Mother's Day; our pastor gave us a most impressive sermon on Mother. We were glad to see quite a number of mothers at the service, and a number of young people also.

The many friends of Mrs. Lewis Crouse will be sorry to learn that she is confined to her home on account of sickness.

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers. Reporter.

Dulins, Mocksville Charge.—Yesterday being a glorious day with us, I decided to report to the paper. Our pastor, Rev. J. T. Sick, preached an excellent sermon at the morning hour, his subject being, "A True Mother." Our Sunday school is moving on nicely, but we are planning to make some improvements on it next Sunday. We have had 12 new members added to our Sunday school since our last report.

We are planning to have a Children's Day some time in June. Reporter.

May 18,

Welch Memorial, High Point.—During the first week of this month, we were associated with Brother J. L. Trollinger, in a meeting at his church in Albemarle. We enjoyed our stay with Brother Trollinger and his good family, also our stay in the homes of the good people whom it was our privilege to visit. Brother Trollinger has some fine people in his church, some of the very salt of the earth is there, yet there are some like we will find in every other church, who are not interested in the work of the church as they should be. We do not have the results in the meeting which we had hoped to have. We do not think it was because of any neglect on the part of the pastor, for he seemed to be whole-hearted in the meeting; he had been preaching to the church preparatory to the meeting, and was deeply interested in every service. While the meeting was not what we had hoped for, yet we believe some good was accomplished. There were two professions on Sunday, and several of those of the church said they had been greatly benefited.

We closed the meeting there on Monday night, and came home to our own church, here we have been making ready for the special meeting, which began last night. Yesterday morning we observed Mother's Day, had a large congregation, and an interesting service. The program was gotten up by Miss Catherine Gill, the pianist, and Brother I. B. Ridge, the choir director, with others to assist. Mrs. Ridge read the Scripture lesson, Mrs. W. M. Welborn led in prayer; then Mrs. B. C. Royal read a beautiful selection on Mother, after which Mrs. W. L. Daniels of Lynchburg, Va., made an interesting talk on the subject of Mother, telling what mother meant to her. Following this was a special selection by the choir. Other readings were given by Mrs. J. W. Mitchell and Mrs. D. B. Eldridge. Several selections were sung by the choir, one of the most beautiful was, "Where is my wandering boy tonight?" led by Mrs. Eldridge, and response by duet of male voices. The whole program was interesting and inspiring. At the conclusion Rev. Mr. Young led the closing prayer.

The evening service was largely attended, the pastor preaching on "The Preparation for a Revival." At the close the congregation was asked for a manifestation of their willingness to co-operate in the services to follow. There was a hearty response by the membership of the church, also other Christians who are not members of our church. We are looking forward for a great meeting. Brother Trollinger from Albemarle will be present to do the preaching through the remainder of the meeting. We ask an interest in the prayers of the Herald readers.

T. E. Pierce, Pastor.

Concord.—We have been very fortunate indeed to get the different men of our College at High Point to come and preach for us since we have been without a pastor. Rev. Paul Kennett was with us for the 11 o'clock service Sunday. Professor Kennett delivered a message that inspired all his hearers. We were all made happy when it was announced at the 11 o'clock service that our former pastor, Rev. Lawrence Little, was going to preach at the evening service. Though Mr. Little has gone into another field of work we still love him and he shall always be welcome in our midst.

The superintendent of the Junior Christian Endeavor society was very happy indeed when at the meeting Sunday sixteen of our fine junior boys and girls signed the Quiet Hour pledge cards pledging themselves to give five minutes a day to the study of God's word. The senior society held its regular monthly service at the county home yesterday. Mr. Will Widenhouse led the meeting, and all the seniors took some part in the service. The seniors are accomplishing a great work in giving these service at the home. All the inmates of the home are always inspired by their coming.

The young people's class of the Sunday school will hold its monthly business meeting and social at the home of Mr. Clyde Brown Thursday night.

We are now planning our Children's Day program, which will be given the last Sunday night of this month. We are hoping to make a great success with the program.

Bernice, Nash, Reporter.

Denton.—Our pastor, Brother Loy, preached for us again the third Sunday in May. He preached to us about our sowing and reaping. The basis of his discourse was Ahab and Naboth. He made it so clear how our evil deeds done to others would certainly come back to us. It certainly was a fine sermon and I am sure all present must have appreciated it. We are always glad when preaching Sunday comes around, so that our pastor and his wife can be with us.

Our Sunday school and church have lost several good and faithful members. Brother N. H. Johnson and family have moved to their farm to stay a few months. Mrs. Johnson was one of our faithful teachers and workers. Mr. Eugene Hill and family have moved to High Point. They were good church-going folks and Mrs. Hill was also a good teacher. Mr. W. K. Reid, our class leader, and family, have moved to High Point. We certainly miss these good folks and hope they will visit us when it is convenient.

Our series of protracted meetings begins the first Sunday in June, with Rev. J. M. Morgan as pulpit help. Brother Morgan was a student here in school a few years ago and was highly respected as a good Christian and a promising young preacher. We have learned since leaving here he has made great progress in the Christian world. We are glad to have Brother Morgan with us again; are praying that we may have a great meeting.

South Davidson Charge.—The "hot-shot" evangelistic campaign is now in full blast at the tent between 8th and 9th avenues. In all my endeavors to advance the Master's kingdom, I have never been treated so good. Mr. Sice-loff, who is one of the wealthiest men in Lexington, gave me for tent curtains 75 yards of cloth. Mr. Moffitt, who owns a large part of Lexington, has favored us with chairs to seat the tent. Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, etc., are coming to form one phalanx for God and America.

Mt. Zion.—Brother Hunter filled his regular appointments Sunday evening, May 10, at 7:30, and also today, May 17, at 11 o'clock. We have changed our second Sunday appointments from afternoon to evening; had almost a houseful of folks. This was done with the hope of reaching more people and it is proving successful.

Sunday Mt. Zion was filled to capacity excepting "no-man's land" (amen corner); dear old Brother Barber still "holds the fort" in that part of our church. Thank God for Brother Barber. But listen! you Mt. Zioners, Brother Barber is passing, then what shall we do with those empty pews in the amen corner? "Brighten the corner where you are." Then you will want to sit up there. Come on, let us get right with God, give him the best we have in shop and not put Him in that "spare room"—it is too cold in there.

How many will join us in prayer for our revival which is coming on soon. Last year we asked through the Herald the prayers of all Christians and I feel sure that we had the prayers of many for we certainly had a great and good revival.

Brother Hunter preached a real sermon Sunday at 11, after which sacrament was taken. We were very favorably impressed with the goodly number who went up and partook of this service.

And now about our Sunday school: 168 were out there on time Sunday. We were compelled to give Mrs. Bertha Fowler and her class of intermediates a real good cheer when we looked on the board and saw her class, No. 4, perfect, all present and on time.

On Wednesday evening of this week our teachers' and officers' meeting will be held in the home of the superintendent. We hope to do lots of work with these meetings of Workers' Council. We will tell you what we did next week.

How many of you Mt. Zion folks would like to see that "old, long, rusty, wornout stove and pipe moved out for the summer? Tell me Sunday.

Matthews Chapel, Greensville Circuit.—It seems it has been quite a while since we reported, but we are not asleep just the same.

Brother Powell preached for us Sunday morning as usual. We all look forward to our preaching Sundays as Brother Powell always has something good to tell us. His sermons are so inspiring we just cannot stay away.

Our Sunday school is doing nicely now since the weather has got warm, our attendance has increased right much.

We are looking forward to our meeting, which will begin on the fourth Sunday in July. We are expecting with us at that time Brother Troxler.

We are planning to have Children's Day some time in the near future. The date will be published later.

We are now trying to organize a junior choir in our Sunday school, which we hope will mean much to our church and Sunday school. We are going to try to make it a great success, something our church will be proud of in the future.

The Woman's Home Missionary Society of our church will meet next Sunday morning following Sunday school.

Brother Powell has treated himself and family to a new Ford.

Much success to Herald and its readers.

May 18.

Randleman.—We began our special meeting at Worthville Sunday night, May 10th, and closed abruptly the following Monday night. Two cases of smallpox developed in town and a wholesale vaccination was to take place on Tuesday. All thought best to wait a while and begin again. Brother Ashburn was our engaged help and was on hand. He delivered two splendid sermons in his usual enthusiastic way. We regret very much that conditions were such as to necessitate a close.

Prayer meeting and attendance in general are keeping up fine at Mt. Lebanon regardless of inferior crossing facilities at the river. Probably by the first of July the new bridge will be open for traffic. When it is open, it will add considerably to our attendance.

Interest at the other churches is normal.

High Point.—A beautiful recital on the pipe organ was given last evening by George Martin Thompson, who is head of the organ department of N. C. College for Women, Greensboro, assisted by Mrs. W. I. Ward and J. Gurney Briggs. In spite of the inclement weather, there was a large audience, including a number of out-of-town people, and the silver offering amounted to $100. This concert was given under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid society. Mr. Thompson is an artist and under his skillful playing the exquisite tone and quality of the organ was brought to great advantage. The program was made up of choice selections, notably Schubert's Serenade, Handel's Largo, and Kreisler's Old Refrain being especial favorites. Mrs. W. I. Ward, nee Miss Aileen Long, of Graham, a cousin of our Mrs. C. C. Robbins, delighted the audience with her rendition of the lovely, "Fear not ye, O Israel," by Dudley Buck. Her voice is unusually sweet, and her enunciation very clear. Altogether this recital was one of the best and most pleasing ever given in High Point.

The sacrament of the Lord's supper was observed for the first time in the new church last Sunday and proved to be a delightful service, in which the larger part of the congregation joined. Dr. Brown was assisted by Rev. Messrs. Andrews, Harrison, and Lowdermilk.

The Ladies' Aid society members are quite busy these days. Last Tuesday morning they served breakfast at the church to the workers for Community Chest, and realized $125 thereby. On Thursday evening they will serve luncheon for the Brotherhood, which is to be formally organized at that time. Under the splendid leadership of the president, Mrs. S. S. Coe, the society is becoming a "live wire" and is doing things.

We are delighted to greet Mr. Richard Reitzel, who is at home again after a long illness from pneumonia in Watts Hospital, Durham, and are especially pleased to see him looking so well.

The lovely flowers which graced the pulpit last Sunday were placed there in memory of the late Mr. J. C. Welch by Mrs. J. C. Welch and her daughter, Mrs. George T. Penny.

Pine Grove, Kernersville Charge.—We were glad to see so many people at preaching yesterday in the afternoon. Pastor Suits brought us a very inspiring message about home life. We are sorry that there is sickness in our pastor's home and we hope ere long the sick ones will be restored to their usual health.

Misses Blanche Ingram and Bessie Cooke were among the graduating class of the Kernersville High School which closed last week.

Our hearts go out in sympathy to Mr. R. L. Dwiggin, who continues very ill. May heaven be very near to him and his loved ones in this sad hour of affliction.

LITTLE THINGS.

God has no end of material
For poets, priests and kings:
But what he needs is volunteers
To do the little things.

There are many men who are ready
To lead in battle and strife;
But very few are willing to do
The little things of life.

The widow's mite was a little thing
From a money point of view;
But he who reads our inmost hearts
Sees more than mortals do.

Great deeds receive rewards below,
And earth's applause is given;
But little things are seen by God
From his watch-tower high in heaven.

PERSONAL DEVOTIONS ARE IMPORTANT.

The greatest test being applied to Christianity today is the observation of the lives of those of us who call ourselves "Christians." It is just as necessary for us to maintain a high standard of individual living as it is for us to keep up the organization and work of a Sunday school or a young people's society. These personal standards should be maintained on a high level, not only because the world is looking at us for its measure of Christianity, but also for the beneficial result which comes to us as individuals.

The methods which can be used in the daily devotional period are many. Frequently it is possible to join with others in the home in family worship. This, however, should not take the place of individual Bible study and prayer. Many persons find the greatest satisfaction and benefit in using the Bible itself. The reading may be by books, which need not necessarily be taken in the order in which they occur in the Bible. Sometimes it is wise to alternate a book in the New Testament with one in the Old. In any case it is necessary to exercise care that the devotional period does not become too mechanical.

Considerable profit has been found in reading the Bible by subjects, such as "Love," "Joy," "God's Care," "Unselfishness," "Prayer," and so forth. By this method all passages bearing on the subject are sought out and studied. A large number of young people use the daily readings which are provided in connection with the Sunday school lessons and the young people's society topics as their guide in Bible study. Others employ some devotional book, such as "Building on Rock," "Songs of a Social Life," and "Marks of a World Christian."

Prayer is considered by many the most important part of the devotional period. It is through prayer that the supreme power of God is available for our daily living. Three things at least should be kept in mind as we pray: our prayers should be definite, progressive, and outreaching. The mere repetition of generalities is of little avail, but definite prayer for definite individuals and experiences accomplishes much.

The time for this devotional service should be adapted to individual routine and habits. Certainly some part of the day should be given to this preparation for our most effective Christian living.—Frank D. Getty.

MARRIED, SO HE MADE IT AGAIN.

In Jeremiah we have these words: "Then I went down to the house of the potter and he wrought a work on the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hands of the potter: so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it."

God never mends what man made but He makes another vessel of His own providing that suits His purpose better.

Man was marred by sin in the garden of Eden, and man has been ever since trying to mend what sin had marred. Man's efforts are to reform, to develop, to evolve from the lower to the higher; but man's efforts are doomed to failure, for what has once been marred can never be mended so as to make it a perfect vessel again.

God doesn't try to mend what man has marred. He makes it another vessel. The first Adam was marred, so God created a New Man, the second Adam, another vessel, as it seemed good to the Potter to make it. Those who are descended from the first Adam bear always the marks of the marred life; no descendant can ever rise above his level, the level to which he fell.

So God makes a new man, having a new nature. The saved sinner is baptized by the Holy Spirit and becomes a member of the body of Christ, the second Adam, the new man. Henceforth he is a new man, with new desires, new tendencies, a new creation. "If any man be in Christ Jesus he is a new creation: old things have passed away (not mended or improved or gradually getting better and better); behold all things are become new. And all things are of God." 2 Cor. 5:17,18.

The new man may now rise to the level of Christ the Head, with his affections set on things above where Christ is. Then when Christ, who is our life now, shall appear, then we shall also appear with Him in glory.

THE MISTAKES OF EVOLUTION.

The best that can be said of evolution is that it is an unproved hypothesis, a system of guesses, some good and true, some bad and false, based upon data that is more or less unreliable. It is not yet a certified science, like chemistry, or mathematics.

The evolutionists have extended the six days of creation to ages, some say thousands of years each, some say, millions. On the duration of these ages they cannot agree. They fail to explain why it took the Almighty God millions of years to create what He might have created in six minutes, if He had so decided.

Moses, under the inspiration of God, knew more about the creation than all the wiseacres of evolution that ever lived. He specifically says that days were days of twenty-four hours each. "And the evening and the morning were the first day." And so on for each of the six days. Who ever heard of an age having a forenoon and an afternoon?

The fourth commandment plainly declares that the six days of creation were just common week days. "Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work. But the seventh is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it." The days in the last part of this commandment are the same sort of days as those mentioned in the first part. To say that man's six days of toil are common days and the six days of creation are six ages is to insult one's intelligence and accuse Moses of unpardonable ignorance.

Evolution condones and glorifies sin. Its adherents say that man fell upward, not downward. If so, then sin was, and is, a blessing, instead of a curse. But the Holy Scriptures, observation, experience, and history combine in declaring that sin pollutes, degrades, and destroys.

Evolution denies the need of the atonement of Jesus Christ. Since man may "evolute" out of monkeyhood into manhood, through sin into sainthood, and by self-effort into the glory world, Jesus Christ must have been an inexcusable fool to have become incarnate, and die for a world that could get along so well without Him.

The evolutionists have failed most ingloriously to define when, where, and how the monkey became endowed with an immortal soul in the evolving process. Why do not the evolutionists produce some living examples of monkeys becoming men? Can they produce one single example of such during the six thousand years of human history?

And evolution tends to promote egotism and rob God of the glory due unto His name. Civilization is not a product of man's genius and power. God is the Author of civilization, as well as the Giver of every good and perfect gift. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."—The Word of Life.

HELPED BY HINDRANCES.

Thompson, the devoted Edinburgh medical missionary, speaks of the cost of giving up a boy's social gathering for games and reading, because the desired ends seemed not to be reached. A year or two afterward he started morning classes which proved a great success. A German countess was imprisoned, by those who would break up her Christian work among neglected sailors and fishermen, in a madhouse. Her plans were broken. But when her release came the story of her awful treatment led to laws which prevented the like outrages, and provided inspection of lunatic asylums and awakened so much sympathy and interest in her work that she was able to do thrice as much as she did before. Both were hindered that they might be given larger things.—Selected.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—MAY 31.Peter at Lydda and Joppa.

Lesson Text: Acts 9:32-43.

Golden Text: Mark 16:20.

The Central Truth: The supernatural healing of the body and raising of the dead are simply demonstrations of the all-sufficient power of God to "save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins."

Scriptural Points.

1. During this period of quietness, described in the verse preceding this lesson, the apostles were busy going from place to place to strengthen the disciples in the faith of the gospel. On his round of visitation Peter came to Lydda, a village not far from the Mediterranean coast.

2. The early disciples were called "saints," because they were sanctified, or set apart, for the service of Christ.

3. In his anxious solicitude for the needy and the lost Peter found at Lydda a bedridden paralytic of eight years' standing. In him this apostle saw an opportunity of transmuting the healing power of Jesus and thereby advertise the gospel of salvation.

4. "Jesus Christ maketh thee whole." On Jesus could restore the palsied body and Jesus alone belonged the credit and glory. Peter was only an instrument, or channel, in the hands of the Great Physician.

5. This miracle was the start of a great revival. Everybody at Lydda and the surrounding country became convinced, and accepted Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord.

6. At Joppa, a town on the coast, not far from Lydda, a sick woman named Tabitha, or Dorcas in Greek, passed to her everlasting reward. She had spent her Christian life in the service of the poor. She had become so indispensable to the church and community that they were loath to give her up. Accordingly the disciples there sent for Peter to come to the relief of their distress and loss. It is probable that all they expected of Peter was comfort and strength in this hour of trial, for they had already prepared the body for burial.

7. But Peter, fresh from Lydda, where the healing of Aeneas contributed so marvellously to the spread of the gospel, was anxious to have Dorcas restored to life for the same good purpose. So he dismissed the weeping beneficiaries of Dorcas' many good deeds. Alone with God and the dead he most earnestly implored the Christ, Who raised the dead when He was on earth, to raise this woman also, for the extension of His Kingdom and the glory of His name.

8. Like the other miracles of Jesus, it was restoration, not to the sickness and weakness which she succumbed, but to the usual vigor of a healthy body.

9. "Many believed in the Lord." The influence of this great miracle led many of the resident Jews to accept Jesus as the promised Messiah.

Practical Points.

1. Faith is the secret of the manifestation of miraculous power, whether in the realm of matter or of spirit. Jesus was asked by certain anxious inquirers: "What shall we do, that we might work the works of God?" And His reply was: "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent."

2. Jesus has given faith an infinite range of exercise. He says, "All things are possible to him that believeth." Again He says, "Verily, verily I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall ye do, because I go unto my Father."

3. The day of miracles is not past; but the faith to claim them is distressingly lacking. The blessings of civilization, the spread of learning, and the pride of social life have militated disastrously against the possession and exercise of large faith. People are getting too sufficient of themselves to expect great things from God. The race may be approaching a faithless age. "Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?"

4. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." The word of promise is the inspiration of faith. And large faith is developed out of deep humility, separation from the world, and the mortifying of the fleshly nature. "Have faith in God."

A BOY'S MOTHER.

My mother, she's so good to me,
Ef I was as good as I could be,
I couldn't be as good—no, sir!
Can't any boy be as good as her!

She loves me when I'm glad or mad;
She loves me when I'm good or bad;
And what's the funniest thing, she says
She loves me when she punishes.

I don't like her to punish me;
That don't hurt; but it hurts to see
Her cryin'—nen I cry; an' nen
We both cry—an' be good again.

She loves me when she cuts an' sews
My little cloak an' Sunday clo'es;
An' when my pa comes home to tea,
She loves him most as much as me.

She laughs and tells him all I said,
An' grabs me up an' pats my head;
An' I hug her an' hug my pa
An' love him purt' nigh as much as ma.

—James Whicomb Riley.

AN APPEAL TO A BACKSLIDER.

By Raymond Browning.

Remember that we love you still,
Though sadly you have wandered,
And pray you add no further ill
To all the things you've squandered.

There's life and hope. God loves you yet.
The journey is not ended,
And love divine can sin forget
When grace your heart has mended.

The world will hate and cynics sneer
At weeping Simon Peter,
But if our Christ forgives His child
What joy of heaven is sweeter?

What's gone is gone. Face to the cross.
King David lost his blessing,
Yet love found gold beneath the dross
When once he came confessing.

With God's own Son that cross was decked—
Have you forgot that story?
If Christ would save what sin has wrecked,
Deny not Him that glory.

Like Samson shorn you may be found Within the prison grinding,

And yet God's man may still confound
The fiends that caused his blinding.

Come now, you wounded soldier, rise
While comrades close about you.
The trumpet calls. There is a prize
We would not win without you.

A PRAYER.

Let me do my work each day; and if the darkened hours of despair overcome me, may I not forget the strength that comforted me in the desolation of other times. May I still remember the bright hours that found me walking over the hills of my childhood, or dreaming on the margin of the quiet river, when a light glowed within me, and I promised my early God to have courage amid the tempests of the changing years. Spare me from bitterness and from the sharp passions of unguarded moments. May I not forget that poverty and riches are of the spirit. Though the world know me not, may my thoughts and actions be such as shall keep me friendly with myself. Lift my eyes from the earth, and let me not forget the uses of the stars. Forbid that I should judge others, lest I condemn myself. Let me not follow the clamor of the world, but walk calmly in my path. Give me a few friends who will love me for what I am; and keep ever burning before my vagrant steps the kindly light of hope. And though age and infirmity overtake me, and I come not within sight of the castle of my dreams, teach me still to be thankful for life, and for time's olden memories that are good and sweet; and may the evening's twilight find me gentle still.—Max Ehrman.

SEEN IN A BETTER LIGHT.

The young woman sat sewing in a cool and shaded sitting room. She was in doubt as to which was the right side of the material which she had basted together. She appealed to the members of the family who were present. After some deliberation they all agreed on what they believed was the right side.

The young woman went on with her sewing, but in the morning when she carried the dress into a room on the sunny side of the house, she saw that she had made it wrong-side out. If, in the beginning, she had carried it into a better light, she would not have had to rip the dress and make it over.

In all our perplexities the best thing to do is to take them into a better light. A few minutes spent in prayer with our heavenly Father will enable us to see the puzzling problems in a clearer atmosphere.—Selected.

WHAT THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONFERENCE SHOULD MEAN TO THE YOUNG PEOPLE.

Having never attended one of these conferences in my young life, I am not able to say what they mean to the young people, but having had the wonderful pleasure of attending two of these conferences later in life I will say a few words about what they should mean to the young people.

First, I would say they should mean an enlarged vision. As they meet day after day and hear discussed the great needs of the church of today, it seems to me there is nothing more inspiring than the thought of trying to measure up to these responsibilities.

Whenever I attend one I just feel that I'd like to live my life over, with the opportunities of today for the young people. It should mean much to the young people to mingle with the great leaders, not only of our own church, but religious leaders. Another great feature of these gatherings which should mean much to the young people is the social feature. When they learn that enjoyment can be obtained under the direction of the church, perhaps they will stop going elsewhere to look for it, and a much needed social problem will be solved.

To sum it all up, these conferences mean broader Christians, more loyal Methodist Protestants, and more efficient leadership, and here's hoping this will be the best conference yet. I would say to all who can possibly do so, go by all means. Mamie Johnston.

ALBEMARLE CONTINUES HER STRIDE AND FORGES AHEAD OF EVERYBODY!

Last week Albemarle held second place in our registration campaign for the Young People's Summer Conference! They refused to stay second. A splendid list from Mr. John U. Whitlock, a busy register of deeds but who never gets too busy to do service for the kingdom, puts Albemarle ahead of everybody with the splendid total of ninety-four! That's great, Whitlock and Albemarle. Hurrah for you. The list this week follows:

- 458. Miss Alice Jordan, Winston-Salem.
- 459. Frances Martin, Winston-Salem.
- 460. Harold Carroll, Winston-Salem.
- 461. Ma'comb Sapp, Winston-Salem.

STANDING OF THE CHARGES IN REGISTRATIONS FOR OUR YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONFERENCE.

Last week we wrote to every pastor and Sunday school superintendent in the conference, giving the standing of their charges and churches in the registration campaign for our Young People's Summer Conference. Many of our churches have made remarkable showings.

I should like to call attention especially to Albemarle, one of our smaller churches, with a membership of only 150; they have already sent in 94 registrations and are still going! A. A. Hunter, pastor of our church at Winston, has personally secured 65. Mrs. Surratt has secured 35 from Charlotte. May their list increase!

We have only four weeks now to go and we must have a thousand more registrations!

Please send in yours to the undersigned today! Thank you!

Standing of charges is as follows: (Where charges have sent in the same number, the standing is determined by percentage of membership.)

Standing	Charge	Number
41.	Why Not	1
1.	Albemarle	94
2.	Winston-Salem	65
3.	Charlotte	35
4.	High Point College	33
5.	Concord	27
6.	West End	25
7.	Asheboro	24

WHALES AND CANARIES.

Do whales like to hear canaries sing? This may sound like a foolish question but it is suggested by the following incident: The steamship Columbus, on a recent voyage from Germany to the United States, carried 4,500 Hartz Mountain canaries. In mid-ocean the ship ran into a school of more than 150 whales and was forced to stop for a time. Did the whales just happen to be in the path of the ship or did they hear the canaries singing and rush to listen to a concert?

—Since the Dawes Plan went into effect last September 1 Germany has paid a total of 640 million gold marks (about 160 million dollars).

GREENSBORO, N. C., MAY 28, 1925.

NUMBER 29.

DR. IRA G. LANDRITH, BOSTON, MASS.

Dr. Landrith is Extension Secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, and is one of the most powerful speakers in America. He has spoken in every country in the world. Possibly few men have influenced as many people for Christ as has Dr. Landrith. He will speak Friday morning, June 19, 11 o'clock, Friday and Saturday nights, 8:00 o'clock, in the college chapel, and Sunday morning, 11 o'clock, in First M. P. Church, High Point. Every Methodist Protestant in North Carolina should avail himself of the wonderful opportunity of hearing Dr. Landrith.

AIMS OF YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE.

There are four aims in view in holding the Young People's Summer Conferences:

- (1) Deepen the religious life of the youth.
- (2) Make more effective in church work.
- (3) Aid in finding right channel for service.
- (4) Widen acquaintance and Christian fellowship among the future leaders of the church.

If these aims can be realized to the fullest extent the church of tomorrow will be a more effective agency for the Master. Its thousands of pulpits now vacant will be filled with mighty men of God; its now needy mission stations will not want for men and money; its now unoccupied pews will be taxed to their capacity. The whole church membership then will be a mighty army of God-fearing and man-fearless men and women, with the sword of the Spirit, vanquishing the armies of sin before it.

If we believe Holy Writ we cannot say the above aims are impossible. All through the word this spirit prevails, therefore, let us undertake this possible thing and press forward with all our might and main to realize it.

With these aims before it the Young People's Summer Conference, which this year will be held at High Point College, June 15-25, makes a most profound and lasting impression on the young people who attend its sessions. There are hundreds of young people over North Carolina who are better Christians and more efficient workers because of these conferences. Twenty-four of this number have offered themselves for all-time Christian service. This conference is a real asset to the church. Let us see that every church is represented this year.

SUMMER CONFERENCE DELEGATES.

I am trying to give you from time to time through the columns of the Herald and in letters as much information as possible concerning the Young People's Summer Conference which will convene at High Point College June 15-25. We are expecting the largest delegation this year that has ever attended any conference. We can accommodate about 250 in the dormitories. In order to provide accommodation for everybody who wishes to come and to save confusion upon their arrival we are requesting that everybody who attends the conference will please notify me and with the notice send $5 which will guarantee the reservation of a room. This is important. If you are planning to attend the conference it would be wise not to neglect it. This fee will be credited to your bill when you arrive, or returned to you in case you cannot come provided you notify me by the twelfth of June.

We would like for you to select the course of study you plan to pursue before you arrive. Upon application we will send you a complete list of the various courses and shall be glad to advise you as to the courses you should take if you so desire.

Delegates will provide bed covers, linens, towels, toilet articles for themselves. Same should be securely wrapped and addressed to themselves in care of High Point College not later than June 10th. These will be in the room upon arrival.

A certain section of the dormitory has been reserved for married people who desire to come together.

Those coming by train will be met at the station and given free transportation by the College provided they have notified us at least three days before time what train they expect to arrive on. Those coming by bus from the direction of Greensboro will get off the bus in front of the College, and those who come on bus from other directions will go to the bus station and transfer to a bus to the College, or if a bus does not leave immediately for the College call me and car will be sent for them.

EXPENSE OF YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE.

Expense for room and board for the entire conference is $15. Those who stay part time will be charged $2 per day for the time they are here. Registration is 50c. Every Methodist Protestant in North Carolina should register whether they are planning to attend the conference or not. This will show that you are in sympathy with the conference, and are interested in the young people in their endeavor to better prepare themselves for the Master's work. Send your registration fee to Rev. Lawrence Little, Concord, N. C.

YOUNG PEOPLE OF TODAY: TWO INCIDENTS AND THREE REMARKS.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

The first incident concerns a young man who saw service in France during the World War. According to the narrator this young man was badly gassed, spent some time in a hospital and, when dismissed, was assured that his chance for life was only one in ten. With the wildness of despair he flung himself into the gayeties of Paris, and sounded the depths of indulgence. Then, like another prodigal in a distant country, he came to himself and said he would return to America and, live or die, try to win back a place of honor and decency among his friends. And so he came back here, with high hopes, to the supposedly respectable social life which he had left. He found a complete absence of old and restraining conventions, he was amazed at the brazen freedom with which old and young, boys and girls alike, openly indulged in liquor, and joked about the not infrequent sequels to such indulgence. "My God," he said at last to an older confidant, "how can a fellow be decent?"

That there is an unwonted and dangerous looseness in the common conduct of young people, no one can deny. Many older people tremble at the thought of what may be going on when the boys and girls are beyond the supervision of persons responsible for their care.

The other incident opens the depths of a young man's heart, revealing unexpected splendors in a dark corner. A few years ago there was a disastrous theater fire in New Haven, Connecticut, with a large consequent loss of life. A picture was being shown on the screen exploiting the lower instincts of men and women—a lurid, sensuous production that had been well advertised about the Yale campus. Allan Keith and a friend were among the students whose curiosity drew them to the exhibition. In the midst of the showing there arose the cry of "Fire!" and in a moment the theater was a bedlam of shrieking, struggling men and women and children. Keith and his friend were near an upper exit, and were forced outside. Looking back, they saw the struggling mass and turned to help. Fighting their way back with might and main, they snatched children from frenzied hands, and dragged women from under foot, until a bunch of rowdies, seeing that these two heroes were blocking their own cowardly escape, rushed them. The friend was thrown to the ground and seriously injured. But Keith fought his way back again and continued his work until the flames reached him, when, blackened and scorched, his clothes burning and torn from his body, he staggered out into the arms of eager friends who bore him to the hospital where, after three days of suffering, he died. As he looked into his mother's eyes just before the end he said, "Don't cry. Mother; I have no regrets." And then he added with a touch of boyish pride, "Any way, I was the last person to leave that theater alive!"

A person is at liberty to disapprove of the boy's presence at the showing of such a picture. The fact remains, however—and this is of the greatest significance—that it was the real Allan Keith who was the rescuer of women and children. Fire had tested and revealed what was in him.

Remarks.

There is no end to the things being said to and about young people and their conduct. I feel that the situation concerns the whole family and the entire community. In these three remarks I am seeking to place the privileges and the obligations—mostly privileges—where they belong.

1. In these trying times we should have a sympathetic attitude towards youth. Boys and girls are inexperienced, undeveloped. They are in a new world, and are trying to make their way through it. They need to find themselves and to get possession of their powers. Some of them, in the course of their explorations into life, have fallen into bad ways. As a rule they are not worse than their parents were at the same age. There may be less show of piety than with some of the young people of former generations; there is also less of cant and insincerity. The heart of the matter it what counts. Here there is almost always soundness. They may be counted upon to respond to the real things of religion and life when presented in a genuinely human and appealing fashion.

2. It would be well if every young person could perform a daily bit of manual labor. Nothing has ever been invented to take the place of the night and morning chores and the Saturday's work. The tasks were sometimes irksome, but many of us are now grateful for the splendid discipline we thus received. Modern gymnasium and play-ground activities are not a satisfactory substitute. Dishwashing, sweeping and cooking did wonders for the girls. Cutting and carrying wood, feeding the pigs and poultry, milking the cows and helping in the garden were what the boys needed. The young people were required by their duties to be at home at certain definite, regular times. These duties were useful stunts. They added to the well-being of the entire family, and helped to prepare the boys and girls for their own coming family responsibilities.

Recently a woman has been bewailing the fact that, with life in a small city flat where there are no chores for the children, it is exceedingly difficult for her and her husband to oversee the spare time and the out-of-school recreations of these youngsters. Parents and children with a country or a village home—and plenty of interesting occupation for all the members of the family—may count themselves especially fortunate.

3. The whole family—when at home and elsewhere—should enjoy their games and recreations together, as much as possible.

"Some of the men in the party will carry liquor; that is why I do not want Archie to go with us." This was the reason a man gave his wife for not taking their fifteen-year-old son with him on an extended fishing trip. That was some years ago. Times have changed since then. The shoe has slipped on to the other foot. Now, boys decline to take their fathers with them and girls advise their mothers to stay at home because something might be seen or done to shock the sensibilities of these unsophisticated parents.

It is an encouraging sign that in some quarters families are getting together again.

Community sings, games and picnics are being held. All ages and conditions participate in them. This makes for good and healthy development. Speed every agency that promotes family and community fellowship.

THE EVANGELISTIC SPIRIT OF JOHN WESLEY.

By Rev. H. H. Smith.

John Wesley has been referred to as a churchman, itinerant preacher, theologian, church-builder, and reformer. We must bear in mind, however, that first of all, and above all, he was an evangelist. As an evidence of his evangelistic passion we hear him cry out, "Church or no church, we must attend to the work of saving souls." A glance through his Journal with reference to the texts he used in preaching clearly reveals the fact that he constantly sounded the evangelistic note.

Using such texts as the following, he did the work of an evangelist and was indeed the herald of the good news of salvation through Jesus Christ: "He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor." "Repent and believe the gospel." "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." "Christ our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." "I will heal their backslidings; I will love them freely." "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." "He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities." "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

From these and similar texts—and the list might be greatly extended—he preached time and again, calling upon men to repent, and multitudes heard the word and were saved.

The phrase, "a passion for souls," has lost much of its force with us, but it may be applied to Wesley with its full significance. It is no exaggeration to say that a yearning to save the lost dominated his whole life. We hear him cry out, "I must and will save many souls as I can while I live."

Such an evangelistic passion caused him to look for conversions where others regarded the conditions as forbidding. He did not despair of seeing the drunkard converted even while he was intoxicated. He handed an intoxicated man a tract, "A Word to a Drunkard," and describes the incident as follows: "He looked at it, then at me, and said, 'A word—a word to a drunkard, that is, sir, I am wrong. I know I am wrong. Pray let me talk a little with you.' He held me by the hand for a full half an hour, and I believe he got drunk no more. I beseech you, brethren, do not despise drunkards. 'Sinners of every sort,' said a venerable old clergyman, 'have I frequently known converted to God, but an habitual drunkard have I never known converted. But I have known five hundred perhaps fifty thousand.'"

Now let us pause for a moment, and let that picture impress itself indelibly upon our minds. There stands John Wesley, a graduate of the world's leading university and one of the foremost scholars of his day, with the best English blood coursing through his veins—gentleman, scholar, minister,—there he stands holding for half an hour the hand of hard and talking with him about the nation of his soul.

"We have the 'bandit' with us today, but Wesley's day they called him a highwayman." On one occasion Wesley was held up by a "highwayman" who demanded his money for his life. Under such circumstances the average person would have been so agitated and alarmed that he would have thought of nothing but how to escape with his life. But Wesley was so absorbed with the desire to save his life, and had such self-possession that, in giving up his money, he turned to the highwayman and said: "Let me speak one word to you; the time may come when you will regret the course of life in which you are now engaged. Remember this, 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.'" No more was said, and they parted. Many years later, as Wesley was going out of a church in which he had preached a stranger introduced himself and asked Wesley if he recalled being waylaid at such a time. He told him he collected it. "I was that man," said the stranger, "and that single verse you quoted at that occasion was the means of a total change in my life and habits. I have long since been in the practice of attending the use of God and giving attention to His word, and trust that I am a Christian."

Those who use the pen to do evangelistic service have been called "Knights of the Quill Pen." We need more of these "knights" among our Christian workers today, and it may help us to see how Wesley used letter-writing to call men to repent. His nephew, Charles Wesley, was a prodigy in music, and a very bright young man, but he was not a Christian. Here is the way Wesley expressed him:

"Dear Charles,—It has been much upon my mind today that I am still indebted to thee. There is a debt of love which I should have paid before now. But I must not delay any longer. I have long observed you with a curious eye; not as a musician, but as an immortal spirit that is come forth from God, Father of spirits, and is returning to Him in a few moments. But have you well considered this? Methinks if you had, it would be an uppermost in your thoughts. For what does in comparison of this, are all the shinings and haubles of the world!

Wise is the man that labors to secure the mighty, the important stake; and by all methods strives to make his passage safe, and his reception sure." God has favored you with many advantages. You have health and strength and a thousand outward blessings. And why should you not have all the inward blessings which God has prepared for those that love Him?

"You are good-humored, mild and harmless. But unless you are born again you cannot see the Kingdom of God. But ask, and you shall receive; for it is nigh at hand!

"I am, dear Charles, your affectionate uncle."

This letter brought forth a gratifying response, and we wish we had space to give Wesley's second letter. But may we not learn much from this letter? It is simple, brief, to the point, and withal direct from the heart. The last entry in his Journal refers to a sermon he preached on "One thing is needful," and he adds, "I hope many, even then, resolved to choose the better part." And last of all, with his dying breath he gave orders that a sermon which he had preached on "The Love of God to Fallen Man" should be scattered abroad and given to everybody. How well he lived up to his motto: "I must and will save as many souls as I can while I live." Blackstone, Va.

WANTED! !

2,000 Methodist Protestant Sunday Schools to Observe Children's Day.

To appropriately celebrate the 40th anniversary of the Children's Day Service, and to honor the memory of Rev. F. T. Tagg, who introduced it, we want 2,000 schools to observe the day with special exercises.

To increase interest in our foreign mission fields, Japan, China, and India, use the special program, recitations, pageant, large posters and offering envelopes provided by the Board FREE.

Your school needs the educational value of this program. The Union Board needs the financial support of your school.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

On Saturday, May 23, I had the privilege of meeting with the second quarterly conference of the Pageland charge. Rev. J. W. Quick has kept the work going on this charge until Rev. M. I. Crutchfield, the appointed pastor, could finish his course at the Westminster Theological Seminary.

Brother Crutchfield has completed his course there and is now at Pageland, and is getting started well with the work. The quarterly conference made fairly good reports, and seemed hopeful of the future.

On Sunday morning, May 24, I preached the commencement sermon to the graduating class of the Pageland High School. A large audience seemed to appreciate the message, and I enjoyed preaching to them. And on Sunday evening Mrs. Dixon spoke to our own people at the Rose Hill church in Pageland.

The Budget Report.

Rev. S. W. Taylor reports so small an amount received on budgets during the last week that it is not worth while to take up the space in the Herald with it this week. Why not made a substantial payment, but outside of that there was not much doing. Brother Taylor is sending an urgent call for funds this week. Please heed his call. I am wondering if church treasurers in some instances are not holding funds. If so, these funds are needed, so please forward them to Rev. S. W. Taylor, Burlington, N. C., and tell him what they are intended for.

Children's Day.

Please permit me, once again, to call attention to Children's Day. This day should be observed in every church in the conference for the benefit of the children and young people of your church.

Also plan for a rousing good offering on that day for foreign missions.

The Summer Conferences.

Just a few more days now and many of us will be gathering at the College and at the Children's Home for our summer conferences. Three courses are being prepared, one for all the pastors, one for the unordained preachers, and one for the young people and Christian workers. A fine time is in store for us all. Let no one fail to be there if possible for you to get there. Sunday schools and churches are asked to pay the expenses of your pastors. Do not fail them in this.

That Special Meeting.

That special meeting for June 9 at 10 o'clock A. M. is very important, or it would not have been called. It will be held in the College auditorium and will be called promptly at ten o'clock. Please be there on time. We are expecting you, and you will not fail us.

Yours in the Master's service,

A. G. Dixon.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE

Shelby.—The work here has been moving along about as usual since our last report to the Herald. Our Sunday school has been holding up fairly well during the past several weeks. Brother Joe Kennedy has been chosen superintendent to succeed Brother Clyde Tate, who resigned a few weeks ago. The children of the Sunday school, a number of those large enough to recite and sing, were called together last Sunday afternoon to be given their parts for the Children's Day service which will be prepared and held some time next month. Mrs. Thomas McFarland, Mrs. J. T. Ramsey and Miss Verda Chapman were appointed by the superintendent to train the children for the service.

The vote for delegate to the Annual Conference was taken at the morning church service the third Sunday and the result of the vote will be made known at the third quarterly conference. Brothers Joe Kennedy and J. T. Ramsey were the nominees.

The boys' class of the Sunday school, which is taught by Brother A. O. Eaker, held a cake and ice cream sale on the lawn of the Shelby Cotton Mill Saturday night, May 16, for the purpose of replenishing their camping trip fund. The class will go on a camping trip some time soon.

We are expecting to have Rev. T. G. McAllister, pastor of the Caroleen church, with us at the night service next Sunday and preach. He was with us in our prayer service last Wednesday night and made a very helpful talk on three kinds of rest. The rest which the sinner obtains in the forgiveness of sins, the rest which the Christian has who does the will of God, and the "rest that remaineth for the people of God," which is the final rest and peace and joy in heaven.

This pastor and family enjoyed a visit to the home of Brother Amos Gantt and family last Saturday night. We ate supper with them and spent the night. We enjoyed talking with Brother Gantt, who is very much interested in the work of the church. We returned from their splendid country home to Shelby in time for Sunday school. The visit was thoroughly enjoyed. Mr. and Mrs. Gantt and their two sons, Marcellius and Roland, are very faithful members of our church and Sunday school.

An added feature of our Sunday school work is the use of a large blackboard which is placed on the wall beside the pulpit. A record of the attendance and offering of each class is put upon the board. Also the total attendance and offering for the previous Sunday and a record of the banner classes in attendance and contributions. The board is also used for the record of Bible reading by members of the Sunday school.

C. B. Way, Pastor.

West End, Greensboro.—Dr. Joy Harris Glascock delightfully entertained a number of her friends at her home on Asheboro street Monday evening in honor of Mrs. R. T. Ballard, of Baltimore, who is visiting in Greensboro. In the receiving line were Rev. E. L. Ballard, Mrs. R. T. Ballard, Mrs. Perkins, Rev. and Mrs. L. W. Gerringer, Miss Mary Wills McCulloch, Mrs. J. E. Herndon, and Mr. and Mrs. Paul Burns. The invited guests were Rev. and Mrs. L. W. Gerringer, Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Foust, Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Waynick, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Bull, Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Stapleton, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Holden, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Herndon, Mrs. Ida Moore, Mrs. Perkins, Misses Velna McCulloch, Mary Wills McCulloch, Novella McIntire, Margaret Osborne, Lena Martin, Rev. E. L. Ballard, and Rev. N. M. Harrison, Jr. After a social hour of games and music, the hostess served a delicious ice course.

A goodly number attended the lawn party held at the church Tuesday evening under the auspices of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society.

Attendance at prayer meeting is growing and those attending are getting something worth while. As a forerunner of the revival services to be held in August, we are hoping to have a still greater increase in interest and prayer meetings during the next two months.

Already picnics are becoming popular and the Foust Bible Class enjoyed its first one at the Guilford Battleground Thursday evening. Lots of good things to eat were furnished by the good housewives and the class had a good time together. This is the first of a series of outings the class will have during the summer. The May business and social meeting will be held Thursday evening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Foust on Scott Avenue.

Members of the Senior Christian Endeavor Society went to Winston-Salem Thursday night to hear Billy Sunday preach.

The Christian Endeavor society of High Point College will have charge of the evening service on Sunday, May 31, presenting a missionary play entitled, "Real Live Folks." We extend an invitation to the public to come and see this play and help the High Point Endevorers to raise funds for the support of a child at the Children's Home. Reporter.

Three-Corner Rally, District No. 1.

There will be a three-corner rally at Whitakers Chapel, Enfield charge, the fifth Sunday, May the 31st. The program starts at 10 A. M.—promptly. Good music. Good speaking. Old friends. Beautiful grove. Oldest M. P. church in State. The expected speakers will have messages you want to listen to. Dr. Clifton L. Whitaker of High Point College is expected to be with us. People from every charge in the district are invited, and those charges nearby, a large attendance. Bring lunch and drinking cups. Don't forget the day and hour.

R. C. Stubbins,
Chairman.

Burlington.—Large congregations were present yesterday in both the Sunday school and at the 11 o'clock service. Thirty were received into the church, nine by letter and the others on confession of faith. Nearly all of these were adults. Many others whose names are already in hand will be received later. The doors of the church will be opened again the first Sunday in June. On next Sunday we will have no service except the Sunday school. All the churches of the city will worship at the tabernacle at 11 o'clock.

This is the last week of the Ham-Ramsay meeting, and a great week we are expecting it to be. People everywhere are talking religion, and hundreds are being saved. We are hoping and praying that there may be a great turning to the Lord in these last days.

Miss Reggie Moran, one of our splendid young women, was recently married to Mr. LeRoy Sykes of our post office force. These are both fine young people, and we hope for them every possible happiness.

Mrs. Emily J. Amick died here at the home of her son, Brother C. B. Amick, on last Saturday morning. The funeral service was held at Mt. Pleasant Methodist Protestant church on Sunday afternoon at 2:30, conducted by Rev. G. H. Hendry and the writer. Interment was in the church cemetery. The deceased is the mother of Brother G. L. Amick, our choir leader. Our hearts go out in deep sympathy to him, and to all the sons and daughters and other relatives of this good woman.

May 25.

Asheboro Christian Endeavor.

On Friday evening, May 22, a good number of the members of the M. P. Christian Endeavor society met in the parsonage parlor for a business meeting.

Officers for the coming year were elected as follows: President, Frank Redding, Jr.; vice president, Tyson Ferree; corresponding secretary, Lollie Jones; treasurer, Kate Bulla; secretary, Iola Lowdermilk; reporter, Mabel Cox; organist, Exie Callicutt; assistant organist, Anne Leslie Ferree.

These officers will be installed at the Sunday evening meeting on May 31. All members are requested to be present and visitors will be welcome.

The discussion of miscellaneous business followed the election of the new officers. Misses Mabel and Lucy Davis were appointed to represent the society at the Young People's Summer Conference held at the High Point College during June.

Following the business meeting a social hour was enjoyed and everybody voted the pastor an ideal host. Reporter.

Henderson.—The morning church service will be called off next Sunday so that all who wish to do so may go to the Vance County Methodist Protestant Rally at Gillburg church. Rev. W. F. Kennett will speak at Gillburg on The Methodist Protestant Church in North Carolina as I Have Seen It and as Would Like to See It. Rev. M. P. Chamblis will speak Sunday afternoon on the subject The Essential Need of Every Church. Mr. W. P. Garrett is the district chairman and will have charge.

Our evening service at Henderson will be held as usual, so will be the Sunday school. J. E. Pritchard.

Whitakers Charge.—The work is progressing nicely. The attendance at all services is gratifying, especially is this true of the Sunday school at Speight's Chapel. We are working and praying to the end that the present attendance may not decrease, but increase. The interest in the work at both churches is good and we are hoping that this will be a very successful year for this work.

Since the last report from this work we have held a ten-day meeting, having as our evangelist, Dr. C. Morgan Compher, of Washington, D. C. Brother Compher was faithful and untiring in his efforts for the reconsecration of church members and for the salvation of the unsaved. His sermons were appealing and filled with the power of God. His stay with us was a heavenly benediction. However, the visible results were not as gratifying as we had hoped and prayed for. Five people gave their hearts to God, while others sat as firm as stone or granite and would not yield. The spirit of God was with us in great power, people's hearts were touched, yet they would not take their stand for Christ. How foolish some people act concerning the welfare of their souls, the most precious possessions which God gave them. But we believe that an abundant harvest will yet come from those days of special services for we know that God's word will not return to Him void.

We are making plans now for some repair work on our church here in Whitakers. We are planning to put in a satisfactory heating system, carpet the floors, repair and paint the walls and put doors to the Sunday school rooms. We are also working that we may have a new fence around Speight's Chapel. In all the work that we are trying to do for our Master, we ask your best wishes and sincere prayers. Yours and His,

Fred W. Paschall.

Orange Charge.—Brother H. A. Garrett spent a few days on this charge recently in the interest of High Point college. He made a very encouraging talk at Chestnut Ridge May 10. Brother Garrett's visit has deepened the college interest on this charge. One leading member said Mr. Garrett could talk so pleasantly and encouragingly that it would make a man feel like he had some money for the College, though he was dead broke.

Yesterday was a good day for us. Rev. L. C. Little came to us for two services. At 3:00

P. M., Chestnut Ridge, he delivered an inspiring message. Then again at 8:00 P. M., Hebron, he spoke to the young people. Quite a number came to this extra service for Hebron. He put special stress on High Point College and the Summer Conference. Hope a number of our people can attend the conference.

B. M. Williams.

Hebron, Orange Circuit.—We had Sunday school at 10, preaching at 11, then we went to Mrs. J. M. Thompson's to a surprise birthday, it being her 72d year. There were about 6 people there, all her children and grandchildren, her only brother, Mr. S. L. Nelson, a number of other relatives and friends. We were sure she was surprised in a way.

The dinner was bountiful, the long table seemed to have almost more than it could hold. She received several nice presents. We hope she will have many more birthdays.

Then Sunday night at eight we had the real pleasure of listening to a very interesting talk for young people by Mr. L. C. Little, who is in the field for the purpose of helping the young in every way possible. We enjoyed the whole talk and hope so much he may come again.

We expect to have Memorial Service on second Sunday afternoon at two o'clock; hope all who are interested will come.

On the fourth Sunday morning in June we are to have Children's Day; dinner on the grounds. Hope to have a good attendance.

May 24.

Friendship, Haw River Circuit.—Yesterday, the fourth Sunday, was quite an unusual day for Friendship. The Township Sunday School Convention was held here. The speakers of the day were Miss Lottie Barber of High Point, Rev. O. W. Lee of Greensboro and Mr. Whitsett of Whitsett. The speeches were very helpful and inspiring. I am sure they were enjoyed by all who were present. Our next convention will be held at Hines Chapel the fourth Sunday in October. We hope for this to be even more successful than the last.

On the next first Sunday afternoon at two o'clock we will have a Memorial Service. At this time Rev. Lawrence Little will be with us. Our children, as well as we grown-ups, always enjoy Mr. Little's talks. So we are looking forward to his coming with great pleasure.

A number of our members attended the Sunday School Convention in Greensboro, our main delegates being Miss Beatrice Lambeth and Mr. George Maxwell. They brought back with them some very interesting and helpful ideas.

Plans are being made for a Children's Day program. A specific date for this service has not yet been made, however. It will be announced in my next report.

Haw River.—Mizpah: We will hold a dedication service at Mizpah church the first Sunday in June. The dedication sermon will be preached by Rev. Lawrence Little of Concord, who is now field secretary of our young people's work. At 1:30 P. M. Brother Little will speak to the young people for 30 minutes. At 2:00 P. M. Brother Lowdermilk, superintendent of our Children's Home, will have the children of the Home entertain us.

Everybody is cordially invited to attend this all-day service. Come on and rejoice with this little loyal, happy band.

There will be a Memorial Service held at Friendship the first Sunday at three P. M. Brother Little will also preach at this service and at Brown Summit at 7:30 P. M.

Those of us who have heard Brother Little are anxious to hear him again, and those who have not heard him will be glad when you have heard him.

W. D. Reed.

Cedar Falls, Richland Charge.—We have such a good and nice little pianist and I suppose the youngest in the conference, that I want the readers of the Herald to see her. Beatrice is about 13 years years old and is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. D. N. Trogdon, our Sunday school superintendent. The writer baptized Beatrice and received her into the church about three years ago, and I think she is one of the best little Christians I ever saw. Now if anybody can beat Cedar Falls M. P. church on a pianist, please trot her out.

Concord.—Regular services were held Sunday, conducted by our new pastor, Rev. P. E. Lindley, of the High Point College. Mr. Lindley made an introductory address at the morning service. We are glad to have Brother Lindley accept the pastorate here for the remainder of the conference year, taking the place of Rev. Lawrence Little, who is now field secretary for the Board of Young People's Work.

At the evening worship Mr. Lindley delivered a message which was inspiring to all present. One of the main features of the evening service was a duet rendered by Rev. and Mrs. Lindley.

After school closes at the College, where Mr. Lindley is now teaching, he and his wife are going to move into the parsonage of the church. We have already learned to love our new pastor and his wife, but after they move into our midst we will all learn to know each other better, and the work of the church will also go along still better than it is at this time.

It was voted Sunday morning at Sunday school to send at least three of the young people of our church as delegates to the Young People's Summer Conference. The delegates have not as yet been elected. The Junior Philathea Class and the Young People's Class challenged the entire Sunday school Sunday morning in registering their classes 100 per cent. We are sure that the challenge will awaken a greater interest in the registration campaign.

Orange Chapel, Saxapahaw Circuit.—If we have a reporter at Orange Chapel, we do not seem to be hearing anything from her. So, for fear the people will think we are all dead, I will write a few words.

Our Sunday school is flourishing, our children are busy making a missionary quilt, our Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has taken on new life, and our pastor, Mr. Isley, is improving every day (not in health, but in preaching).

We are doing as the "boss" says and giving him a vacation, if he will take it, and have paid our proportional part of his expenses to the Young People's Summer Conference.

We have had right much sickness and several deaths on our charge this year, and our pastor has been more than faithful in every way.

Mrs. J. J. Crawford.

PROFESSORSHIPS.

Because they have recognized what the Young People's Summer Conference means to the young people in the way of better preparing them for a more efficient and consecrated service of the church the following men have established what we call professorships, that is, they have contributed $12.50 toward the expense of the faculty:

Messrs. J. M. Millikan, R. N. Hauser, T. T. Hicks, C. F. Finch, G. B. Harris, A. M. Rankin, J. W. Boyles, R. H. Brooks, J. Norman Wills, W. S. Jones, J. D. Ross, C. C. Robbins, Wiley Ward, and J. M. Cutchin.

These men have made it possible for us to secure the service of some of the leading men and women not only of the M. P. Church but of other denominations as well. We thank these brethren for their support. We hope that other laymen and laywomen who believe in the conference and who are interested in the future church will likewise establish professorships.

THE CALL IS TO ALL.

Come on, friends, let's have a real celebration, one long to be remembered on account of its general observance, and the creditable manner in which we as a church acquitted ourselves.

This is something in which every church through its Sunday school ought to participate for the following reasons, among others which could be named.

The Objects. They are most commendable. 1. We are called upon to express in some signal way our appreciation of an agency which has been markedly successful in creating interest, and in securing the co-operation of an increasing number of our people, old and young, and has helped in a large way to make possible the existence and the present development of our three missions in Japan, China and India.

2. We are also called on to honor the memory of one of our own great church leaders who wrought splendidly in different spheres of our church, but probably nowhere with more far-reaching effort than when in charge of our foreign missionary work in its formative stages, the late Rev. F. T. Tagg, D.D.

3. And we are called on to share in the centennial celebration of our denomination's life and service to mankind, and while the more formal celebration is to be held in 1928, a part of the celebration is now to be observed, and that is to lay on the altar this second year of the quadrennium, and each following year thereof, the budget in full, in gratitude for our goodly heritage secured for us through the sacrifices and toils of our honored church founders.

The Means. All the supplies needed for holding a service commemorative of the fortieth anniversary of the Children's Day Service, to honor the memory and work of the late Rev. F. T. Tagg, and to carry out a leading requirement of our Centennial Celebration are furnished free to all Methodist Protestant Sunday schools, and all that is required is to send an order to Rev. Fred. C. Klein, Berwyn, Md., and we will without delay have your order filled, but of course cannot control shipments after they leave us.

No Sunday school ought to deny itself the privilege of sharing in this great celebration, and really there seems no reason why any school should fail to do its duty to its membership and to the work of the Kingdom.

Another Reason. The Union Board greatly needs money to meet its obligations at home and abroad. Word has been sent to Japan to begin building that long promised church at Nagoya College for its 1100 students and surrounding community, but the funds are not in hand, and only a little more than one-third of the subscriptions made at the General Conference for that purpose have been paid, and we earnestly appeal for the prompt payment of every subscription.

The cause of Christ, the honor of our church, the standing of our missionaries before the Japanese demanded that we keep our promise, and build that church, after they gave us $25,000 for additions to our main building.

But the Union Board urgently needs money to maintain the work in face of rising prices, falling rate of exchange on American money, and other conditions we cannot control.

The Sunday schools can raise one-fourth of the assessment on their churches, and that is our hope. Get the supplies at once, hold a service, let every one boost the offering, and we will, under God, reach the goal. We count on you, brother superintendent. Send in your order.

Fred. C. Klein.

IMPORTANT HISTORICAL CELEBRATION.

On Sunday, June 7, Frieden's Lutheran Church near Gibsonville, N. C., will hold an all-day historical and memorial celebration to commemorate the one hundred and fifty-fourth year since the founding of the church. Preaching was held on these grounds from 1768-71, and the church was duly organized in 1771, and has never been closed since that date. Elaborate plans are under way to make it an occasion worthy of the events celebrated. Several thousand dollars have been spent during the last few months in getting the building and grounds in excellent condition.

Dr. M. G. G. Scherer of New York city, who is the general secretary of the United Lutheran Church in the United States will make a special address, which will be followed by an historical address by Dr. W. T. Whitsett, Whitsett, N. C., well known as an authority upon early historical matters.

As this church is located upon a hard-surface road, near State route number ten, near Gibsonville, N. C., and easily reached from every direction, it is expected that the attendance will reach several thousand people for this important occasion. In the ancient cemetery located near the church more than four thousand have been buried, dating back to pre-Revolutionary times. Plans are under way to give a hearty welcome to all visitors, and the day will be a pleasant and profitable one to all who attend.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

We wish to introduce this article by calling the attention of the readers to the fact that the end sought by all home missionary workers, and foreign missionary workers is finally and eternally the same. Whether the work is for the extension of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ in America, or the extension of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ in Asia, in Africa, or in the Islands of the Sea, the purpose is the extension of the Kingdom, and the salvation of men through bringing them knowledge of the saving power of Jesus Christ.

It follows therefore that America should obey the scriptural injunction to begin at Jerusalem in its proclamation of the gospel, as directed by our Lord Himself, and recorded in Acts 1:8 and Luke 24:47. It is clearly evident also that the successful prosecution of our plans for the evangelization of the world involve the best possible development of the home base. The Master must have had this in mind when the command noted above was given. This is a well established fact in all military movements, and in all commercial enterprises, but many of our people seem to have forgotten that it is just as true in all missionary endeavor. Even the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, our highest governing body, the law-making body for the denomination has not been fully conscious of this fact. Isolation has favored the foreign mission enterprises of the denomination at the expense of the home missionary activities of the church. Our Board has urged that we should at least have equal recognition with the foreign missionary agencies, and this just demand was recognized for several years. A differential was made by the General Conference of 1920, and again in 1924, which places the home missionary interests in second place. As the matter now stands, the appropriations for foreign missions are $18,000, as compared with $145,000 for the home mission. A further advantage is given the foreign missionary interests in allowing the foreign missionary society to retain entire collections up to $60,000, giving them unlimited access to the churches, while the Home Missionary Society has only a $30,000 possibility from the same sources, with many limitations which cannot be discussed in this article.

The point I am trying to make is this. The Methodist Protestant Church has not yet begun to appreciate the value and importance of strengthening the home base. In a limited degree we are following in the footsteps of the Moravian Church, which was so zealous in the prosecution of its work abroad that it entirely neglected its work in the homeland, and as a consequence the church has almost passed out of existence in America.

America is today the world's great Christian battlefield. Here the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ has its finest opportunity of expression. Here the strongest foundation should be laid, and here the greatest campaigns for world-wide evangelization should be developed. Our lack in Japan, and India, and in China, can only be met with a greatly enlarged constituency and interest in America, and as noted in the article last week, the best agency employed by the denomination in strengthening the home base is the Board of Home Missions. The more churches organized and brought to self-support in America, the more churches and people there will be to support our work in the various fields in which we labor. America is our base of supplies, and must claim first place in all thought and planning for the expansion of the Kingdom.

REGISTRATION CAMPAIGN GOING STRONG!

Many New Churches on the List.

Many Others Sadly Missing!

Our registration campaign for the Young People's Summer Conference is really getting under way now, and we received nearly two hundred this week. Three or four big surprises are in store for next week. Watch this column! Halifax, Winston-Salem, Graham, Reidsville, Alamance, Haw River, Orange, Mebane, Calvary, St. Paul's, Granville, Randleman, Enfield, and Mt. Pleasant charges sent in fine lists. Let's everybody join in the triumphal procession next week and make the total at least a thousand! I dare you! Thirty-five charges not on the list at all yet. We miss you!

Remember you help pay expenses of our Summer Conference with your fee.

A BOOK FOR EVERY METHODIST PROTESTANT.

No, it isn't the Bible, although I agree with you that every Methodist Protestant should have one. Neither is it a dictionary, as much as in these days of cross word puzzles, such a book is almost indispensable. The book I refer to is "A Handbook of the Methodist Protestant Church." The book is by Dr. T. H. Lewis, president of the General Conference. That alone is a sufficient guarantee of its excellence. This book in a very small compass gives us the history of the church, its distinguishing differences from other Methodisms, its doctrines, its organizations; in short, every phase of our denominationalism. It is an answer to the question frequently asked, What and why is the Methodist Protestant Church?

I urge every Methodist Protestant who loves his church, who wants to be informed about it, who wishes to be in a position to inform others, to get this book. The book is cloth bound, and sells for 50c. Copies can be had either direct from Dr. T. H. Lewis, 2844 Wisconsin Ave., Washington, D. C., or from the Methodist Protestant Book Concern, 516 North Charles Street, Baltimore, Mr. Send for a copy now before the edition is exhausted.

THE AVERAGE MAN'S MISTAKES.

"The average man at the end of life
 Sat counting his life's mistakes;
 And half of them, as he said to his wife,
 Were those that rashness makes.
 And the other half!—here he lifted his head;
 He could scarcely believe his vision—
 Yes, fully the other half, he said,
 Were caused by indecision."

—From Pacific Mutual News.

OLD-FASHIONED VIRTUES.

There are a lot of questions about how people should dress, what they should eat, and how they should conduct themselves in a testimony meeting which are pretty difficult to settle. In fact, there seems to be a place for the individual conscience in many such matters: for so far, no one seems to have been appointed to make an unbending rule for all the rest to follow.

But there are a few old-fashioned virtues concerning which there should be no arguing as to standards and very little variation in practice. For instance, truthfulness, honesty, and purity are cardinal virtues which all true Christians possess, and from their iron-like rules there is no provision for "conscience" to occasion much variation. There is no "no man's land" between truth and falsehood, honesty and dishonesty, purity and impurity.—Selected.

IN THE MORNING.

Breakfast is ready; the toaster is red,
 But who is a-dawdling and romping in bed
 A yawn o'er a stocking, a button or two Are fastened with grumbles, with grunts o' a shoe.

Poor mother is waiting; the porridge is cooking,
 While certain young persons are fussing and fooling.

It's hard to believe it! It cannot be true!
 No children behave so! I wouldn't, would you?

—John Martin, in Chicago News.

STOOD BY HIS FLAG.

During the American Civil War a dozen rough but brave soldiers were playing cards one night in a camp. "What on earth (that?)" suddenly exclaimed the ring-leader stopping in the midst of the game to listen. In a moment the whole squad was listening to a low, solemn voice which came from a tent occupied by several recruits, who had arrived in camp that day. The ring-leader approached the tent on tip-toe.

"Boys, he's a-praying," he roared on. "Three cheers for the parson!" shouted another man of the group as the prayer ended. "You watch things for three weeks! I'll show you how to take the religion out of him!" said the first speaker, laughing. He was a large man, the ring-leader in mischief.

The recruit was a slight, pale-faced young fellow of about 18 years of age. During the next three weeks he was the butt of the camp. Then several of the boys, conquered by the lad's gentle patience and uniform kindness, begged the others to stop annoying him. "Oh, the little ranter is no better than the rest of us," answered the ring-leader. "He's only making believe pious. When we get under fire you'll see him run. These pious folks don't like the smell of gun powder. I've no faith in their religion!"

In a few weeks the regiment broke camp and marched toward Richmond, entered the wilderness and engaged in that terrible battle. The company to which the young recruit belonged had a desperate struggle. The brigade was driven back, and when the line was reformed behind the breast works they had built in the morning he was missing. When last seen he was almost surrounded by enemies, but fighting desperately. At his side stood the brave fellow who had made the parson a constant object of ridicule. Both were given up as lost.

Suddenly the big man was seen tramping through the underbrush, bearing the dead body of the recruit. Reverently he laid the corpse down, saying, as he wiped the blood from his own face: "Boys, I couldn't leave him—he fought so! I thought he deserved a decent burial."

During a lull in the battle the men dug a shallow grave and tenderly laid the remains therein. Then, as one was cutting the nails and regiment upon a board, the big man said with a husky voice: "I guess you'd better put the words 'Christian Soldier' in somewhere! He deserves the title, and maybe it console him for our abuse." There was not a dry eye among those rough men as they stuck the rudely carved board at the head of the grave, and again and again, looked at the inscription.

"Well," said one, "he was a Christian soldier, and," turning to the ring-leader, "he didn't run, did he, when he smelled powder?"

"Run!" answered the big man, his voice tender with emotion, "why, he didn't ludge an inch! But what's that to standing for weeks our fire like a man, and never sending a word back? He just stood by his flag and let us pepper him—he did!"

When the regiment marched away, that rude head board remained to tell what a power lies in a Christian life.—Selected.

THE AMERICAN DOG THAT PREACHED A SERMON.

Although he had lived with those men for a long time, he had never had a name. The reason for this was because he was made of iron and not of flesh and hair. Iron dogs do not need names, do they? His home had always been on a shelf behind the same American window.

This was where he was when a kind-faced American teacher stopped one day and looked in at the window. "I wish he was mine," she said, to the gentleman who was walking beside her.

"What would you do with him?" he asked. "You would need a very large dog house to keep him in."

"Oh, I would not keep him in a house," said the teacher, smiling, "he should stand on my lawn in Burma. How much he could say to the people there!"

One day, not very long after this, that same gentleman came down the street, walked into the store, and asked the price of the big, bronze dog in the window. When he was told he bought him, had him fastened up tightly in a box and sent away over to Burma in a big ship.

How surprised that dog would have been if he had been alive! How wide he would have opened his eyes at the strange things he saw! But he would have recognized one face. The kind teacher, who had looked at him through the window in America was there in Burma, smiling at him.

Sure enough the teacher did have him put out on her lawn. He had not been there any time at all before all the space in front of the teacher's lawn was covered with the people of the village. They looked and asked questions of each other about the teacher's queer dog. Everything about him was so very strange that they were afraid to go near him.

"Come in," she said, "and feel of my watch-dog. He will not hurt you."

One by one they did come in and felt of him. Then they looked at the teacher and smiled.

"Why, he cannot take care of you," they said, "he is only iron."

"Don't you think he can?" asked the teacher. "What makes you think he is not a good watch-dog?"

"Why, he cannot bark and frighten any one," they said. "He cannot bite, either. We would not want him to take care of us."

"Then why do you trust in your gods of wood and stone to take care of you?" asked the teacher. "They are just like him, and yet you say they can watch over you. So many times I have told you that the true God is the only one who cares for you, and you will not trust Him. Come to Him now and let Him help you to be good and do the right thing."

So the dog preached a missionary sermon every day as he stood there on the teacher's lawn. Every time that a Burmese boy walked along the road he thought of what the teacher had said. When the little girls of the village passed that way they looked at the dog. They remembered, too, that he was only iron. So the dog said to them, "Love God." Many of them answered, "We will." Today in Burma some of the boys can still tell you about the kind teacher and her dog.—Missionary Magazine.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

He was a rough Aberdeenshire lad, the leader in every scrap of the boys of the parish, the ring-leader in all trouble, the very terror of the village. Not a window was broken, but that he did it; not a can was tied to a cat's tail but he did it; not a trick was played in any house in the village but he did it. A reign of terror from Jack's practical joking had come, and the wise old woman of the village prophesied all kinds of disaster to him, and these prophecies seemed likely to come true. Through all the terrible boyhood the mother kept true; she would never believe that these deeds were done by her boy. But at last one moonlight night he steals from his home, whose parental authority he disliked, even of his loving mother, and he gets a bark yonder in the harbor of Aberdeen, and he ships without a word, without a farewell, to the gold fields of Ballarat, when the gold fever was at its height. He lived a rough life in the bush; never a word from home, never a letter. And seven years have come and gone, and the mother she has pined away. As day after day passed her heart was broken, and the villagers, in solemn tread, gathered behind her coffin as it was put into the village church yard. She's gone—died of a broken heart. Better she would have been had the priesthood of her boy been given to her. She longed for one line, one expression of love, but she didn't get it. One day a rough-sweating miner gives a start. The record-beating nugget of the Ballarat gold field has been found, and he's a very rich man. As he looked at his fortune the better heart of him throbbed and he said, "I'll go home, and I'll tell you what I'll do—oh, mother, what I'll do for you! Is it possible that seven years have gone? But I'll make it all up; I'm going right away home." And with his fortune, the changed, loyalty-embracing man is pacing the deck of that vessel homeward, one thought in his heart—"Mother, oh, how neglectful I have been! what a shame on me!—mother who since my father's death has toiled herself to the bone to bring me up!—mother, that I've been so neglectful of! But, oh, won't she be proud as I go in? O what I'll do for her!" And as the bells of that vessel rang their wateles, that man, lonely, kept to his own walk; one thought he had in his heart: "Mother—I'll just tell her; on my heart she'll see that there was something in her wicked lad all the time." He did come home; passed through the Aberdeenshire village two miles out, to where by this time the twinkling light in his own home should have been seen. But there's darkness. Very likely she's visiting a neighbor—that's what she's doing. And the Australian man comes up, and, oh, horrible of horrible! that awful sight, too frequently to be seen in Scotland and Ireland—the roofless gables of an evicted house are to be seen. "My God!" says the man, "what has happened?" And he staggered to the neighborly farm fireside that he used to know so well, and into the warm heat of the blaze of the peat fire, did that man stagger. The family looked up—no recognition, for he's so changed. And he staggers to an empty chair by the fire, and he says, "Where's mother?" And they all realize that it is Jack returned home. One of that family breaks down, the daughter of the home, that had loved Jack in all his waywardness; tears stream down her cheeks. And he looks at her and the mother says to him, "Son Jack, we did it; they were to put her into a pauper's grave, but for her sake we put your mother into our own lot, and tomorrow we'll visit the grave." Tomorrow that school friend and Jack did visit the grave. "Yonder where the lilies are, planted by the hand you know, she is," and that schoolmate turned away as she overheard this, that was meant only for God; as he flung himself on the grassy grave, he said: "Oh, mother, I did love you!" But that ear never overheard it, that heart is stopped in its beat. Oh, Jack! no wonder that in your mansion tonight there comes a sad look into your face, and across the supper table there comes into your eyes what your wife and your school friend knows right well—that far-away, sad, beseeching look, thinking of mother's neglected heart. You never told her all your life that you loved her.—Baptist Commonwealth.

A SMALL POTATO.

A small potato is a small affair; but it is not wise to despise small things: they may contain the elements and beginnings of greatness.

A man in Tolland, Ct., found a very small potato in one of his pockets when he came in from his work. "Here," said he laughingly, to a boy twelve years old who lived with him, "plant that, and you shall have all you can raise from it till you are of age."

The bright little boy cut the potato into as many pieces as there were "eyes" in it and planted it. In the autumn he dug and laid by the increase of it and planted that in the following spring. Next year he planted the larger crop gathered the previous autumn. The potatoes grew healthily and did well, and his fourth year's harvest amounted to four hundred bushels. The farmer asked to be released from his bargain, for he saw the boy's planting would cover all his land.

If we were to live here always, with no other care than how to feed, clothe and house ourselves, life would be a very sorry business. It is immeasurably heightened by the solemnity of death.—Alexander Smith.

ON MAY DAY.

"Now this is a rare treat so you must be extra good," Weenty said as she untied the bonnet strings of Baby Betty. Baby Betty never so much as winked her china blue eyes, though her painted lips smiled as pleasantly as usual.

Tommy, the rag doll, was sitting as good as gold in Weenty's little perambulator. His toes were resting on a nice little basket. The basket was covered with a pretty white napkin. Under the napkin in the basket was the "rare treat." Three little raisin cookies and a big, plump gingerbread cake lay under the napkin.

You see, Weenty had taken Baby Betty and Tommy Rags out on the lawn in the perambulator. They were going to have a picnic together. A very special picnic, too, as it was the first of May so that made the picnic a May Day picnic.

Weenty settled herself comfortably under the shade of a lilac bush. Around her violets and dandelions made a very bright pattern sprinkled among the soft grass. The little girl put Baby Betty, Tommy Rags and the picnic basket in the shade of the lilac bush, too. Baby Betty was put to bed in a clump of violets while Tommy Rags sat up, quite stiff and proper, against the picnic basket to guard it.

"I'll make you both a nice May Day bouquet," Weenty said, setting to work at picking the flowers that grew nearest her. She had gathered quite a few and was busily putting them together in bunches when she happened to look up.

"Goodness me!" she exclaimed and rubbed her eyes. "Goodness me! Why Tommy Rags, what are you doing?"

What do you think? Tommy Rags was peeping into the picnic basket! Weenty could hardly believe her eyes, but there Tommy Rags was. He had pulled up one corner of the napkin that covered the cookies and was looking in hungrily.

Tommy Rags gave a jump when he heard Weenty speak to him. Just the kind of jump you might give if you were peeping into the cookies bin when you thought nobody was looking!

"I was just taking a peep," Tommy Rags said. "My, but the picnic does smell good. When are we going to begin eating it?"

"Oh, let's do start soon," piped up a small voice at Weenty's side. It was Baby Betty, who got up from her bed of violets and came over to Weenty. "Shall we have the picnic soon?" she asked coaxingly.

"We can have it right away, children," Weenty replied. "Just let me get these flowers tied up in a bunch. It's May Day, you know, and we ought to have a few flowers to celebrate, don't you think so?"

"Oh, yes," Baby Betty agreed. "Won't you put some in my hair? Tommy can have a nice big yellow dandelion in his blouse pocket to trim him up."

"Very well," Weenty said. "Now stand still, sweetie, and let muvver put these nice violets in your hair. There, darling, you are just lovely!"

"Now, Tommy," Baby Betty said, "it's your turn to be trimmed for May Day. Here's a nice big dandelion."

But Tommy was looking in the picnic basket again and Baby Betty had to quite pull him out by the collar. He had crumbs on his chin, too.

"Why, you naughty Tommy!" Weenty cried. "Can't you wait until things are ready?"

"But I'm hungry!" Tommy complained. "I wish we could have our picnic right now this minute."

"Very well, dear. I'll spread down the napkin for our tablecloth and we can begin our picnic." She took the nice white napkin and Baby Betty helped to spread it out on the grass.

"We can put some violets on for spoons," Baby Betty said.

"And here are violet leaves for plates," added Weenty, putting them on the tablecloth napkin.

"And a dandelion for butter," cried Baby Betty, "on a leaf for its dish!"

"And these long dandelion leaves for butter knives. Isn't this the nicest little table that ever was!" Weenty said, clapping her hands.

"And now we're ready for the picnic—" Baby Betty began, but suddenly her mouth and eyes flew open in dismay, "O-o-o-o! Look at Tommy!" she cried.

Weenty turned around in time to see Tommy running off with the ginger bread and a cookie.

"Tommy Rags!" Weenty called after him but Tommy ran faster than ever.

"And he's eaten all the other cookies too!" said Baby Betty. "Look, the basket is perfectly empty!"

"Mercy! What a bad boy he is!" Weenty managed to say. "Dear me! What shall we do? I suppose we must go and hunt for him. Maybe he hasn't eaten the ginger-bread and cookie yet. He will make himself sick eating so much!"

"Yes," agreed Baby Betty, her blue eyes beginning to fill with tears. "And I'll be sick from not having anything to eat!"

"Poor darling!" Weenty comforted her. She looked around quite distracted. She was almost ready to cry herself when who should come into view but faithful old dog Rover. He came up wagging his tail.

"What's wrong?" he asked, and Weenty was so worried about her children it didn't seem a bit queer for a dog to talk. Baby Betty and Weenty both told Rover at once what had happened and the good old dog nodded his head.

"I'll find Tommy," he promised, and trotted away.

He was back, too, in no time, holding Tommy in his mouth.

He dropped Tommy in front of Weenty.

"Oh, thank you, Rover dear!" the little girl cried.

"Don't mention it," replied Rover. "I'm always glad to do anything for you. May I give you a little kiss?" he came forward and put his wet whiskery nose on little Weenty's face.

"Dear me!" cried the little girl. "Dear me! Why Rover! It is Rover! And mercy me! I've been dreaming! Or have I been dreaming?" she sat up very straight. Near her the little picnic basket was lying quite empty and Tommy Rags lay beside it. "You naughty Rover!" Weenty said, shaking a finger in the old dog's face. "You ate my picnic, I just know. And here you are trying to put the blame on poor Tommy Rags."

Old Rover wagged his tail in a friendly way as though he didn't know he was being scolded. So Weenty began to laugh.

"I'm going to make you Queen of May, you old humbug," she told the dog. "You've eaten the picnic so you may as well be all dressed up for the day."—Selected.

WHISK'S REVENGE.

Whisk was a thrifty squirrel who lived in a big maple tree in some woods.

"No, not thrifty!" Mrs. Chippy Chipmunk would have said. "He's the most happy-go-lucky squirrel in the woods!"

Well, he wasn't a miser, Whisk wasn't. He was always doing good turns for others and giving his savings of nuts. One winter it was Silver, the little mouse, who came and lived with him. Then another winter Flick, the Chipmunk, had to be taken in. In fact, the thought: "Oh, well! If we get in a tight place this winter, Whisk will help us out. He always has plenty of nuts stored away."

Whisk was not a pretty squirrel. His sides were rather lean, his tail skimpy, like an old bottle-brush; but, my! how he would work. Every morning at dawn he was up and about, hunting, hunting through the forest for nuts and hardly allowing himself one bite. He had found a nice winter home in a hollow tree. This he had carefully lined as the nights were getting frosty. Every day the pile of nuts inside grew and grew.

"Brother Lightfoot hasn't been able to find many nuts this fall," he explained to Mrs. Chippy. "He had had bad luck, you see. I will probably have him and Flick with me this winter, so I have to get in an extra supply."

"Bad luck!" snorted Chippy, with a scornful swish of her tail. "There's no such thing as luck! Lightfoot is a vain, lazy fellow, and won't work. He knows he won't starve while you are here."

"He's young," said Whisk. "One can't expect him to be wise and experienced at his age."

Sometimes Lightfoot would get ashamed and pitch in and gather some nuts. He buried them rather carelessly near Whisk's house.

One day Whisk had gone quite far off for nuts and Lightfoot was in one of his good moods.

"I'll work hard today," he said. "I'll dig up those nuts I've buried and give them all to Whisk. Won't he be surprised when he comes in and finds his pile grown so much!"

Lightfoot went down to the brook first for a drink, then he sat and combed his fine gray fur awhile, after which he was ready for work. He went skipping through the branches when suddenly his sharp ears caught a disagreeable sound, and his sharp nose smelt a horrid smell.

"People!" he muttered.

Next, he went on more cautiously; but as he drew nearer to Whisk's house the sounds and smells grew stronger and stronger. Finally when he reached a tall tree close by, he peered down and saw the intruders. Three boys and two girls were gathered around Whisk's home. That was bad enough. Lightfoot drew closer and to his dismay saw what they were about. With merry shouts of joy, the children were stealing Whisk's winter store of nuts! They had found the treasure and were helping themselves. Lightfoot chattered with rage.

"Oh, look, there's a squirrel!" shouted one of the girls, pointing up. "I wonder if this is his nest."

"I bet it is!" laughed one of the boys. "A good joke on him! Ha! Ha! you've saved a lot of trouble, Mr. Squirrel! Thank you for all these fine nuts."

"Don't take them! Don't take them!" cried Lightfoot in his own language. "Whisk worked so hard gathering them. He'll starve this winter. You have plenty of other things to eat. Don't take his nuts!"

"Just listen to him scold, isn't it killing!" laughed another girl.

One of the boys threw a couple of nuts up and one of them nearly hit Lightfoot.

Betty Morris was the girl who had first spied the squirrel. She looked sober as Lightfoot darted away. Somehow it didn't seem quite right to steal the nuts.

"Let's leave a few for the poor little thing," she said.

Some of the others said No, and some said Yes, but in the end they did leave a few, then laughing and joking they went off to the brook to enjoy the picnic lunch they had brought along.

Pretty soon it was time to go home and they saw a thin, skimpy tailed squirrel who darted hurriedly up a tree. It was Whisk.

Lightfoot met him as he neared his home and told him the bad news.

"Well," said Whisk, "I think I saw those people. They were sitting near the brook. I saw a bag lying near a beech tree. It seemed to be full of nuts."

"Yes, they put the nuts in a bag," said Lightfoot.

"Too bad!" sighed Whisk. "But now you will have to help me gather another store. They didn't leave enough here for even one squirrel."

Lightfoot scratched his forehead thoughtfully. Then he flicked his tail.

"I know!" he cried. "Let's steal over where the thieves are and nibble a hole in the bag and get some of our nuts back!"

It was a bold plan, but both squirrels knew that the nut bushes in their woods were nearly stripped and it would be impossible to gather such a lot again. So they crept quietly through the woods until they came to where the children were standing around near the brook. The bag of nuts lay unnoticed at the foot of a tree.

One of the boys was talking in a loud, boastful voice.

"I'm a crack-shot," he was saying. "See that red leaf yonder? Watch me get it."

He pulled out a sling and bing! off came the leaf. He was a crack-shot all right. Whisk and Lightfoot shook with fear.

"I'm going down!" whispered Lightfoot who was young and daring.

"Oh, no!" gasped Whisk, but Lightfoot slipped silently down the tree.

When he had almost reached the ground,

Betty saw him. He knew she saw him, but patterned himself against the tree and stayed very quiet. Would she tell the terrible boy with the sling? There was no one else about Betty. Lightfoot watched her closely. Betty seemed to understand. She stepped quietly and quickly in front of the boy, pointed off in another direction, saying:

"Can you hit that beech tree there?"

This distracted everyone's attention, and Lightfoot slipped down to the bag of nuts. With his sharp teeth he cut the cloth tight near the ground. He had no time to do more for the children had picked up their things and started for home. The boy with the sling went carelessly over to the bag and flung it over his shoulder. He might have thought it was light, but on top of the nuts had been thrown a large piece of tree fungus which he had found and wished to take home, so he did not notice how light the bag felt as he raised it.

Off started the merry band, leaving their stolen nuts behind them. For most of them fell out when the boy raised the bag and the others tumbled out within a short distance of the spot.

As soon as the sounds of voices and laughter died away, Whisk and Lightfoot went to work as hard as they could for the night was coming on. My, how they worked, getting their precious nuts back into the winter house! Whisk did not even take the time to praise his clever young brother for his brave deed. Mrs. Chippy saw them hurrying desperately back and forth, and she kindly came and helped them.

"It's a pleasure to help people like you Whisk," she said. "You're always sharing with others. As for Lightfoot, I'm glad he's doing something at last."

When the last nut was put back into Whisk's pantry, and he had time to draw a breath, he explained how Lightfoot had saved the day, and how they did praise the young fellow!

"Well, he will probably amount to something when he once settles down," said Mrs. Chippy, as she hurried off to her nest.

As for the children—my, they were puzzled, surprised and angry when they found their nuts gone and the hole in the bag. Even Betty was surprised at first, but she and two together and the answer made her smile slyly and say: "Well, you know, we didn't gather the nuts in the first place, so perhaps we deserved to lose them!"

And she never told on Lightfoot—no, indeed!—Selected.

APPLE BUTTER.

"There's a whole barrel of stuff, just come from the farm!" announced Kit excitedly.

"Oh, yum!" cried her younger brother Denny. "Let's go and see 'em open it!"

Charles glanced up from his algebra, with a far-away look in his eye and a crease in the middle of his forehead. Kit and Denny ran out to the back porch where stood the barrel from the farm and near it, with a sweater hugged around her, stood Tubby Louise. Tubby and the barrel were strangely alike in shape and they both came from the farm. Tubby had been staying with her city cousins and going to school and the barrel came for her from her folks back home.

Mrs. Atwood read the clock. Jeanette opened the door and looked over on all sorts of good things, but she found no apples. Tubby Louise had been eating them.

She was all for that night on a whole new kind of soup, slices of ham and potatoes, but she was awfully hungry.

"I'll get some of the kids over," she said.

Mrs. Atwood gave her consent and Kit and Denny and their friends on the phone. Now, Charles had finished his home lessons and was home by ten o'clock. When he heard of the coming of their friends, he said he would like to have his friend, Joe Tucker, over. "I'll send him over," said Mrs. Atwood, but she was rough and dirty. Tubby Louise said she didn't care much, but she thought she would send him over. Mrs. Atwood was a kind mother, but she didn't think Charles would like to have his friend Joe over that evening, so Joe was left out.

Charles was just kind of hesitating, thinking about what to do to punish Louise and Tubby, when he fell on a large red calendar and found a good company. It wasn't artistic, but it was new, and Mrs. Atwood had just had it on top of the back-case. It gave Charles an idea. He wiped his chin, then he took the calendar and fastened it on to his room and locked the door.

Pretty soon he was back with his family and made a very satisfied expression. "What a tick!" went the clock, but no company appeared. Mrs. Atwood said she didn't think anybody was coming and the clock could stop on half an hour longer, but it wouldn't stop, starting with Denny.

The children were all pretty sleepy, especially the boys who had always been used to going to bed with the children. She was still hungry for apple butter, and during the last half hour she disappeared. Charles tipped the barrel and after awhile found her in the dining room sitting at the table, a half-eaten slice of bread and butter and apple butter on her hand. He looked at her a moment, then very wisely, he stuck a spoon into the apple butter and smeared the stuff over his mother's sleeping face. Tubby, like a good boy, was a sound sleeper, and he only watched a little while Charles was at work. He painted a fine sweeping moustache sideburns and goatee with apple butter on her and she never woke up. Then he disappeared, smiling secretly.

Meanwhile, Denny had gone up to bed, and the girls would soon be going. Mr. Atwood had just come in the back way after working hard at his office.

"Well, children," he said, "I thought you would all be in bed. There were a couple of minutes worth looking fellows hanging around in our back alley and I was mighty glad to see them safe."

"Oh, yes, all of you," said Mrs. Atwood. "Where's Louise?"

"Charles has found her. He look for her, but Mrs. Atwood said her face had red diving suit fast asleep."

"Oh, little niece, it's bad time," he called, helping Tubby to her feet. "Kiss your old uncle goodnight and run along."

Tubby kissed her uncle and hastened away upstairs. Charles and Kit had run on ahead and when she was half-way up, Tubby remembered the slice of bread and apple butter she had not finished, and she went back for it to the dining room.

As she crossed the hall and was just going into the diningroom, she saw a figure slink out of the kitchen. She was too scared to scream, but she stood still and stared. The dark figure stopped and stared too, then suddenly it flashed a light in the girl's face.

"Oh, gee!" she heard a voice whisper, "What did I tell you? Small pox!"

Then Tubby gave a scream and Mr. Atwood rushed out of the living-room.

"Hands up!" commanded a gruff voice, and Mr. Atwood's hands went up.

The light was flashed on Mr. Atwood.

"Oh, gee!" muttered a voice. "He's got it too!"

That was all, the dark figure and another just like it, which had been lurking in the corner began backing off, and they backed clear out of the back door.

"Now, what's the meaning of all this?" Mr. Atwood demanded. "I bet I forgot to lock the back door and those are the toughs I saw a while ago in the alley."

He cautiously entered the kitchen and found that he had forgotten to lock the back door and the pair of would-be robbers had followed him into the house. But why had they gone away without stealing anything?

It was a great mystery. Mr. Atwood did not want to frighten the rest of the family by telling them about the robbers, but Tubby knew already. He found her standing near the dining room, still too scared to move. He turned on the lights. What a sight met his eyes! Tubby Louise's face was staring at him as if she had lost her wits.

"Louise!" he cried in great alarm, "Look at your face!"

"Uncle John!" cried Tubby, "Look at your face!"

Mr. Atwood rushed to a mirror and viewed his own face. It was just like Tubby's, apparently covered with scabs. He whipped out his handkerchief and wiped his face. The scabs came off. Then he wiped Tubby's and looked carefully at his handkerchief.

"H-m-m, apple butter!" he said. "I kissed you, Louise. I think you must have had your nose in the apple butter jar. But why did the robbers think we had small pox?"

Well, that was something he never found for sure, because his son, Charles, slipped out quietly and removed a large red sign from the front door. It was made out of a calendar and on it was lettered in large printing, SMALL POX.

Kit and Louise found out his trick to keep their friends away that evening, but they didn't tell on him that time, because he promised not to bother them if they had a little party the next night. Of course, he would have told on himself and gotten the credit, if he had known that his sign and his trick on Tubby had saved his family from being robbed. But it's just as well he didn't know, as he really should not have been encouraged to play jokes.—Selected.

Hope is the mother of faith.—Landon.

Davidson Circuit.—Last Sunday was a good day for our church at Lineberry. We had with us Brother Wachter of Silver Hill who gave us a lecture on his tour around the world. He was born in London, England, and was educated there. He has traveled through Japan, India, China, and told us how that these people would bow down to their idol gods and how anxious they were to find and learn of the true God. He told us about the hardships, the difficulties, and some of the propositions that our missionaries had to go up against and plead for our support in their behalf. At the close of that address we received Brother and Sister Jesse Morris into full membership in Lineberry church. They come from the M. P. church at Denton. Brother Morris did the first work that was done in the erection of Lineberry church and was a charter member here. We welcome them back to Lineberry. We are to have a Children's Day exercise at four of our churches during the month of June. Lineberry comes the first Sunday in June (all-day service). One of the attractive features of this program will be the address at three P. M. by Rev. N. G. Bethea. I think that a large majority of our people on Davidson circuit are going to take advantage of this opportunity to hear him.

Last Thursday was a sad day for our church at Chapel Hill. At 11 A. M. the funeral of Brother Charles Lax was held in the presence of a large crowd. Brother Lax was a good man. He was converted last October and joined the Baptist church at Gravel Hill. Funeral service was conducted by a former pastor, Brother West, of Star, and Brother Calwell of Gravel Hill, assisted by the writer. He leaves behind a wife and eight children. At three P. M. services were held for Charley Lomax, who was killed by train No. 36 near Kannapolis the day before. This was one of the saddest funerals that I ever witnessed. This young man was 22 years old and was on his way to get married when the fatal accident occurred. His intended bride was perhaps fatally wounded. He made a profession of religion four years ago but had never joined any church. He is the son of Henry Lomax of near Chapel Hill. He leaves behind a father, one brother and two sisters. Funeral conducted by the writer, assisted by Brother Shaner, pastor of Hillsboro Methodist church. On account of the great throng of people both funerals were held out under the Tabernacle. We pray that the Heavenly Father will comfort all the bereaved ones in this sad hour, and that on account of the death of these dear ones that we may all be drawn into closer fellowship with our God.

C. E. Ridge.

Denton Charge, Canaan Church.—We are not dead. I do not think any man could die hearing such good sermons as our pastor, Brother Loy, is giving out to us. I never saw a man improve so fast as Brother Loy has. We thank our Master for such a young man as he is. Everybody seems to love him and his companion. They are inspiring people.

The writer will have to brag on the Canaan people. They will go to Sunday school or die. Roads aren't too rough or muddy for them.

Our prayer meeting is every first and third Sunday each month. Preaching 11 o'clock every second and fourth Sunday keeps us on the job. We do not have time to quit, so we just keep on. We have missed but one Sunday since last conference. If there has ever been a time for those who profess to know Christ as our Savior to get busy, it is today. The harvest is ripe and the laborers are few. Let us press to the mark of the high calling.

Wedding bells have been ringing in our community this week. Mr. Paul Martin and Miss Pauline Galimore were married last Thursday at our church by our pastor, Brother Loy. Mr. Theodore Ridge and Miss Hat-tie Bell Smith were married Saturday. The two couples are intelligent young men and women and are good Christians. Brother Ridge and Brother Martin are members of our church. We wish them a long and happy life in our Master's service.

A Sunday School Boy.

May 26.

High Point.—President R. M. Andrews of High Point College delivered the sermon at the Children's Home in connection with the commencement last Sunday evening. The exercises are being held on Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week, to which the friends of the Home are cordially invited.

The Brotherhood, or Men's Club, which was recently organized among the men of the church, held a pleasant meeting last Thursday evening, and the members of the Ladies' Aid society served supper to them. This new organization will doubtless prove to be both beneficial and enjoyable.

Dr. Andrews announces that Mr. Homer Rodeheaver, who is Billy Sunday's famous singer, will be present at chapel at High Point College one morning of this week and sing for them, the definite date to be announced later. The people of the city are invited to come out and hear him.

A telephone has been installed in the church, and Dr. Brown can be reached every morning from 9:00 to 12 o'clock in his study.

There will be no prayer meeting Wednesday evening on account of Chautauqua, which is giving entertainments in the tent on the city lot every afternoon and evening this week, and is being attended by large crowds.

Mrs. Lester Peacock and Miss Blanche Burgess have been elected delegates from the A. M. Idol Philathea Class to attend the Baraca-Philathea convention in Raleigh June 11-13.

Mrs. George R. Brown is attending the Executive Board meeting of W. F. M. S. in Washington City.

Mrs. A. L. Ellison is visiting relatives in Toceoa, Ga.

Lewis E. Teague is the newly elected prosecuting attorney of the municipal court of High Point. Dr. S. S. Coe was re-elected city physician.

Miss Lily Nelson Mason of Durham spent the week-end with Mrs. Ben T. Moore.

Reporter.

State Street, Lexington.—The work of the church has been going forward encouragingly during the time this reporter has been silent. The Sunday school enrollment has more than doubled itself and the attendance is almost as good. A young men's class has been organized recently with Mr. Curtis Koonts as teacher. We have all the departments in the Sunday school now that any well organized school has, and every department is wide awake and enthusiastic.

The Christian Endeavor society is well attended and very helpful and interesting. The young people seem to consider it a privilege to work in the society. As for the preaching, no better preaching can be done than Brother Bethea does for us and no better leadership could any church have than we have in him. Great things will be accomplished by our little band if we can be fortunate enough to keep him.

The service on Mothers' Day was beautifully and impressively rendered—one of the most pleasing features being a duet by Mr. and Mrs. Bethea. Every one present was given a souvenir of Mothers' Day in the form of a book-mark bearing a beautiful poem entitled, "To My Mother," by Kate Douglas Wiggin. These were presented by our pastor and highly appreciated by all. We are all hoping that no change may be made, at least any time soon, to take our pastor from us. This is rather selfish, as he is worth so much more than we can pay him, but we are all just that selfish in this one respect.

Mrs. J. F. Burkhardt, Reporter.

Shiloh Church, Connelly Springs Charge.—We had Sunday school and preaching last Sunday. Our pastor, Rev. R. Gurtner, preached. Brother Gurtner brought a friend of his, Brother Scarlet. He led in prayer.

Our Sunday school is growing; everybody seems interested, and willing to work. We have a lecture from one member of each class each Sunday. Roxie Gins, Reporter.

Death of Mrs. Vannah King.

On April 22, 1925, death entered the home of Mr. W. H. King and claimed his dear wife, aged 44 years. Her illness was but a few days, but her sufferings were great.

She professed faith in Christ at the early age of 12 years and joined the M. P. church at Hawkins Chapel and was a faithful member until the end came. She always did all she could to build up her church and Sunday school. Never missed many appointments as long as she lived in this community. She served as Sunday school teacher and reporter to the Herald for many years

On December 26, 1923, she was happily married to Mr. W. H. King of Thelma, N. C., and lived near Thelma the remainder of her life. She is survived by her husband, father, mother, three sisters and one brother and many relatives and friends. Our loss is her eternal gain. Two of her brothers preceded her some years ago.

Vannah was a good woman. She never worried over difficulties in life; always looking for a brighter day. She will be greatly missed in the church and entire community and especially missed in her home.

We have the deepest sympathy for her husband and pray God's blessing on him that he may look to God for comfort and prepare his life on this earth that he may some sweet day be with her again. We believe if we will live the life she did we will some day be with her in perfect rest and joy.

Her funeral service was conducted at her home by her pastor, Rev. J. B. O'Briant. Songs were rendered by her community friends. Several nice bouquets and wreaths of flowers were given her by her sympathizing friends.

Her body was laid to rest in the family cemetery at her husband's father's, Mr. Tom King's, in the presence of her many friends whose hearts went out in sympathy to her bereaved ones.

B. L. S.

Moore.—Mrs. Lacy Moore on Saturday night, April 11, 1925, passed from this life to life eternal, aged 25 years. She was married to Lacy Moore April 22, 1917. She is survived by her husband, two children, Lewis, six years, and Adelle, four years; also her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. M. T. Hargrove; three sisters, Mrs. Jesse Hockett, near Greensboro, Manner, and Oleane; also two brothers, Grey and Neal.

Ava, as she was known by her many friends, professed faith in Christ early in life and joined Concord M. P. church, Saxapahaw circuit, of which she was a faithful member until death. We, as the Philathea class, will miss her cheerful voice and sunny face with which she greeted every one she came in contact with.

On April 13 the funeral service was conducted at Concord by Mrs. Marguerite Hackney, of the Friends church, of which Ava's mother was a member, assisted by Rev. H. L. Isley, pastor of Concord church.

The pall-bearers were her former school mates, namely,—Rosa and Beulah Johnson, Lizzie Lewis, Aleane Marlette, Swannie Crayton and Emma Guthrie. The flower-covered mound and the large crowd of sympathizing friends were proof of the love we had for Ava. May her influence live for good and heaven's richest blessings rest on the grief-stricken relatives and friends.

Mrs. L. E. Guthrie.
Emma Guthrie,

Crabtree.—John J. Crabtree died May 19, 1925. Funeral services conducted by the writer at Chestnut Ridge church May 20, after which the remains were laid to rest in Chestnut Ridge Cemetery.

Brother Crabtree lived to be 78 years old. He had been a member of Chestnut Ridge church for several years. His neighbors speak of him as a good man, one who attended strictly to his own business, and did not meddle with the affairs of others. A man of a quiet, peaceful disposition.

It is a joy to the writer for people to voluntarily say good things of those who are gone.

INTERESTING AND SUGGESTIVE.

Roger W. Babson says church people control 80 per cent of the buying power of the country, and that 80 per cent of the business buildings are owned by active church members. They own 76 per cent of bank savings, 62 per cent of the factories and 81 per cent of the farms. Verily the Lord blesses those who serve Him.

Think of a woman by the side of a dying sister, or a sick child, or a sorrowing friend, or a broken-hearted and broken-spirited man, without a word of heaven in her mouth—without so much as the ability to whisper, "Our Father," or even to point her finger hopefully toward the stars.—J. G. Holland.

THE VALIDITY OF RELIGION.

The liberty, the freedom, the democracy we speak so much about are big ideas and require more of those enjoying their benefits than we are apt to realize. I see no vehicle but the church, with its message to the secret spirit of men, by which to fashion an essential character. This institution, imperfect as it is, divided as it is, partial, priest-ridden, pew-rented, full of dry-bone doctrine and deadly traitorism, is, in spite of all its defects, the one institution dedicated to making character and basing its message upon the Sermon on the Mount. This badly battered, upheaven world needs nothing so much as a high type of integrity and lofty character, the making of which is the real work of religion.—Dr. Carl Reiland.

GLADNESS.

Are you not sad for sorrows past?
No! I am glad they did not last.

Do you not hate the false you knew?
No! I love more the good and true.

Do you not mourn for work undone?
No! I rejoice for triumphs won.

Have not Life's struggles wearied you?
No! They revealed new work to do.

Do you not fear the long, dark night?
No! I await the coming light.

Surely some dread the future marts.
No! Hope and Faith can see the stars.

MARS.

March had come in like a lion and little Betty Roberts was staying home from school with a cold and the blues. Betty's home was in the city but there was a vacant lot near it, with a tangle of elderberry bushes and grass which almost made one feel comforted. Beyond the vacant lot was a rain-gutter house with uncertain windows where lived an old bachelor with two spotted dogs.

Betty stood looking out of the window at the vacant lot and the house beyond, watching the few skinny trees shake in the wind and the rain coming down steadily in earnest. It was a fine day for ducks, her mother had said.

"I wish there were some ducks here or something," sighed Betty, and just then she saw the two spotted dogs, according to the old bachelor. They were running all around in the vacant lot with their noses to the ground and every once in a while they would howl in a very sad and low way. Betty was rather afraid of dogs, even if it was only to have something to watch.

Suddenly Betty saw something grown whisk into view and squat down in the brown withered weeds. It was a rabbit.

"The March hare! thought Betty, and she stared at the little creature.

The two spotted dogs were circling round and round, making that dreadful noise.

"They must be playing!" Betty thought. "My! it sounds horrible. They're just like wolves chasing somebody. Oh! Oh!"

She threw open the window, for now she knew what the dogs were after. They were hunting the March hare. She took down the rain and began shouting at the dogs.

The landlady, June, was in the basement. When she saw Betty out in the rain, she opened the cellar door and called to her to come in. But Betty paid no attention.

"Shoo, you heard things!" she yelled at the dogs, who with sea and fiery eyes were sniffing and running all around in the vacant lot. "Oh, I hate you!" she cried. "You're going to eat the March hare."

Just then one of the dogs made a grab and something brown skipped high in the air. The dog's dripping red jaws just missed the rabbit's foot by such a hair's breadth. Betty was screaming with excitement.

Suddenly out from the tangle of grass dashed the little brown furry creature. The days fell over each other in confusion. There seemed no refuge for the rabbit, when suddenly it rushed through the open door into the basement of Betty's home. The dog rushed in after it, and Betty, of course she had always been afraid of dogs, ran in too.

When she got inside, June was sitting up on top of the stationary clothes screen. "Help! Help! Mad dog! Police!"

The rabbit was nowhere to be seen, but the two spotted dogs were there, then, everywhere, sniffing and baying with such a so hollow and terrible cry's heard only to freeze at the sound.

Perhaps the dogs were looking for the rabbit so much was heard of the animal. The policemen and people had been chasing the wolves. There's no doubt that the dogs' needs are apt to be pretty plain. Betty showed that she was no coward. Instead of crying and running away, she clabbed up on something and yelling, she looked for something to scare the dogs off with. She saw the hose, conveniently fastened to a faucet.

When, as a dash, she had the water turned on full and grabbing up the hose she pointed it at one of the animals, and then a loud shriek, which began the hose around to get the second dog, Betty accidentally hosed poor June who happened to be in the way. June lost her balance on the tubs and half fell, half jumped down, landing almost on one of the dogs. The dog was so excited, it turned and nipped the woman on the leg.

"My! Then you would have thought the end of the world had come. Such yelling, shrieking, yelling and thumping, you never heard! The dog held right to the hose and sprayed the dog's right out of the cellar.

"Oh, June dear, forgive me for wetting you," Betty cried, turning off the water.

"Never mind, honey," sobbed June. "I don't mind water, but that dog bit me and I'll be getting the hydrophobia! Quick, if you don't send for the ambulance!"

June's cries had brought Mrs. Roberts down. The injured woman was taken upstairs and the doctor sent for. The bite wasn't serious, but June was sure she was doomed to have hydrophobia. Betty stayed where she was and looked around silly. From behind the door came a brown nose. The March hare was safe!

Betty let the little creature alone and went upstairs. There was the doctor and the bachelor who owned the dogs.

"The dogs are bad," he was saying. "I'll make it up to you for the bite."

"No," said June. "Ten dollars won't make me safe for the hydrophobia."

"The dogs will have to be shut up, and treated for hydrophobia symptoms," said the doctor.

"They were only after a rabbit," explained Betty then. For though she was afraid of dogs she did not like to have them blamed for what they hadn't done. "They didn't mean to bite June."

"Never mind," snapped June. "I ain't big. It takes ten dollars for such a scare and I'll go to court and the judge will make 'em pay me a whole lot, Mister."

The bachelor looked awfully worried, and Mrs. Roberts sighed and said: "I really can't help it."

"Suppose the animals had attacked the little girl?" said the doctor sternly. "You have a right to keep dogs in the city."

That gave Betty an idea. She would do a good turn to the March Hare. She suddenly found her hands together.

"Oh, I know!" she cried. "Mr. Jones," that was the bachelor's name. "Why don't you send the dogs away to the country, or keep them chained up?"

"He'd better," muttered June, stroking her injured leg.

"I will," promised Mr. Jones. "I know of just the place. I'll send them away at the opportunity."

"And keep them chained up meanwhile, please," said Mrs. Roberts. "Naturally I feel worried about my children."

Mr. Jones was glad enough to promise, and after a little coaxing June took twenty dollars damages for her bite.

Betty went dancing to the window and looked out into the vacant lot. There under a brown and withered elderberry bush crouched Mr. Rabbit.

"Now, you can have the whole place to yourself!" Betty told him. "I'm going to feed you, too, and maybe you'll get tame. I know you're the March Hare and a fairy. Maybe you're really a prince and you're bewitched and the dogs are really wicked wizards or gnomes."

When Betty's older brother and sister came home from school, they heard the whole story, and were pretty sore because all the excitement had to happen that day instead of on Saturday when they would have been home and seen it. They soon saw the March Hare, too, and named him Mars, because March is the month of Mars, the god of war.

"You'd have thought so," said Mrs. Roberts, "if you could have heard the racket he caused in the cellar. It sounded like a war, that's certain."

Mars soon became quite tame and would come when called and eat bread from the children's hands, and if any dog chanced to come that way, he would dash through the cellar window, left open a crack for his benefit, and hide behind the coal bin.—Selected.

WHAT DO THEY THINK OF YOURS?

"I wonder what kind of a mother that boy has."

"It is easy to guess."

Two boys were playing marbles as two ladies came slowly along the walk. Just as they were passing one of the boys jumped up with a angry face.

"That isn't so, Jack Pierce, and you know it."

"It is," cried Jack. "I beat you fair. You're mad because you're beaten. You always get mad."

The angry boy struck his companion and ran away.

Will and Harvey had been watching the game and heard the remarks of the ladies. Later in the day the two were talking with their mother, and told her of the little occurrence.

"They talked as if Rob had a poor sort of a mother," said Will. "And that isn't so. Mrs. Spencer's a real nice woman, and ever so kind to us boys."

"And so good to Rob," chimed in Harvey. "It's a shame for folks to say such things."

"But it is a very natural thing to say," said mother. "Don't you know that most people judge of a mother by what her children are?"

"O mother," said Harvey, in grave concern, "do you mean that people will think that of you, if we are not good?"

"Certainly they will, my dear, if they think at all about it."

"I never thought of that," said their sister Elsie, coming up and laying her head on mother's shoulder.

"They shan't dare to think you're not the best mother in the world," said Will, fiercely.

"It is for you, dears, to show what kind of a mother I am," she said, putting her arm around Elsie.

"Mrs. Spencer does try to make Jack good. I know," said Harvey. "She talks to him about his temper and he promises, and then when he gets angry he forgets and flies up again."

"So, by his not heeding her talk he leads people to misjudge her.

"We won't any of us get into passions, like Bob—" began Will.

"No; but what do people think when they see a boy in school so full of fun that he neglects his own lessons and leads others into trifling, to the great annoyance of his teacher?"

Will gave a rueful little shake of the head.

"Or when a boy goes to school with rough hair and unblackened shoes, and keeps his desk in such disorder that his teacher writes a complaint about it?"

"That's me," said Harvey, meekly.

"Or when a little girl—"

"Don't say a word, mother," pleaded Elsie, hiding her face. "I know I've had bad lessons all the week, just because I've been sewing for my new doll and never went to study when you told me."

"Well, I'll tell you what," Will braced himself up, "if any one, because of me, has been thinking poorly of my mother, it's time I was facing about, and that's what I'm going to do."

"Me, too," declared Harvey.

"And I," said Elsie.

"But don't, my dears," said mother, "begin your improvement simply because of what people will think. Try to do right because it is right—to be good rather than to appear good. Then there will be no doubt of what will be thought of mother."—Selected.

—Rev. L. W. Geringer preached a very impressive sermon on "The Dangers of a False Optimism" last Sunday night in Calvary church. The situation today calls not for an easy-going optimism but for the most strenuous efforts of reformers in whose ranks all Christians should be found. The world will never be right until it is Christ-like. He especially condemned the moving picture entertainments that are offered the public. Even those represented as Bible pictures are so presented as to make modest women blush.

—A visitor in Calvary church last Sunday morning was so impressed with the sermon that he felt called upon to express his appreciation to the preacher. But he was mistaken as to the preacher's identity and gave his compliment to the wrong man—Brother J. Norman Kirkman.

—A quartette of singers composed of Brothers Trogdon, Reynolds, Coble and Coble from near Tabernacle sang in Calvary church last Sunday night in the church service and greatly pleased the congregation. They were accompanied by Mr. Roland Fentriss, music teacher, who performed at the piano. A company of ladies from the country also sang one song very effectively. We are always glad to have our friends from the country worship with us as well as our friends from the city.

—Calvary church now enjoys the service of a bell weighing about half a ton. This has been mounted on a neat iron frame in the rear of the church. We are indebted to Mrs. J. A. Cox for initiating the movement that resulted in this addition to our equipment.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

It is with deep sorrow that we write of the death of John Thomas, oldest son of Mr. J. T. and Mrs. Dovie Huie Jennings. He was born September 21, 1900, departed this life May 15, 1925.

"Tom" had never made an open profession of faith in Christ, but led a very quiet, peaceable life, and had the honor of never giving his parents a cross word, was friendly and kind to all, which seems a true characteristic of the Christian spirit. He leaves besides his parents one brother, Augustus, who feels so keenly the loss of his only brother, eight sisters, and a host of friends to mourn their loss.

Tom's general health was not so good; but no one had expected the end so soon, until early May 14 he was taken seriously ill, and carried to a Statesville hospital, where he died next day of peritonitis.

The funeral was held in Zion Baptist church in the presence of all the friends that could get in the church and hundreds standing on the outside. His body was gently laid to rest in the cemetery there, beneath a beautiful mound of flowers, to await the resurrection.

Tom was a very energetic boy, and had a great desire to prepare himself for a useful life. He had worked hard in school, perhaps much of the time when he was not physically able, and had just about completed his preparation when the end came. He received his education at Mars Hill College, Maryville College, Tennessee, Lenoir-Rhyne College, Hickory, and the University of North Carolina.

During the dark hours of sadness, a host of friends and relatives gathered in and around the home to express their sympathy. But only God who gave, and has taken away, and doeth all things well, can sustain in this great bereavement, and may He add His blessing, and Christ's burden-bearing presence be realized with every sorrowing heart, is our prayer.

Mr. Jennings is not a member of our church, but lives in our midst, and being nearer our church than their own, the family attend our Sunday school and church services often, and have been helpful to us in many ways which we appreciate and feel deeply grieved with them in the loss of their dear son and brother.

Dearest Tom, thou hast left us;
Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that hath bereft us,—
He can all our sorrows heal.

Mrs. H. T., Reporter.

Nancy Ellen Thompson.

In answer to the summons of her heavenly Father, trustingly the soul of Mrs. Nancy Thompson passed from earth to eternal life on May 8, 1925. Mrs. Thompson was in her 83d year, having been born in 1842. Though for many years almost an invalid, her mind was clear. Possessed with a cheerful disposition, she was a delightful companion to old and young. Mrs. Thompson was one of the oldest members of Orange Chapel church, having joined at the age of nine when the church was then called Flint Hill. She was a devoted member of this church. Before the infirmities of age prevented, she was one of its most diligent workers.

Mrs. Thompson's husband, the late Alson Thompson, preceded her to the grave many years ago. She is survived by seven children, among them being Professor R. W. Thompson, superintendent of Chatham county schools. All of them are members of the church.

The writer conducted the funeral at Orange Chapel Sunday afternoon, May 10. Her tired body was then laid to rest beside her husband.

H. L. Isley.

Mrs. Lacy Moore.

Ava Blanche Moore, the second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. T. Hargrove, was born March 18, 1900, and passed from this life April 11, 1925. She was converted and joined Concord Methodist Protestant church when just a little girl and remained a true Christian, bearing her suffering with patience to the end.

On April 22, 1917, she was married to Mr. Lacy E. Moore. Two children were born to this union—Lewis and Adell. Mrs. Moore also leaves behind father and mother, three sisters, and two brothers.

It may be asked what glory there is in an early death. There is no glory in decay, in a prostration of all the animal powers, in being shut up in the tomb. But there is glory in a state of exaltation, in the celestial radiance of heaven, into which the liberated soul enters and dwells with God. The soul of the Christian is released from flesh, rises, free from temptations and all sorrows, to perfect, endless felicity. We believe that Mrs. Moore made the necessary preparation, and that she now wears a crown of glory. The funeral service was conducted at Concord church by Mrs. Margaret Hackney and the writer. Her body was then laid to rest in the church cemetery.

May the blessings of God rest upon the young husband, the two children, father and mother, brothers and sisters. H. L. Isley.

A Tribute.

In the passing of our dear friend, Mrs. Nancy Thompson, Orange Chapel has lost one of its oldest and most faithful members.

For many years she had been in feeble health and had not been able to be with us very often. We will sadly miss her, but realize that her family will miss her more.

Be it therefore resolved:

That we bow in humble submission to His will, and

That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family, to the Methodist Protestant Herald, and to the Chatham Record.

TO METHODIST PROTESTANTS EVERYWHERE.

As president of the Union Board of Foreign Missionary Administration of our denomination I am appealing to you through this note to contribute liberally to the Children's Day offering that will presently be received in your church and Sunday school.

Your Union Board is greatly in need of money. Our missionaries are appealing to us for funds to build churches, and employ workers, to adequately care for the great success that has followed their labors, and I am passing their appeal on to you.

For the past six months we have been saying to them, "Be patient until the Children's Day offerings begin to come in, and we will see what we can do for you."

Their appeal is for a church building at our College in Nagoya, so as to provide for the 1100 young men there a place to hear the gospel.

We have no church building in India, and one is greatly needed for the girls' school, the boys' school and the large community.

Every letter practically from China calls for money for building houses of worship, for we have no church building there either.

Beloved, we cannot turn a deaf ear to these appeals. Help us by your gifts to make the offering this year on Children's Day the largest in our history.

Every dollar of it will go to the Union Board, and will also apply on your local church budget for benevolences.

J. C. Broomfield, President.

AN ADDITION TO THE PROGRAM OF THE PASTORS' SUMMER CONFERENCE PROGRAM.

Rev. F. J. Baylis, president of the Illinois Conference, will address the Pastors' Conference on Thursday afternoon on The Community and Rural Church. Brother Baylis has had a wonderful success in this kind of work, and, I think, may help us to solve some of our rural church problems; and perhaps start us in the community church work. We are especially anxious that our rural pastors shall hear Brother Baylis.

"AN INEXCUSABLE FOOL!"

Mr. Editor: I was very much surprised to see in the M. P. Herald, May 21, page 14, the above expression. When one can say that Jesus was "an inexcusable fool" if he didn't do this or that he seems to me to be far gone as to taste or good judgment. It certainly did not add anything to the strength of his argument, nor was it calculated to interest or enlighten any one. All the discussions, that I have ever seen, concerning God's process of creating the world and man, seem to me to be "tommyrot." Egotists on either side may spout words all they like, but they cannot make any truth deny any other truth. The Bible says that man was made out of the dust of the earth! The scientist calls us back to the green slimy pond. What difference can it make, whether God wet the dust or not? The Bible says that man was made "in the image of God." Can anyone say that he must have had two feet, or a stomach, or backbone or liver or kidneys; or that he had none of these? Could we be satisfied with God as a sponge or a jelly fish? Could we think of Him as having any kind of body? Suppose we quit all the foolishness, including quotations from "The Word of Life," if that is the best it can do.

S. R. H.

—After wrestling with the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy for days the Presbyterian General Assembly referred the matter to a large commission to report on it a year hence. Some of the questions at issue will not down and yet it is impossible to bring men to agreement on them by the vote of councils. The individual man insists on the right to think for himself. The opinion of councils will help some men to rest of mind, but others wish to consider the evidence and judge for themselves. Let bodies of men express their common opinion if they will, and let individual men who wish to think for themselves have the liberty. It is not well for men to fall out over mere differences of opinion. Yet when churches employ men as teachers it is of course proper that they demand men who will teach what the employing churches believe. There is no conflict between old truth and new truth. The conflict is between old error and new truth or between old truth and new error. All Christians should contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, but they should be sure that the article they contend for is really an essential part of the faith delivered to the saints in an authoritative way.

"Why, the thing goes off while I'm asleep," Bism.

—Different Bibles were used at the inauguration of Harding and Coolidge. President Harding took the oath on the Bible used at the first inauguration of George Washington. The Bible used at the Coolidge inauguration had been given to the President by his grandmother. The book was open at the first chapter of St. John during the ceremony of taking the oath. President Coolidge had learned to read that chapter when only a small boy.

MY MOTHER AT THE GATE. A PRAYER.

The way is long, Father, and sometimes very weary. We crowd and bruise one another in passing and often we forget the goal in the heat and hurry of the pilgrimage. Start us forth, we pray, each day with fresh courage, and whisper in our hearts a little song to gladden our steps as we take up the burdens anew. Grant that the lightest of these may ever be your conscience, and may we never be too laden with personal trouble to carry the balm of sympathy for friend and foe. Above all grant us the gift of clear vision, that we may pierce the doubt and fears of the passing moment and dwell with unfaltering confidence upon the ultimate fact of thy love. GREENSBORO, N. C., JUNE 4, 1925.

NUMBER 30.

PLEASE REMEMBER.

All members of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church will please remember the call for a special session of the Annual Conference for June 9, 1925, at 10 o'clock A. M. This conference will open promptly at ten o'clock. It is a very important meeting and all ministers and delegates should be present on time. Also many others have been invited to come and we hope they will not disappoint us. And if you are a Methodist Protestant who is thoroughly interested in the work of your conference you will find a hearty welcome in this meeting. The object of the special session will be stated in the opening minutes of the conference, so be present in time to hear.

Yours in the Master's service,

A. G. Dixon.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE.

Why Have These Young People's Conferences.

1. Because such conferences are needed to deepen the religious life, broaden the vision, and train the young people for church work.
2. It is financially impossible for the individual church to put on such an extensive program and array of speakers.
3. The individual churches could not secure the services of such speakers and teachers for the small number they would have to take the courses.
4. Few churches have individuals who would spend the time, energy, and patience in planning for and putting across such a conference.
5. These leading young people today are the leaders of the church tomorrow. Their early acquaintance, training together, and co-operation in these conferences will make for a more harmonious and efficient labor together, therefore a more effective church in the Master's work.

What to Bring.

- Necessary bed cover and linens for single bed for ten days.
- Necessary toilet articles and towels.
- Tennis racket, shoes, and other athletic equipment.
- Musical instruments.

I would suggest that all bedding and athletic equipment be securely wrapped, addressed to yourself in care of High Point College, and mailed by parcel post at least five days before the conference convenes.

Conference Delegates.

Those who plan to attend the conference should send $5 room reservation fee at once to Rev. N. M. Harrison, Jr., High Point College, High Point, N. C.

REV. A. G. DIXON, D. D.,

President North Carolina Conference of Methodist Protestant Church, who will teach the course in "Principles of Christian Living" at the Young People's Summer Conference, High Point, N. C., June 15-25.

Registrations.

Every Methodist Protestant who is interested in the future of the Methodist Protestant Church should register. If you do not have a registration agent in your church show your interest by sending the registration fee to Rev. Lawrence Little, Concord, N. C.

Registration Card.

Below is given a copy of the registration card to be filled out and mailed by all who attend the Young People's Conference. You will greatly facilitate the work of the conference if you will fill out this copy in the Herald and mail it at once to the director of the conference. Then you will not have to go through with this matter when you arrive.

Live as long as you may, the first twenty years are the longest half of life.—Southey.

The young people who attend the Young People's Summer Conference at High Point College, June 15-25, will, in these ten days, spend a third as much time in actual class instruction in Bible as they would in the Sunday school in a whole year. They will spend two-thirds as much time in class instruction in missions, if they pursue that course, as they would in any of the missionary societies in a year. In ninety-five per cent of the cases those who pursue these courses will spend several times more time in the Young People's Summer Conference in the study of evangelism, denominational polity and program, recreation in the church, week-day religious education and daily vacation Bible school, organization and administration in the Sunday school, methods in Sunday school and Christian Endeavor work, story telling, and child psychology, than they would in the local church in a year. They will hear nearly twice as many sermons or religious addresses as those will hear in a year who live in the rural districts and have services once a month, or they will hear a fourth as many as those who live on stations where services are conducted twice a Sunday.

These instructors and speakers are among the very leading men and women of the entire country.

Is the Young People's Summer Conference, therefore, worth while? That question can better be answered with another question. Can the young people afford to stay away? Can the church, pastor, or parents afford to permit them to stay away?

It is impossible to estimate the far-reaching effect of these conferences. Eternity only will reveal it. High Point College, North Carolina College for Women, and the University of Michigan are feeling in a measure the influence of these conference in the persons of former conference delegates there pursuing courses of study in preparation for service in the foreign fields. Doubtless number of others will follow the lead of these young people if we continue to build better programs, put more prayer in our plans, and assemble the young people in session from year to year.

Not only have the colleges felt this influence, but churches from four corners of the state, which have been represented at the conferences, have been more indelibly impressed.

Notice, Children's Day at Vickrey Church.

The Children's Day is to be held at Vickrey, Guilford Circuit, on the second Sunday, June 14. Rev. N. M. Harrison will be present to make a talk. We are expecting a good day and would like for every one that can to be present for the all-day program.

PRESIDENTIAL PERPLEXITIES.

By Rev. A. G. Dixon, President of the North Carolina Conference.

Please do not judge from the contents of this paper that I have grown pessimistic and cynical, under the exacting duties of the president of an annual conference for two and one-half years. Recently a minister wrote me and rather sarcastically referred to my burdens, and in replying I told him that problems were not always burdens and that I was having a good time, trusting the Lord to help me solve all my problems to his glory.

Brethren, I believe any Christian should have a good time serving the Lord in that place where his church calls him to serve, especially when he can see the Lord's work prospering in his hands.

I could, perhaps, write a better paper on "Presidential Joys and Encouragements"; but I was asked to write on "Presidential Perplexities," and I am truly glad that I am simply to state the perplexities and not to solve them. I may not even state all your perplexities; for I have not had your experience of two and one-half years as president of a Methodist Protestant annual conference.

A few cramping laymen and a few time-serving preachers cause most of the presidential perplexities. All honor to our faithful laymen and laywomen in the Methodist Protestant Church today, who are pushing on with a deep set desire to do God's bidding on earth. And blessed be the faithful preachers of these twentieth century times whose all goes into their service for Christ and the church. The great majority of preachers with whom I have had to deal are noble, self-sacrificing soldiers of the cross. I believe all of us should recognize the fact that the Methodist Protestant minister of today, whether he be a circuit rider in his Ford or a village or city pastor, walking and riding the street cars, is just as truly a hero of the cross as was the old-time Methodist minister with his horse and his saddle bags.

Some of the presidential perplexities are:

I. Cramping Laymen.

Here and there you will find a cramping layman, who never suggests any improvements or forward movements whatever, and, if anybody else plans progress, he will pull back harder than a balky mule; and the shame of it is that his balky spirit is contagious, making it possible for one non-progressive member to hold an entire community back in church work. Whether it be paying the budgets, building new Sunday school rooms, building a new church, building a college, or raising a college endowment, the cramping layman is a great hindrance to the advancement of God's Kingdom in the earth.

Recently the High Point College endowment was presented to a good congregation, and the speaker was in a fair way to get a good list of subscriptions. Realizing that a good subscription was about to be made, one of these cramping laymen said: "Brethren, remember that we will have a hard time paying our pastor." After that remark, not one subscribed to the college endowment. The cramping layman makes every enterprise outside the local community hard to put over, and he even stands in the way at our fourth quarterly conferences, and helps to keep pastors' salaries just as low as possible. They seem anxious to enter into that old-time agreement with the Lord that they will keep the pastors poor if He will keep them humble! The cramping layman must have the dynamite of heaven put under him, and the electricity of God's marvelous love must shock his heart, before he will ever get out of the way of Kingdom progress.

II. Delegates Who Do Not Understand.

All of us believe in lay representation in our annual conferences. That is one of our fundamental principles. But in so many instances our delegates to conference do not seem to understand that they are expected to take part in all the conference transactions. That they are to study the church problems, and that they are to help solve those problems. Such delegates go to conference to get a preacher, and when they feel that that task is accomplished they hie themselves away for home, and are ready to accuse the stationing committee of being mean if they do not secure the preacher they expected. In a case like this at one of our conference sessions, such a delegate was so persistent about getting a preacher that he mistook another layman for a preacher, and taking him aside he asked this layman to become his pastor. The other layman asked the ordinary questions about the salary and the parsonage and the number of churches to be served, and then replied: "Well, that is a mighty poor salary, and the parsonage you describe is hardly fit for a man to take his family into; but you see the stationing committee and if they assign me there I'll go, and by George I'll do my best!"

III. Lack of Method.

In many of our churches it is so difficult to get the laymen to adopt any system in looking after the church finances. They seem all too satisfied to go along in the good old way, which is to allow things to drag along until near the end of the year, and then a few of them try to pay what they can. I am particularly interested in the thought of getting every member of every church to pay a definite amount, and to pay that amount regularly. Weekly if possible, if not weekly certainly monthly. The every-member canvass is the only way to bring this about.

IV. Lack of Piety.

This lack is found both in the pew and in the pulpit, but it can be tolerated a bit more in the layman than in the preacher. It seems to me that no man ever knows preachers fully until he has served in some such capacity as president of a conference. I used to think that all preachers were pious and deeply consecrated, and I am glad to know that most of them are. But, alas! it was a sore disappointment to me to find that not all preachers are good men, and that some of them can be absolutely unreasonable. In a few instances you will find petty jealousies that would be unworthy a ward politician. No president, no, not even a bishop, can know how to deal with perplexities like this.

V. Ministerial Laziness.

For lack of a better term I call this ministerial laziness, though the men referred to here are not otherwise lazy, and usually they are such good men that they are very difficult to deal with. A conference president, who has crossed over the river, once said:

"A preacher who has a mind to do it get by with as little service as any other living man, and the people will put up with it."

It is that kind of preacher that I am referring to here. He preaches once or twice a Sunday and seems to think that his entire obligations have been discharged to his people for the entire week, and that he has a perfect right to go back home, look after his own affairs for the week, and then go back and preach to his people the next Sunday. Such men are far better at rendering excuses than they are at producing results. They will excuse their people for not raising the budget because of crop conditions, labor conditions, weather conditions or political conditions. And they will excuse themselves by saying, "I appointed collectors, or a committee to collect the budgets, and they just didn't do it."

VI. Anchored Preachers.

These are pastors who will not move! They have good homes and they do not have to preach to make a living. Notwithstanding their call to preach the gospel, some of them will tell you that rather than move they will just have to drop out of the ministry. Some such men are fair with the stationing authorities and seem perfectly willing to accept whatever they can get, within reach of home; but others seem to feel it very keenly if they do not receive appointments which their ability otherwise would command. These men are frequently considered all-time pastors, but necessarily much of their time can not be spent on their charges. Then at conference sessions they can never be considered for fields remote from their homes.

VII. Lack of Conviction About Kingdom Needs.

The president of our General Conference recently said in a very helpful leaflet, "Carrying on the denomination can not be done by loving it or boasting about it, but only by furnishing the money to enable it to do the work which Christ commanded it to do."

No denomination can command public respect which does not pay its bills; that is to say, which does not its part in the large scheme of Christian work.

The expense in carrying on our denomination in this work is summed up in what we call our denominational budget.

Cramping laymen get in the way of raising our annual conference and General Conference budgets, but the fact remains that our pastors are the "key men" in the task of raising these budgets. In some cases, I know pastors can not raise these budgets, because their laymen will not budge. But in most cases the pastor can raise the budgets, if he has an overwhelming conviction that the needs of the Kingdom demand that they be raised. There is a feeling among us that we can somehow get along without raising the budgets and we can; but, brethren, the church of our God lags, and men and women are remaining unsaved, because God's servants are so slow in bringing His money into His treasury, that his church may be properly financed. And these conditions will remain unless we can get the pastors of our charge to realize that God's Kingdom delays for lack of consecrated dollars. Our preachers and our people must come to know that the Kingdom suffers just in proportion as they fail to raise these budgets.

VIII. The Lack of Better Trained Ministers.

All our conferences, I suspect, are using men in the pastorate who could not get even a low grade certificate to teach in our public schools. Occasionally there is a noble character with a great deal of native ability, who can lead the people to higher things without more mental training than that; but usually when men of that type are sent out to preach the gospel, "poor sheep look up and are not led." There are noble exceptions, but the rule is that we must have better trained ministers. Recently I received a report from one of our older pastors, and in that report he said: "I aim to get every cent of every claim if possible." Half the words in that simple sentence were spelled incorrectly, and the capitalization was all wrong, but this man has been remarkably efficient on a certain class of appointments. He has religion, he knows his Bible, and he is energetic for his Christ. But he will in all probability be shelved much earlier in life than if he had had better educational advantages.

Some months ago I was called to hold a first quarterly conference. The former pastor had moved and the new pastor wished me to be with him in his conference. As the minutes were being read by the secretary, I noted a reference to an "adversary committee." As the conference proceeded one of the young men present asked me if they were right in calling that the "adversary committee." I replied, "I am glad you asked about that; for I was supposing it referred to the advisory committee." Whereupon he said, "We didn't think it was right, but our former pastor taught us to call it an 'adversary committee.'" That man is comparatively young in the ministry, but he can not go far unless he applies himself very rigidly to the study of books.

The most perplexing problem any president of a conference has to deal with is the problem of inefficient ministers, and all of you know that we would not tolerate it for a moment if there were enough efficient ones to man our charges. This must be remedied, and to do this the very brightest and best of our homes must be offered to our Lord. Anything less is not good enough. Higher moral standards and clearer spiritual vision are needed in those who lead, and we must have men better qualified intellectually. It is a tragic hour in the church when the preacher who does not know the meaning of the words in the Book tries to lead into holiness and service those whose knowledge of such matters is far greater. While piety is indispensable to Christian leadership, piety is just one essential to the large and exacting qualifications for preaching the gospel of Christ. We must have a better trained ministry whether these ministers get their training in the schools and colleges, or whether they get it pouring over their books and journals and magazines as they burn the midnight oil in their own studies. The people do not care how the minister gets his training, but they are asking that he be trained for the service he undertakes to render. And, of course, better pastoral support must go hand in hand with better pastoral supply. The Master said, "The laborer is worthy of his hire," Luke 10:7. Laymen are clamoring for pastoral visiting and for better preaching. They doubtless have a right to expect this, and, if they do, then in order to supply these demands the fields in most cases must come to pay better salaries.

IX. The Loss of Members.

The sole business of the church of our Christ on earth is to reach and win the unsaved, and to build up and strengthen the saved. We build churches, pay pastors, run Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies, and organize missionary societies, and pay budgets all for the purpose of strengthening the saved and winning the unsaved. And yet in the face of these facts it seems difficult to conduct the affairs of a group of Methodist Protestant churches, constituting a conference, for twelve months without a loss of members. I am sure that many of you feel this as keenly as I do. Our people move about like other people, and in a great many instances when they do move they go into communities where there are no Methodist Protestant churches, and many of them do the only sensible and righteous thing to be done, they join other churches and go to work for the Master in the new community in which they have cast their lot. Then too, many pastors trim their church rolls to the very bone to keep down budgets. However, I am persuaded that we lose more through change of residence than through the trimming of church rolls.

The conference I serve had a net gain in 1922 of 420, in 1923 of 845. Then in 1924, in spite of the fact that good revivals with splendid ingatherings were reported, and in spite of the fact that pastors' reports to the president just before conference showed a net gain for the year of 1,166, these same pastors reported to conference a loss of 356. This is a painful experience to those of us who are anxious to build up the Master's Kingdom. It does not help to swell our ranks, but it does help our feelings and our self-respect to know that we lead many people to Christ who make fine workers in other churches.—Address in Meeting of Conference Presidents, Indianapolis, Ind.

THE FOLLY OF EGOTISM.

To think more highly of one's self than he ought to think is a common error, subversive of real happiness, and dangerous to the highest well-being. Such extreme self-consciousness is a practical denial of man's low estate by means of the fall. It ignores the actual deservings of sinning creatures. It is perverted vision of one's relationship to the just and all-wise Sovereign of the universe.

This inordinate self-esteem tends to under-rate others to the same extent to which one's self is overrated. It is the case of the big I and the little you. Depreciation of another's good qualities and achievements is the senseless and ineffectual attempt to pull one's self up by pulling others down. The victim of pride becomes blind to his own faults but keenly sensitive of the faults of others. The Pharisee in the temple saw nothing wrong in himself, but the publican from his viewpoint was an outrageous sinner.

Egotism invites the righteous judgment of Almighty God. Paul wrote: "For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world." This means that if we would maintain sober, humble, unworthy and undeserving opinions of ourselves, we would become largely exempt from the corrective chastenings of the heavenly Father. For the purpose of divine chastisement is to help rid us of overt or secret faults.

God is jealous of the glory due to His name. To relegate to one's self the credit and honor that belong to the Giver of every good and perfect gift is but to bring down upon him a large measure of divine displeasure. Nebuchadnezzar was lifted in pride and self-glorying over the achievements that God had bestowed upon him, and he was smitten with the nature of a beast, and ate grass with cattle for seven long years. Herod took to himself the honors that belonged to God, "And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten of worms and gave up the ghost."

"He that exalteth himself shall be abased; but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."—The Word of Life.

GLADNESS.

Are you not sad for sorrows past?

No! I am glad they did not last.

Do you not hate the false you knew?

No! I love more the good and true.

Do you not mourn for work undone?

No! I rejoice for triumphs won.

Have not Life's struggles wearied you?

No! They revealed new work to do.

Do you not fear the long, dark night?

No! I await the coming light.

Surely some dread the future mars.

No! Hope and Faith can see the stars.

—James L. Hughes, in Exchange.

PRAYER.

O God, we thank Thee that Thou hast said Thou wilt dwell in the thick darkness. We have felt Thee nearer to us in the night than amid the distractions of the day; and when a night of trouble has settled down upon us, and, like Jacob, we have feared the daybreak and the adversaries it brings, we have been forced to cling to Thee until the clinging brought deliverance.

We thank Thee also, good Lord, for withholding Thy blessing until we wrestled for it. If we had won it on cheaper terms, it would not have been half so precious. O may we belong to the princely tribe that wrestles with Thee and prevails. May we resolve not to let Thee go until Thou givest us the blessing. May we obtain the grace of reconciliation with angry brethren, of deliverance out of apprehended difficulty, of peace in place of strife. And may we go forward in our pilgrimage, looking for that land of promise where we shall settle down at last, for Christ's sake. Amen

—A certain firm issued an order against smoking cigarettes, whereupon an employe wrote that he had been handling freight there for thirty years, all the time smoking cigarettes, and that no one had ever found fault with his work. To this the manager replied: "Thirty years ago you and I started together where you are today, but you are still handling freight, and will be to the end of the chapter."

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT.
Mrs. J. M. Stone, Editor.

We are giving you this week the report from the finance and budget committee of the Woman's Home Missionary Society.

Please note carefully the recommendations. We are especially interested in that Scholarship Fund. Will your auxiliary raise $100 to loan to some worthy boy or girl to go to High Point College?

Notice the months named in which to raise the money for each object. If you did not raise the necessary amounts for April and May you have July and August in which to make up any deficit. Don't you like the idea of having a specified object to work for in each month?

Finance and Budget Committee.

We, your committee on finance and budget, wish to recommend that our apportionment for the year be $3,000 as follows:

General Fund	$ 100
Pine Ridge	800
Pittsburgh Mission	50
Bethel Home	500
Business Girls' Home	50
Foreign Work in Ohio	100
Children's Home	1400

$3000

With an additional apportionment for the Thanksgiving offering which goes entirely to our Children's Home, and for the High Point College Scholarships, so that the entire apportionment for the branch may be $4500.

We recommend that each auxiliary wherever possible raise $100 each for a scholarship Fund for High Point College for a period of five years.

We recommend that separate months be specified for the raising of funds for the various interests of our society, namely:

April, General Fund.

May, Scholarship, for High Point College.

June, Business Girls' Home in Baltimore.

September, Bethel Home.

October, Foreign Work in Ohio.

November, Children's Home.

January, Pittsburgh Mission.

March, Pine Ridge.

The auxiliary apportionments are as follows:

Asheboro	$175	Mebane	$150
Asheville	50	Mt. Lebanon	50
Bethel	40	Moriah	110
Bethany	20	Mt. Carmel	70

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Saturday and Sunday, May 30 and 31, were spent at the District Rally in the third district. The rally was held at Mt. Hermon church, and was well attended. The Ham-Ramsey meetings in Burlington were closing, so a number of our people who would otherwise have attended the rally were kept in Burlington, but the attendance at Mt. Hermon was good on both Saturday and Sunday, and we confidently believe that much good was done.

These rallies afford a splendid opportunity of presenting the various interests of the church from the Junior Christian Endeavor society to the saving of communities and to financing the Kingdom. The program was well planned and nearly all the speakers were present with well prepared messages.

A Word to the Wise.

Word has been sent out this week to every charge calling attention to the financial stress in which our conference treasurer, Rev. S. W. Taylor, Burlington, N. C., finds himself. This message is calling upon each charge to make a special effort now to send in a substantial payment on the annual conference budget. If every pastor on every charge will do this it will be helpful to you and to the causes in need. In a recent note from the treasurer of our Board of Church Extension he says,—“The situation with the Board of Church Extension is becoming somewhat acute, and I have thought it well to inform you of it, so you may do anything you can to speed up collections.”

All of us believe in our church extension work and a quick response, right now, from each charge, will relieve the situation. A word to the wise is sufficient. You are wise, so please respond quickly.

Summer Conferences.

Our pastors are all expected to attend the Pastors' Summer Conference at the Children's Home June 15-19. Do not fail us. We need you, and we believe you need us. Drop a card to Rev. E. G. Lowdermilk, Children's Home, High Point, N. C., and tell him about when you will arrive.

Some charges are raising funds to pay pastors' expenses. We trust all will do this.

The workers and the young people are expected to gather at the High Point College June 15 to 26 for the best yet Summer Conference. We are expecting our largest and best Summer Conference. Don't miss it if you can possibly help it.

June 19.

Friday, June 19, is Everybody's Day at the High Point College. On this day the leading address will be made at 10:30 by Dr. Ira G. Landreth of Boston, Mass. Dr. Landreth is one of the leading platform speakers of America, and will bring us a thrilling message on that day.

After his message a picnic dinner will be served on the grounds. So bring your dinner and spread it with the rest. We are trusting that thousands of our people will gather at the High Point College that day.

Appointments.

Sunday, June 7, A. M., College Commencement, High Point; P. M., Welch Memorial. Sunday, June 14, Alamance Charge.

June 15 to June 26, Summer Conference at the College and Children's Home.

Yours in the Master's service,

A. G. Dixon.

Dear Co-workers:

I have just received a copy of the S. O. S. from Dr. Woodford, superintendent of our Pine Ridge work. We are all rejoicing that the work there is going so nicely and is prospering so well. God is surely good to us, and we appreciate His blessings and the enlarged opportunities of service He is giving us in letting the work prosper so much that we need the enlarged buildings in which to care for it. God's promotion day is when His work demands larger things of us. And the great need for this high school building comes to us as an evidence of His approval and His co-operation in the fine work being done at Pine Ridge. “Without me ye can do nothing.”

Last year in order to house the high school we had to partition off two of the corners of the church auditorium in which to hold classes and some of the rooms in which the grades recited were so crowded that the teachers could scarcely move about among the pupils. It is practically impossible for the teachers or the pupils to do their best work in such crowded quarters. We have a beautiful site on which to erect the high school building. It will be three stories and while plain will be commodious and well adapted to the needs of our work there. It will be a brick building and more permanent than anything we have there yet the beginning of greater things for us.

Please do notice that Dr. Woodford says that the money is needed at once. We need to have this building completed by September when school opens. Away there off from any of the stronger Methodist Protestant churches without the personal contact and influence of influential Methodist Protestants to encourage and back-stand him, it takes real courage and faith in God and man to undertake an enterprise such as Dr. Woodford is undertaking and I am calling on his personal friends, his church friends, every member of the Woman's Home Missionary Society and of the entire Methodist Protestant Church to remember him in their prayers and with whatever contributions they can make to help in this great undertaking. Any free-will offering that you wish to make you send direct to Dr. Woodford, Pine Ridge, Ky. While all contributions it is desired to have count on the General Conference budget must go through the proper channels—to the branch treasurer where there is a branch, and to Mrs. W. B. Gilligan, 3406 Elgin Ave., Baltimore, Md., our national treasurer of the W. H. M. S., or to Mr. H. C. Staley, 516 North Charles St., Baltimore, Md. where there is not a branch in the conference, or if you do not know the officers of the branch. If you have money in the bank drawing four per cent, the W. H. M. S. will take it as an annuity and pay you five per cent during your life time or we will take it at five per cent for two, three or four years, with the privilege of returning it sooner if we can, or when you need it if you should need it before the time is up. Let us hear from you if you have money to lend on either of the above plans whether in large or small amounts. Be sure thought that you pray for this work and for the W. H. M. S., and where you are not having a woman's home organization in your church let me know and help you get one started or send our organizer to help you get started.

Yours in His service,

Margaret K. Dixon.

Midway, Haw River Circuit.—Brother Reed preached to the young people the fourth Sunday; it was fine, but the congregation was small on account of so much sickness in our community. Was sorry there were not more of our young people out. Am sure those who were there were inspired to do better and to try to become useful men and women.

Yesterday our Sunday school was very well attended and we decided to have Children's Day. Miss Frances Butler was appointed to take charge of the children. It will be announced later at what date this service will be held.

Two of our Sunday school boys are in St. Leo Hospital. John Haynes who was taken there four weeks ago today is improving nicely and is expected to come home this week. Tom Butler was operated on two weeks ago today; he is improving and we also hope he will soon be able to come home.

Our protracted meeting will begin the fourth Sunday in July. Hope every member of Midway church will begin now praying for ourselves, and if we get our hearts right with God, we will have a great revival. Pray for us.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

In a series of studies such as are now being presented in this column, it is proper to look to the beginnings in American history for indications of the purposes of our Heavenly Father. These are numerous in the civil, political and religious life of the nation.

Never before in the history of the world has there been gathered under one flag such a polyglot, rainbow-hued population as we find in America at the present time. Here we have the first Americans, the original race on this continent, one of the finest races of untaught people that has been found anywhere in all the world. How it must have pained the heart of God Himself when our first settlers began to kill and to destroy these "Children of the Wilderness." With their sturdy character, and their native intelligence and courage, what an asset they would have been to the nation in those earlier days and what a contribution they could have made to the civilization of today. Only within very recent years has America begun to recognize her obligation to the red men, and to value them as potential citizens of this great republic. Here is an unfinished task.

Here we have the American Negro, so-called to distinguish him from the native African. He came here against his will, and was kept against his protest, but now he represents more than ten per cent of our total population. And, it is but fair to say that no type in America is more loyal to God, and to country, than these descendants of the people who once were the bond slaves of the nation.

The yellow race and the brown race is here in limited numbers. We cannot maintain our American standards of living perhaps, and throw open our doors to the unknown millions of the Chinese and Japanese who are looking for the opportunities accorded in this great land, but the future must reckon more definitely with these races which now seem so alien to America.

Then we have the Spaniard crowding in from Cuba, from Mexico, from South America, and from his native land. There is the Mexican. Nobody wanted him. No one is his friend upon his arrival. But the Mexican has firmly established himself in the economic life of the United States. Vast areas of the country are dependent upon his labor. His children and his children's children will live here as American citizens. Our future is bound up with theirs, and we should know them, think about them, plan for them, and with them in the constructive and worthwhile things of life.

In our home missions study courses this year, we have as our general subject, "The Slav in America." According to the census of 1920, there were 4,923,703 Slavs in America, amounting to 4.5 per cent of the total population. More than eighty languages and dialects are represented in New York City, peoples "out of every nation under heaven," and they are widely scattered throughout the entire land. Why are they here? We cannot answer, "for economic considerations" and dismiss the subject. They are here in part as a response to God's call, and in the fulfillment of God's plan for America.

BOARD OF EDUCATION ITEMS.

The annual meeting of the Board of Education which was held at Indianapolis at the same time as all the other boards was successful and encouraging in every way. It is no small task for half a dozen men to review the work of one year and make the plans for another of such an organization involving so great responsibilities as that of the Board of Education. The report of the executive secretary necessarily goes into considerable detail in order to mirror his activities, aims and purposes. But every phase of the work is given careful consideration and every recommendation weighed thoroughly and thoughtfully before accepted, modified or rejected. The record of the year's work revealed increased funds in all departments, larger contributions to the colleges and seminary than ever before, evidences of prosperity in the majority of our schools, over one hundred young men studying for the Christian ministry of the Methodist Protestant Church, more being helped this year by means of the Student Loan Fund, a substantial increase in the offerings for Rally Day, endowment campaigns under way or in immediate prospect, and a growing recognition and appreciation of the value of the work being done by the Board of Education. Our greatest need is for funds not only for the work of the board itself but also for our institutions. Their usefulness is limited and the future made uncertain because of inadequate income due primarily to insufficient endowment. Our schools are well managed but poorly financed. No special changes were made in the program of the board except in the distribution of its funds. Instead of making the distribution by an agreed upon percent specific sums were designated. It was also decided to set apart something each year for the permanent Ministerial Education or Walker Fund. Whether or not it will be possible to carry out these plans depends upon the way the church supports the General Conference budget.

The offerings for Rally Day this year reached the very fine sum of $15,055, just a little in excess of our bravest hopes. That means the returns from this special day were nearly $5,000 more than ever before and $1,500 more than for the best year for Educational Day. This is indeed encouraging. However, when we remember that the offerings for the two days last year came to $22,000 and that Rally Day must do duty for two days the situation is not quite so enthralling. We are at least $7,000 short this year on the one day of what was received last year for the two days. We are expecting, however, that as the church understands this situation they will give increasing support to Rally Day. We anticipate a substantial increase this fall over the offerings last fall.

A recent letter from Rev. J. C. Berrien, D. D., secretary of the board for many years, brought its usual encouragement and inspiration. His interest in the work is unflagging and rejoices as greatly over the achievements of others as he ever did over his own. In fact, they seem to give him even greater delight. He follows with unabated interest the cause of ministerial supply and education but he is equally devoted to the Student Loan Fund, in a substantial and material way also. He prays for "our boys" who are preparing for the ministry with the same old earnestness and intensity, his love and concern for them being as strong as ever. He says, "The future of our church depends upon them."

We are glad to report that less than $100 is now needed to finish the amount required to care for our Student Loan beneficiaries this year. We are sure this will be all in hand before the close of the school year. The response of our people to this cause has been most gratifying. Although there are no denominational budget revenues we are confident all our needs for next year will be taken care of as generously as were those for the year just closing.

Another bit of good news. It was not necessary to use any of the money coming from the General Conference budget to help our ministerial beneficiaries. The income from the invested fund and return payments came within a few hundred dollars of meeting our requirements. We closed the year with a slight deficit which has since been provided for from our income. However, unless our permanent fund can be substantially increased it will be necessary to rely upon the budget receipts. The new policy of giving scholarships to college men taking the course in our Seminary will rapidly deplete our income from return payments so that something must be done to increase our invested fund. Some friends are making annual contributions for this fund and it is gradually growing but not as fast as it should.

The last reports reaching us about the campaign for $375,000 endowment for Western Maryland College were very encouraging. Fully $200,000 had been provided for with every indication that the entire amount would be secured within a short time. President A. N. Ward has planned the campaign with splendid foresight and he is being ably supported by alumni and friends. A good share of the entire state of Maryland is aroused to real enthusiasm. The city of Westminster as well as all of Carroll county has responded most generously, raising their quota in a few days. The entire denomination will be highly pleased to have this campaign succeed. It will be an inspiration to all our schools.

Word has just been received that Rev. W. O. Jones, D.D., formerly president of York College, York, Nebraska, has accepted the chancellorship of Kansas City University. Dr. Jones was very successful at York and comes to Kansas City not only with the experience of a college administrator but as a successful pastor and evangelist. We hope to be able to give the readers of our church papers a sketch of his life and work that they may come to know the man who must carry the great responsibility as head of Kansas City University. The entire church extends to Dr. Jones their best wishes and earnest hope for the largest possible success.

NO CAUSE TO BE ANXIOUS.

Some superintendents and others may be concerned, because Children's Day supplies have not been ordered in time for holding a service on the second Sunday in June. There is no need for that, that is only a suggested date.

Sunday schools have always been accustomed to select their own time for holding the service, governed largely by local conditions. You can hold a service when it best suits you, but be sure to send me an order for the supplies as soon as possible.

It has frequently happened that an epidemic of measles, and other diseases in communities prevented the holding of the Children's Day service when planned.

The time when flowers are most abundant and other considerations have influenced in the selection of the date for holding the service, and some schools hold their service in May, many in June, and others later. We have received every year some orders in July, and in August a very few, but the latter brings it too close to the special day of the Board of Missions. If your package of supplies fails to reach us in June, as far as possible.

Explanation.

Be assured that every order which reaches this office has immediate attention, but the orders which are first sent to the Pittsburgh and Baltimore Book Concerns are subject to some delay and, of course, the postal service is beyond our control, and there delays occur. A few mistakes will be made, despite the best care we can give, but we gladly correct them as soon as reported to this office.

If your package of supplies fails to reach you in a reasonable time after you sent the order, please notify me, and the matter will have prompt attention. Orders which reach us towards the end of the week, if from some distance, cannot well reach destination in time for use on Sunday, so order early.

Our Advertisement.

Have you noticed our weekly advertisement in the church papers? We are most anxious to have every Sunday school hold a Children's Day service this year, to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of the introduction of the service in our Sunday schools, and to honor the memory of Rev. Dr. F. T. Tagg who issued the first service in 1895.

It now seems assured, judged by the orders received to date, that a larger number of schools will hold a Children's Day service this year than ever before, but all of the 2,000 schools reported to the General Conference ought to share in this, and your school ought not to fail to hold a service.

Hurry up with your order, brother superintendent, get the supplies now, have ample time to prepare for the rendering of the best service possible, and we think the supplies sent out by the Union Board will make that possible.

Then too the Union Board is in great need of a large offering, and the Sunday schools can, through the Children's Day service, raise the money, and, if properly directed, one-fourth of your church's budget can be raised, and we earnestly hope it will be done. We count on you and on your school to help us reach the goal.

SUPERANNUATES AT YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE.

Realizing that the Methodist Protestant church which we young people have inherited and are today enjoying is due to the loyal, consecrated, untiring efforts and devotion of the older men and women, particularly the old ministers of our conference, we are extending an invitation to all of the superannuates to be the guests of the young people at the Young People's Conference during its remaining days after the close of the Pastors' Conference.

The only thing we will charge them is the cost of a letter written at least a week before the conference convenes, telling us that they are coming.

It will be a great inspiration and a great pleasure for the young people to have you brethren with us. N. M. Harrison, Jr.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCES.

For several years the Board of Young People's Work has been meeting with most gratifying results in its summer conference work. This year will undoubtedly surpass all previous records. We now have twelve conferences definitely arranged with tentative plans for three additional ones, making a total of fifteen.

The schedule is as follows:

Date—Conference—Place.

June 1-7—Louisiana—Grayson, La.

June 15-19—West Virginia—Bridgeport, W. Va.

June 16-26—North Carolina—High Point, N. C.

June 21-24—Georgia—Atlanta, Ga. (tentative).

June 25-28—Alabama—Montgomery, Ala.

June 29-July 5—Indiana—Marion, Ind.

July 6-12—Illinois—Petersburg, Ill.

July 13-19—Texas—Tehuacana, Texas.

July 27-Aug. 2—Maryland—Westminster, Md.

Aug. 3-9—Pittsburgh—Stahlstown, Pa.

Aug. 10-16—Ohio—Sabina, O.

Aug. 20-23—Tennessee—(tentative).

Aug. 24-30—Arkansas—Magnolia, Ark.

Aug. 24-31—Iowa—Missouri—Farrar, Ia. (tentative).

The need of a better trained leadership is quite apparent if we are to meet the challenge of our present opportunities.

Pastors and churches will therefore do their young people and leaders a great service by making it possible for them to attend one of these conferences.

A strong program is being arranged for each conference and we are sure that they will not only be interesting but profitable to all who attend.

May we count on your full co-operation in this most important work for the youth of our church.

E. A. Sexsmith,
Executive Secretary.

FICTION—OXEN—DEPRAVITY.

By W. Bruce Doyle.

Nuco is a butter compound or substitute. A man goes to the manufacturers and applies for a traveling man's position, asserting that he can "talk up" their products. He goes out on the road as salesman. He visits grocermen in his territory and tells them that oleomargarine is a dangerous food, that cotton seed oil is dietetically dangerous, that too much coconut oil is a dangerous fattening food, that the vitamins present in "cow butter" are not found in Nuco. News of this reaches the company. The young man is discharged—as he should be.

Other traveling salesmen, sitting in a hotel lobby, fall to talking of this case. "Served him right—the dirty pup"—is their verdict. Nothing is said here about the Nuco Company being reactionary or moss-backed, nothing said of freedom of speech, or the world's need for "new light."

Cello-glass is an excellent substitute for glass in hot beds and poultry plants. A brilliant young man applies at headquarters for the position of advertising man. But he has had no training for such work. The company puts him in a school they built with millions of dollars, to be trained by teachers whose salaries they pay. The young man completes his course of study and is sent out as publicity man for the Cello-glass Company.

He writes advertisements—for magazines, for daily papers, for booklets. And behold this young publicity man advertises that Cello-glass is inferior to real glass, that it is not impervious to all kinds of weather, that it is difficult to frame, that it is not so good as other glass substitutes such as glass cloth. His advertising reaches the company offices. He is discharged.

At the Union Station, waiting for a train, a group of men fall to talking of this case. "Treacherous buzzard," is the unanimous verdict. The company educated the whelp, paid his salary, and he declared his faith in Cello-glass, the hound!

FICTION: The above paragraphs are fiction, but true to life.

A young man is educated in State schools at the expense of a public which is preponderantly Christian. He applies to that state for a position as teacher. He goes into the classroom and teaches that the idea of a God originated in superstitious fear, that man originated from some insect and arose by the power of his own might, that there is no Divine revelation because there is no Divinity. The Christian public dares to speak of this. And what a furor! Great is the clamor about turning on new light, about research, about reactionary mossbacks, about freedom of speech. "Does every one have freedom of speech except a teacher?"

A young man joins a church. He offers himself to that church as an applicant for the ministry. The church sends him for years to schools for which she paid millions of dollars, sets him at the feet of teachers whose salaries she pays. He takes his ordination vows, "swears allegiance" to his church's creed, and goes out to preach from her pulpits. But, he teaches her children what she does not believe, he preaches the tenets of her opponents, he extols other theologies over hers, he seeks to win her constituency for another with whom she is not in accord. If the church dares to raise her voice in the matter there is a convocation, in that same hotel lobby, in that same Union Station, and also in the street cars—convocations everywhere of "forward looking" men. And! The church is moss-backed, reactionary, it is a muzzler of the tongue of research, a barrier to progress. Yes! And the young man is a martyr to the freedom of speech, he dared to speak his mind, the noble courageous fellow!

OXEN: Does not all this talk depend on whose ox is gored—the ox of God or the ox of gold (commerce)?

Freedom of thought, how noble! It has been a motor which has pulled the world ahead. Freedom of speech, it is more than a jewel! It has helped to lift us from mediaeval darkness. By all means let us unshackle every tongue and make it free to speak. Let all barriers be removed from around men that they may bring their thoughts to be ground in the mill of human reason.

Let the traveling salesman, the publicity man, the teacher, the preacher, and every other thinker have freedom of speech—on a soap box, in the forum, by the highway. But, let them speak at their own expense and as their own representatives. For, to come into a grocery store as a Nuco salesman, to come to a newspaper office as an agent of Cello-glass, to come to the school room of a Christian State, supported by the tax payers, to come into a pulpit as an authentic and representative minister of that church—that is different. And that difference is obvious to every man not in a close partnership with hell.

DEPRAVITY: Surely we have an irrefutable evidence of the total depravity of the human heart—and the evidence is "up-to-date," it is "modern," it is "forward-looking."

Let every wolf have freedom of howl, and freedom of teeth also—freedom to eat other wolves and devour his own flesh, freedom to be trained by his own kind and at his own expense. But when that wolf puts on sheep's clothing, bleats like a lamb, and thereby gains admittance to a sheepfold, then proceeds to slay the flock in its own fold, he is twofold a child of her, and every championship of his cause is an evidence of TOTAL DEPRAVITY.—Presbyterian Standard.

It is only imperfection that complains of what is imperfect. The more perfect we are, the more gentle and quiet we become towards the defects of others.—Fenelon.

Evidences of Growth at Alvan Drew School, Pine Ridge, Kentucky.

In six years we have grown in acres of land, from 42 to 125; in number of buildings, from four to 12; in value of property, from $10,000 to $35,000; in regular salaried workers, from two to 11; in boarding students, per year, from 12 to 110; in total enrollment of scholars per year, from 64 to 154; in amount received for board and tuition per year, from $440 to $8,890; in largest receipts for any one month, from $99 to $1,278. Total number of girls and boys who have attended our school in six years, 351; coming from six states, sixteen counties.

Why Another Building?

Our only school building at present is a structure about 42x48. There are four recitation rooms on the first floor, each 18x20 feet with windows on only one side. One of these rooms is used by Mrs. Shepherd with grades one to four. Another is used by Miss Rowe with grades five and six. Both of these rooms have been well filled this year but not overcrowded. The third room is used by Mr. Andrew for seventh and eighth grades. These two grades have reached a total of forty and surely it will be recognized by every one that it is simply impossible to do the right kind of work with forty scholars, most of whom are 16 to 20 years of age, in a room 18 by 20 feet.

The last one of these four rooms is used for high school recitations. Then we have partitioned off spaces in our auditorium on the second floor so that we have a room 13x32 for library and high school study hall, a science room of inadequate proportions which is used as Laboratory and recitation room, and a Bible recitation room 12x18.

We want to put another building on the same campus in which to take care of our high school and then by some inexpensive remodelling, we can make use of our old building exclusively for the grades.

The Building Proposed.

It is to be of brick, 48x60 feet. The time has come for more permanent building at Pine Ridge.

The basement will be well furnished and besides furnace room and coal bin, there will be toilet rooms, lockers, science laboratories and a large recreation room that can be used for various purposes.

The main floor will be divided by folding doors. On one side there will be three recitation rooms, each 20x24 feet; on the other side will be a chapel with recess pulpit platform. There will be three outside entrances; the main front one into a vestibule leading either into the chapel or the front recitation room; another entrance on the side with a vestibule opening into the other two class rooms and into the basement; and the third entrance, into the pulpit. There are balconies in each end of the chapel with stairs leading up from the chapel. Over the recitation rooms there is to be one large-room on the second floor, 24x60 feet, to be used as library and high school study hall. There will be folding doors on the second floor as well as on the first, so that when needed, as at commencement time, all the rooms can be opened into the chapel and give seating for fully six hundred people.

This building will be sufficient for our high school until it reaches an enrollment of 12 and then it can be remodelled by an inexpensive change of partitions to furnish room for many more and by that time a separate chapel can be built on another site.

It is estimated that this splendid building with furnishings will cost us $20,000.

"S. O. S."

Friends of Pine Ridge:—We are now ready to begin ordering material for our Academy Building. If we can discount our bills, it will mean a saving of hundreds of dollars.

Our bill for brick alone will run over $3,000.

Each brick put in place in the wall of the new building, plus the mortar and work, will cost just about five cents.

How many brick will you pay for?

We hope to lay the corner stone early in August. In that stone, we want to place a list of every person, society or class that will contribute five dollars or more to this building and we also hope to publish the list in our Booster.

Please remember the money is needed at once—or as soon as possible. It is the wish of the W. H. M. S. that special gifts for this building be sent direct to me.

We are looking to Him who has given us victory thus far and we are sure His promise in Phil. 4:19 will always be verified.

How much does He want you to co-operate?

God help each one of us to do our part and give us increasing joy in doing it.

Sincerely, T. R. Woodford,
Superintendent.

(Consecration Meeting.)

A Life Insurance Meeting.

(I like the C. E. Quarterly's plan for the meeting and am giving it here so all may have it.)

Of course it is good business to invest in life insurance. Have an insurance salesman to make a five minutes talk on this subject. Follow by talks by the members on such subjects as "The Best Life Insurance for Eternity," "The Oldest Line Company," "Payments for Eternity," "Dividends from Spiritual Life Insurance." A clever leader may add many other subjects and many unusual touches to this meeting.

Have some one talk on "How I Would Spend a Million Dollars," another on "You Have Something Worth More Than a Million Dollars."

An Investment.

There are a great many attractive propositions that come to us these days for investments of our money and of our time and of our talents. It takes a great deal of care to keep from being swindled by fake promoters.

out of our hard-earned money. And one such swindle helps us ever afterward to avoid another. At least it puts us on our guard and we are awake to the probabilities and something of the manner of approach of the swindler. We are also on our fighting mettle. Never once do we say, "Well, they got me once, I might as well give up and let them get me every time." No, our self-defense is up and we will care for our self and our money ever afterward. But we are not so wise in our conduct when it comes to our time and talents and our characters. Time and again we let people swindle us out of our time and again we misuse our talents and how often the investments of our time and our talents are undermining our character and we pay no attention to it. Yet these are worth more to us for time and for eternity than the millions of all the millionaires. Let us be wise where the greatest of investments of our lives are concerned.

Where to Invest Our Lives.

Find out the things that God approves of that you like to do and put your life there. It may not bring great money, or great fame or renown, but it will bring God's approval and His blessings, and your own self-respect and satisfaction and joy and happiness. Young people need not be in a great hurry to decide. Keep talking to God and He will direct. Keep your eyes open and you will see His directions, your ears open and you will hear His approval. Give Christian service the same consideration you do other things in your thinking. The missionary field, the ministry, Christian secretaryships, and other forms of Christian service offer wonderful opportunities. These may not seem to offer so great monetary opportunities but the returns will be greater than in most other lines especially if you count the "invisible salary," such as a strong Christian character, friends you would not have had otherwise, confidence the people have in you, the power to help others, the souls you may be instrumental in saving and the fellowship with God—to walk and talk with Him is returns above price.

Mebane.—Things have been coming to pass hereabouts whether reported or not. One of the latest and best is the visit to our community and church of Brother Lawrence Little. Somehow he helps you to smile whether you are in the habit of it or not; and if you are inclined to become moss-backed, though you may hardly see how he does it, he helps you to modernize, and that with no tendency whatever to make of you a "modernist." He talked College, Young People's Conference, Daily Vacation Bible School, young people's work, and preached. As he did we, people and pastor, were inclined toward all of them and we may soon be trying them.

Quite a number of registrations for the Young People's Conference were handed in. The Mebane graded school has just closed a year of which the whole community is justly proud. Our Methodist Protestant young people shared the honors to such an extent as to make the rest of us proud of them. Four of our own young people graduated from the high school—Joseph Kirk, Mildred Jobe, Alta Allen, and Elizabeth Nicholson. Three of these will go to college next year, Misses Allen and Nicholson to High Point, Joseph Kirk to some college—that offers a course in engineering. Of the thirty-five promoted from the grammar grades to the high school there were a goodly number of our young people that we hope to become feeders to our College in the future.

But as to the honors won by our own young people. Two of the fraternal orders give annually prizes in the grammar grades for excellence and medals in the high school grades. Of these Ethel Lee McCauley won the prize in the third grade for the highest average mark for the year, Victor Dodson in the fifth grade, Billy Williams in the sixth grade, and Mack Isley in the seventh grade. The above were all prizes, each for the highest average for the year in the respective grades. The high school honors won by our young people are as follows: A medal for the highest grade in mathematics for the year, Irma Boon. Edna Nicholson won double honors, the chief marshalship awarded for the highest average mark for the year in the tenth grade, and the high school medal for the highest average mark for the year in the entire high school. Elizabeth Nicholson also won double honors, valedictorian of the graduating class for the highest average mark for the entire period of four years of high school and a medal for deportment and attendance for the period of four years, not having missed a day or been tardy during that time.

Taking into account the fact that more than five hundred and fifty pupils were in the contest for these prizes and medals I feel that these young people bring honor to our church as well as to themselves and their respective families. Nor is it an accident. Our young people have each year since I have had opportunity to observe borne off a good share of the honors of the Mebane school. I hereby notify our College to look out for them. They are coming, two of them next year and others as they finish high school from year to year.

Burlington.—The Ham-Ramsey meeting closed with great services Sunday. For three services on the last day the people crowded the tabernacle to its capacity, and many who could not get seats stood in groups about the windows and doors on the outside.

One of the most impressive scenes of the whole day was the processional from the First Christian Church to the tabernacle. At seven P. M. Mr. Ham met the converts of the meeting at the church that he might have them in a body for a few parting words of counsel and encouragement. At the close of this service they all marched to the tabernacle, two and three abreast, with Mr. Ham and Doctor Lankford, the pastor of the church, in the lead. It was certainly a thrilling scene. A thousand converts—men, women, boys, girls, old, young, big, little, rich, poor—all marching in steady tread with happy hearts and consecrated lives, must have been a scene that made the very hosts of heaven shout and praise God.

The meeting was a great triumph for God and righteousness, and only eternity can tell the good that was accomplished.

Our additions last Sunday numbered 26. To date we have received 91 members, and have prospects for that many more. Nearly all that we have received are adults, and many of them heads of families.

We are very happy to have these large additions to our church and Sunday school rolls, and it shall be our earnest purpose to nurture and develop them in the Christian graces.

S. W. Taylor.

P. S.—At different times we have noted some of our ministers and their families in the services, and it has been our regret that we could not have more fellowship with them. The after service in the inquiry room kept us so busy that our friends had to be neglected.

S. W. T.

High Point.—The congregation was pleased to hear a beautiful vocal solo, "O Rest in the Lord," by Mrs. J. Gurney Briggs on last Sunday morning.

The Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary societies met Monday afternoon with Mrs. A. M. Rankin. There was a good attendance, and much business was transacted. In the home society money is being raised for a scholarship in High Point College. Three new names were added to the roll. The small children are being organized into the Buds of Hope with Mrs. J. H. Walker as secretary. The children from six to 12 years will be organized into a Mission Band on Monday, June 15, with Mrs. R. M. Andrews as leader. The July meeting of the two missionary societies will be held with Mrs. J. G. Snipes on Steele St.

The Christian Endeavor society will give a missionary pageant on Monday evening.

The A. M. Idol Philathea class will hold its monthly meeting with the president, Miss Lucille Pickens, on Tuesday evening.

Prayer meeting committee for Wednesday evening is as follows: Mr. J. D. Koonce, Mrs. H. C. Fogleman, and Mr. W. C. Hammond.

Commencement exercises at High Point College will begin next Sunday morning when Rev. R. L. Shipley, of Salisbury, Md., will deliver the sermon in the First Church.

Mrs. Minnie P. Harrell left Thursday for a visit to her sister, Mrs. Herman S. Meredith, at Tampa, Fla.

James Moffitt has returned from Gainesville, Ga., where he has been a student at Riverside Military Academy for the past year.

Mrs. M. B. Poling of Elkins, W. Va., is the guest of her sister, Mrs. E. L. Douglas.

We are sorry to note that Rev. J. H. Stowe continues ill at his home, and is not able to attend church services. May God whom he has served long and faithfully be very near and dear to him in these tedious hours of illness, and may he be conscious of the sustaining power of the "everlasting arms." Mrs. McGee is also ill at the home of her daughter, Mrs. J. W. Robins, 223 Mangum Ave.

Misses Claire Douglas, Irene and Inez Reynolds, are popular members of the senior class which is being graduated from High Point high school this week.

Mr. and Mrs. D. A. Neese and daughter, Margaret Opal, are moving into their attractive new home on Montlieu Ave.

After attending the Executive Board meeting in Washington, Mrs. Geo. R. Brown is visiting her daughter, Mrs. George Armacost, at Westminster, Md.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JUNE 7.

Peter's Broadening Vision.

Lesson Text: Acts 11:5-18.

Golden Text: Acts 10:34.

The Central Truth: Peter's vision at Joppa was in fact a most illuminating and forcible repetition of the Great Commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

Scriptural Points.

1. After raising Dorcas to life Peter "tarried many days in Joppa with one Simon a tanner," who lived by the seaside. He probably was taking a much-needed rest. This house by the sea was an ideal place for recuperation. Peter, like David and Daniel, had private devotions three times a day—morning, noon, and night. It was during his noonday prayer that this wonderful vision came to him.

2. The four-cornered sheet that Peter saw contained various kinds of unclean animals, snakes, and birds, which the Jews were forbidden to eat. These are mentioned in the eleventh chapter of Leviticus. There was not a clean animal or fowl upon that sheet upon which Peter might conscientiously satisfy his hunger.

3. "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." This meant that the Mosaic ceremonial law, having been fulfilled in the ministry and sacrifice of Jesus Christ, was now repealed. It also meant that the Gentile world was now admitted into God's plan of redemption. This vision appeared three times, to set forth its far-reaching purpose, and in order that its great meaning might become indelibly fixed in Peter's mind.

4. Peter was now informed by the Spirit that three men were inquiring at the gate for him. And he was commanded to go with them without the least hesitation.

5. In the light of the threefold vision Peter was enabled to recognize this message from Cornelius as a call of God to break the bread of life to the Gentile world. This was in entire keeping with a special commitment that Jesus gave to Peter, when He said, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." These keys were prayer and the preaching of the gospel. And Peter used both these keys in opening the kingdom of God to the Jewish and Gentile worlds, to the one on the day of Pentecost, and to the other in the house of Cornelius.

6. "The Holy Ghost fell on them, as on us at the beginning," referring to Pentecost. This gracious outpouring was corroborative proof that the Gentiles were fellow heirs of all the blessings of the Gospel.

7. "What was I, that I could withstand God?" Where God leads and does His saving work the followers of Christ have no choice but to enlist and co-operate to the full extent of ability and opportunity. To resist the Spirit's call under such indications is to quench His influence, joy, power, and life.

8. Peter's faithful presentation of the train of events that led up to the revival in the house of Cornelius was all-convincing. No one questioned in the least that this was the work of God. His hand in it was so plain that none could fail to see it. They all gave glory to God for this open door to the Gentile world.

Practical Points.

1. The best things of life come in answer to prayer. Jesus was transfigured while He was praying. Pentecost came down in answer to prayer. And Peter had a wonderful vision during his noonday prayer.

2. The heart of unregenerate man is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, who can know it?" It has been compared to "a cage of unclean birds," indicating that the thoughts and desires of the heart are corrupt and corrupting. "But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt."

3. But the plan of salvation presents an unfailing remedy for a sinful and sinning world. "In that day shall there be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and uncleanness."

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
And sinners, plunged beneath that flood,
Lose all their guilty stains."

4. "God so loved the world," Jews and Gentiles, high and low, bond and free, self-righteous and wicked. "God is no respecter of persons." His is an unlimited and everlasting love.

"For the love of God is broader
Than the measure of man's mind;
And the heart of the Eternal
Is most wonderfully kind."

5. "Clean hands and a pure heart" are passports to glory. "Holiness becometh thy house, O Lord, forever." Ps. 93:5.

SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.

The Sanctity of the Human Body.

Text: "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?" 1 Cor. 6:19.

The human body is sacred. It was formed by the sacred hands of the Creator. "And the Lord God formed man (his body) of the dust of the ground." It was created for a sacred purpose. It embodies the sacred image and likeness of God. And the Creator breathed into this body the breath of life; "and man became a living soul." And God created the body and soul for His own indwelling. "For ye are the temple of the living God; as God has said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God and they shall be my people." The body is sacred because it is designed to be an instrument of the glory of Christ. "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them members of an harlot? God forbid."

The sacredness of the human body is further emphasized in the resurrection. Jesus said of His own body, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." And He has made a similar pledge for the resurrection of all human bodies. Let death destroy, dissolve, and scatter the bodies of men, but Christ will raise them up at the last day.

The body is furthermore sacred because God's only begotten Son was incarnated in a human body. "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

Let us consider prayerfully first the blessed fact that

The Body Is the Temple of the Immortal Soul.

The worth of the soul of man is quite beyond the means of human calculation. It is worth more than all the world and all that the world contains. "What is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

"What is the thing of greatest price

The whole creation round,
That which was lost in paradise,
That which in Christ is found?
The soul of man, Jehovah's breath,
That keeps two worlds in strife;
Hell moves beneath to work its death,
Heaven stoops to give it life."

The body is not only the soul's tabernacle, but it is also the soul's vehicle of movement and instrument of service. The soul discharges its obligations largely through the members and organs of the body. The eyes are the windows of the soul. The ears are the inward, and the lips are the outward, doors of the soul. The hands and feet are the obedient servants of the soul. A strong, healthy body is indispensable to the highest service of the immortal soul. The body needs to be placed upon the altar for sacrifice and service. "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

Again let us bear in mind that

The Body Is the Temple of the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Ghost is the third Person of the Holy Trinity. He is the Inspirer and Interpreter of the Holy Scriptures. He is the Administrator of the plan of salvation. It is He who selects and endows the Christian ministry. It is He Who imparts the life of regeneration, the testimony of assurance, the blessing of sanctification, and the equipment for every good word and work.

This is the Dispensation of the Holy Spirit. Personal and worldwide redemption is His special mission. He is personally present, working out the gracious purposes of the Godhead. God the Father and God the Son are working through Him to save a lost world. The welfare and immortality of man have enlisted the infinite concern and energy of the triune God.

The human body, in which dwells the undying soul, is the sphere of the Holy Spirit's activities. The Holy Spirit inspires the choice of the human will, the penitence of the human heart, and the faith of the human soul. The Holy Spirit enlightens the eyes to behold wondrous things out of nature, the Scriptures, and history. He enables the lips to speak the messages of warning and uplift. He moves the hands to toil for Jesus. And He directs the feet to go on errands of mercy. "And ye are not your own; for ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."

And again let us seriously consider that

The Body Is a Temple of Worship.

The body is more than a home of the Holy Spirit. It is a temple of most sacred communion. Jesus said: "Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come unto him, and will sup with him, and he with me." John wrote, "And truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ." And this fellowship is realized within the mind, spirit and body of the believer in Christ. And Paul describes this inward worship in Eph. 5:18, 19: "And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit, speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts unto the Lord."

This inward worship is the fountain and inspiration of all outward devotion and service, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ our Savior.

But what amazing condescension is this, that by the Spirit's operation the Lord Jesus should be enthroned in our hearts the hopes of glory! The great and mighty God Who doth inhabit eternity and the throne of His holiness has stooped so graciously to dwell in marred vessels of clay. Let Isaiah describe this marvellous condescension: "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones."

How can we pay the mighty debt of such wonderful love? An eternity of praise and service cannot begin to cancel the obligation. When we have done all that is possible for us to do, we are still unprofitable servants, still undeserving of the least of the mercies of God.

"Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."—The Word of Life.

THE POOREST OF THE POOR.

Some unknown author has given the following marks of a man that is really poor:

"If he is without friends.
If he has low ideals.
If he has a guilty conscience.
If he has lost his self-respect.
If his morals are questionable.
If he has lost his grip on himself.
If he is selfish, uncharitable, cruel.
If he has forfeited his health and wealth.
If his mind and soul are neglected.
If he has bartered his good name for money.
If making money has crowded out the cultivation of his spiritual life.
If worldliness has caused him to lose fellowship with God.
If all his investments and possessions are laid up on earth and no treasures in heaven."—Selected.

BLESSED SHADOWS.

There are ferns in the garden of the soul as well as flowers. There is the fern of patience, and the fern of long-suffering, and the fern of meekness. And the great Gardener of the soul delights in the ferns, and purposes to save them from destruction by "the garish day," and so he takes us into the shade, the shade of disappointment, or the shade of sorrow, or the shade of seeming defeat. But it is a very blessed shadow, for it is "the shadow of the Almighty." And here the ferns flourish, and the cloudy day makes the garden beautiful.—J. F. Jowett.

Other Gifts.

Henderson Home Missionary Society, four sheets, one pair pillowships, one table cloth, and towels. A friend from Stokesdale, a nice dress.

Friendship Birthday offering of Stanly charge was, the week of May 7, $10.60 instead of $1.60 as reported some time ago.

Some Needs of the Home.

First, a school building, separate from the main buildings.

Second, a play house, separate from the main buildings.

Third, a bus to carry the children to and from church and Sunday school.

Next week I will give some reasons why we should have a school building.

With very best wishes to every contributor and all the churches, Sunday schools, C. E. societies, and all other organizations who are co-operating with me in this great work, I am Yours truly, E. G. Lowdermilk,
Superintendent.

—Rev. R. A. Hunter, of Winston: "The Sunday meeting came to a close last night with approximately 14,000 people present. Mr. Sunday was presented with a check for more than $25,000. We hope to receive into our church next Sunday a number of new members as a result of the campaign. The evangelist stated last night that it was one of the very greatest meetings he had ever held."

An Appreciated Gift.—Brother G. O. Coble came to Calvary church last Sunday morning bringing a beautiful gift from his mother, Mrs. J. Henry Coble. It is a large and costly metallic vase, bearing the inscription, "To Hold Flowers for the Master." It was filled with beautiful flowers when it came, and it was at once given a place on the table in the altar. Its presence will no doubt suggest to many the thought of making an offering of the flowers they have to add to the pleasure of the Sunday services in the church, and of course we will gratefully think of the kindness of Mrs. Coble in making this pleasing gift to Calvary church.

Mt. Pleasant C. E. Sale.

The Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of Mt. Pleasant church will hold a sale of various articles, such as ice cream, cakes, candies, etc., on the church lawn Saturday evening, June 13. The proceeds will be used to cover the expenses of sending a delegate to the Young People's Summer Conference. Free entertainment will be furnished, and the public is cordially invited to attend.

Lillian Shoffner.

Notice! Missionary Day at Bethel, Alamance Circuit.

There will be two services at Bethel M. P. church, Alamance circuit, the second Sunday in June. Dinner on the grounds. We have invited Prof. E. C. Hamilton and hope to have him with us to conduct the song service. This will be our annual Thank-offering service for both Home and Foreign Missionary societies. Please bring your pocket-books. At 11 o'clock A. M. Mrs. A. G. Dixon will deliver a lecture on missions and those of us who have heard her talk know that it will be interesting and instructive. In the afternoon Rev. A. G. Dixon will preach for us. We would have been glad to have had this service on our regular preaching day, but this is the only time Rev. and Mrs. Dixon could be with us, so we are glad to have them the second Sunday. Every one cordially invited. Mrs. J. M. Foust,

Corresponding Secretary.

OVER THE THOUSAND MARK AND STILL GOING STRONG.

Concord and Burlington Earn Free Trips to Summer Conference!

Our desk has been literally swamped with registrations for the Young People's Summer Conference. We have gone over the thousand mark and every mail is bringing in additional registrations.

Concord has the honor of winning the first free trip to the conference offered to each church that registered at least a hundred, for she was the first to send in a hundred registrations. Burlington also sends in over a hundred and takes first place in the contest with a total of one hundred and twenty-five! That's great, Concord and Burlington! Congratulations. Many other churches have sent in splendid lists.

All churches are urged to send in their lists as early now as possible so that we may save a last-minute rush.

Remember our goal of fifteen hundred! Help us to reach it by next issue. Thank you! Register whether you can come or not—and then come.

Fees (25c for children and 50c for adults) help to pay expenses of the conference. Rush to Lawrence Little, Concord, N. C.

Concord, N. C.

—Mr. Marshall, Vice President of the United States while Wilson was President, died suddenly last Monday. He had just been reading the Bible and laid the book aside when he died without a word. He was a man of very genial disposition and naturally and easily made friends. Whether he had the strength for the office of President was never tested.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Shelby.—We had an increase in attendance at both the Sunday school and church services last Sunday. The Sunday school attendance showed an increase of 14 over the previous Sunday. A slight increase in the church attendance.

Our church here was delighted with another visit by Rev. T. G. McAllister, of Caroleen last Sunday. Brother McAllister and several of his people came Sunday afternoon and conducted a prayer service at the home of Brother Green at three o'clock. Brother McAllister remained and attended the Christian Endeavor meeting and preached for us at the evening church service. He made a very helpful talk to the Christian Endeavor meeting. His sermon was a very helpful and inspiring discourse on the subject, "The Heavenly Family." The text was part of the 15th verse of the third chapter of Ephesians. He discussed the composition of the heavenly family; its unity; its characteristics; its permanency.

Rev. D. I. Garner, pastor of the Rockingham church, was with us at the prayer service on Wednesday night of last week and delivered a good message. He and his son, Albert and Brother J. W. Russell, also of Rockingham, spent the night with this pastor and family. We were glad to have them in our home here for the first time.

The children of the Sunday school held another practice last Sunday afternoon in preparation of the program for Children's Day, which we will observe probably the third Sunday in this month.

This writer was called to Mt. Carmel church, South Davidson charge, last Thursday to assist in the funeral of Mrs. Grady Swicegood, one of the faithful members of Mt. Carmel, who died the previous day in the Davidson hospital at Lexington. It was a very sad occasion and was attended by an immense crowd of relatives, neighbors and friends. We deeply sympathize with Brother Swicegood in the loss of his dear companion and with the young boy and girl in the loss of their loving mother. May God in his infinite power and rich grace abundantly bless and sustain them in their sore affliction and deep sorrow.

Our services for next Sunday will be regular with the exception of the morning church service when the Lord's Supper will be observed. We are anticipating a continued increase in the attendance at all of our services for next Sunday. C. B. Way, Pastor.

Henderson.—All of the societies are doing active work now. It is encouraging to see the new life the Ladies' Aid is taking on. It is growing in interest as well as membership planning new work all the time. They are meeting around in the homes now, instead of the church. The missionary societies have been divided into four circles and each circle will be responsible for a certain part of the world.

The Philatheas are planning to have "Japanese Tea Garden" this month.

Because of the Vance county Methodist Protestant Rally at Gillburg yesterday, we did not have any 11 o'clock service. Evening service was held as usual.

Saxapahaw Charge.—Brother H. G. Paris, the efficient Superintendent of Salem Sunday school, informs me that Salem has the best Sunday school in the history of the church. A Bible lass for men has just organized with Brother Percy Smith as teacher. Curtains have also been purchased to enclose part of the classes. The other three Sunday schools are doing splendid work. A very interesting program of songs and recitations was given at Saxapahaw church on Mothers' Day, May 10. Orange Chapel Sunday school, after suspending for the winter months, began the first Sunday in April with Brother Ira Lewis as leader. We hope that this Sunday school will soon become evergreen. Mrs. J. C. Guthrie, Miss Beulah Johnson, and Miss Lucy Perry are collecting money with which to purchase new song books for Concord church and Sunday school.

On Sunday, May 10, a birthday dinner was given in honor of Mrs. Pierce Thompson, one of the oldest members of Salem church, it being her 77th birthday. Rev. M. E. Hansel, of the Presbyterian Church, and the writer were special invited guests. We trust that the Lord will add many more years to the life of this good woman.

Our second quarterly conference has been held. Brothers H. G. Paris and L. E. Guthrie are the nominees for delegate to the next annual conference.

Words are inadequate to express my thanks to Saxapahaw church for a beautiful gold watch, to Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Crawford and daughter for a fountain pen, to Salem Sunday school for a beautiful shirt and cuff-links, to Orange Chapel Sunday school for a box of fine flowers purchased from the florist at Burlington. These were given to the pastor at graduation presents.

Belmont, Mt. Hermon Circuit.—Our church in the best condition it has been for many years. If you had been at Sunday school this morning you would have said, "What a wide-awake community you have."

Our Sunday school is the largest and best it has been for years. Mr. G. A. Nicholson, our superintendent, is a live wire, and he believes in making things move. It made our hearts rejoice when we saw so many mothers and fathers at church today. Mr. Nicholson adopted a method of appointing some one to make a ten-minute talk on the lesson every Sunday. This has aroused the interest and increased the attendance. Mr. Wayne Curtiss made a splendid talk today which was enjoyed by all.

Last Sunday, May 24, was Memorial day. At the 11 o'clock hour our pastor, Brother Ashburn, preached a very touching sermon, after which the children marched to the cemetery with the flowers and decorated all the graves. In the afternoon Brother Ashburn delivered another good sermon and administered the Lord's Supper.

Our church is overcoming its difficulty in the financial part. Mr. Edgar York, church treasurer, announced today that he had money enough to pay all the local funds and seven dollars extra in the treasury. Mr. York seems to have a secret method of collecting money, but it has worked well and he has gone "over the top." If your church is having financial trouble it will pay you to investigate Mr. York's plan.

We are sorry to lose Mr. and Mrs. O. L. Smith and family who moved to Burlington last week. Mrs. Smith was a Sunday school teacher, and Mr. Smith was sexton. May God's richest blessings rest upon them, and may they be as great a help to the Sunday school they join as they were to ours.

A Slip Up on the Preacher.

On Saturday evening, May 23, I was plowing in the field and saw two cars drive up to my house. A man came out to me and said there was a couple at the house that wanted to get married, and he had to meet the train and only had 20 minutes' time; so I hitched my horse and went in and spoke the words that made them man and wife. Now I suppose most preachers will admit that it is a little embarrassing to marry a couple, but to stand up before a well dressed couple with dirty overalls and old plow shoes on—well, I have forgot that other word to express it.

Maybe the editor can think of it but I think I can stand some more, so come on, folks, and get married while the marrying is good. I will marry you when you come if the plow stands.

The contracting parties were Mr. Denins Hays of Durham, N. C., and Mrs. Omata Leonard of Franklinville, N. C. This was the second marriage for them both. They are good people. We wish for them a prosperous journey together.

Concord.—"Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it" was the text our pastor, Rev.

P. E. Lindley, preached from at the morning service Sunday. The morning service was a very appropriate one and fitted in with Children's Day which was observed in our church Sunday.

The children had charge of the evening service, and rendered a very interesting program. The following is the program which was rendered, and heard by a large congregation:

Song—Youthful Lives for Jesus. Responsive reading. Prayer, Mr. Widenhouse. Song—Across the Sea. Reading—To All Who Love Our Children, Mr. Widenhouse. Recitation—Children's Day, Ruby Furr. Recitation—A Little Missionary, Mary Lee Pharr. Recitation—Little Ones, Lottie Little. Song—Song of the Sowers. Recitation—They Plead for the Light, Daisy Furr. Recitation—A Home Missionary, Valeria Little. Recitation—Which? Willie Nash. Song—Children's Day, Junior Department. Recitation—1885-1925, Miss Helen Eury. Recitation—Four Hundred Million, Katherine Teeter. Exercise by two girls. Recitation—What Are You Going to Do? Ray Brown. Recitation—Two Colors, Maude Winecoff. Recitation—Her Speech, Ethel Dorton. Recitation—Surrender, Virginia Eury. Recitation—A Shattered Idol, Pauline Lowder. Recitation—Grandmother and I, Cecil Little. Recitation—The Awakening, Miss Gatha Sides. Dialogue—A Worthwhile Work, by seven young people. Recitation—My Pennies, Agnes Litaker. Recitation—My Offering, Hoyle Winecoff. Address, Mr. Lindley. Offering. Duet, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Lindley. Song—We Will Be a Worker. Benediction.

The folks all enjoyed the program and made a very generous offering for the missionary work. The offering amounted to $19.05.

The registration campaign is getting along fine in our church. There have been 106 registrations sent in already for the Young People's Conference and we are hoping to get many more.

Rockingham Church.—We started our revival on Monday following the third Sunday in May. There have been many disappointments connected with it. We were expecting Brother J. M. Morgan with us for the first week of meeting. But he could not come to us because of sickness and death of two of his members. Then we had other help engaged to come in later and because of sickness of his wife he could not come. So after we started the revival we secured the help of Brother D. A. Braswell of Concord for a few services. He did some good preaching too. We greatly appreciate his fine help. As we could not secure further help, the pastor had to fall in and do the rest of the preaching. We have had up to the present about 15 conversions. The meeting is still in progress with the interest still increasing. Hope that there may yet be many more saved before the meeting closes.

The writer united in marriage at the parsonage on May 20, 1925, Mr. Robert McLean and Miss Myrtle Baldwin of Rockingham. These are fine young people and their many friends wish them a happy journey through life together.

D. I. Garner, Pastor.

There is no creature so lonely as the dweller in the intellect.—Willian Winter.

Fallston.—Mrs. Sidney Grigg died May 17. She had bad health for a long time, but seemed well as common. She prepared her dinner to take to church, and gathered and made some nice bouquets to place on the graves of her loved ones. Sunday morning she got ready and went to church expecting to spend the day in God's service. She took her place in the Sunday school class. About the close of the lesson she had a stroke of paralysis. She was carried to the parsonage, where she remained until her death. Dr. Lackey was present and everything was done to help her, but God was calling her home. She quietly passed away that night at nine-thirty.

She did not get to place her flowers over her loved ones' graves, but she went to shake hands with them and live with them in glory, for we believe she was a good woman and was prepared to meet God in peace. She professed faith in Christ early in life and joined the church and remained faithful until death. She always loved to attend church and always enjoyed the old-time class meeting and would witness for Jesus every time she had an opportunity. She was good and kind to everyone.

She was laid to rest in Friendship cemetery Monday, May 18. She leaves a husband and one child, Mrs. Carl Baxter, and seven grandchildren, and a number of friends.

Our memorial service the third Sunday was good. Brother Morgan preached at 11, and Brother E. A. Bingham at two. We believe these services are a great help to our church.

Fairview Charge.—I have not reported for some time, but the work on this charge is going well.

On the second Sunday in May at 11 o'clock a Mothers' Day service was held at the Fairview church. The program was good and the attendance was large. At the close of the service the people had dinner on the grounds. In the afternoon the annual Children's Day exercises were held. They were well rendered. The offering amounted to $13.20.

At 6:30 P. M., the Christian Endeavor society, which was organized recently, gave a splendid program. At 7:30 the pastor preached to quite a number of people.

In short, it was a good day, and one that was enjoyed by all present.

C. G. Isley, Pastor.

Gibsonville-Fountain Place.—May the 1st brought us to the close of the second quarter and face to face with the last half of the year. This has been a very busy period on this work. Not as full of achievement perhaps as it ought to have been but enough so to keep up courage and effort. Cotton mill conditions continue bad. At Gibsonville two of the three mills are only operating part time; one four days a week, the other and larger continues upset with a remodeling and building program. This condition affects the financial interest of the work no little. But if conditions get no worse we will pay all claims. $129.27 has been paid on the two budgets. Current expenses are well up to date.

Fountain Place.

This baby church wintered it in the water and cold in the basement but notwithstanding has held its own. Sunday school has increased, the preaching services have been well attended, faith and courage are still manifest. Royally and loyally the folk have stood by and larger things are in sight.

A financial campaign has been conducted that realized about $2500 towards the Sunday school building. Work will begin within a short time and will be pushed to completion of the unit. With the added comfort and convenience of such equipment we confidently look for larger and better things.

Temporary curtains dividing the basement for Sunday school use have recently been provided and are proving a valuable asset in the conducting of the school. The enrollment is well over a hundred with an attendance of approximately one hundred.

The Ladies' Aid society under the leadership of Mrs. D. D. Glenn is rendering fine service, keeping up the payments on the piano, and in providing a communion set and linens.

The Junior S. C. E. of 25 members continues steady under the superintendency of Mrs. J. W. Sharpe. The Y. P. S. C. E. is also prosperous with C. R. Ephland superintendent. Extensive plans are under way for the observation of Children's Day in June. This church is also co-operating in the Ham-Ramsay evangelistic meeting now in progress in Burlington.

Gibsonville.

The Sunday school here is the "talk of the town." The attendance for the quarter is the best in the history of the church. An effort is being made to increase our attendance to 300 and the enrollment to 400. The attendance now runs above the 250 mark. The following sticking on posts, windows, doors, etc., can be seen all over the town: "Welcome to the 400 Gibsonville M. P. Sunday School."

Three prosperous C. E. societies with a combined enrollment of more than a hundred are doing fine work.

Woman's Home Missionary Society under the presidency of Mrs. W. J. Jennings is doing well. A Young People's F. M. Society will be organized this month.

The Ladies' Aid Society under Mrs. D. M. Davidson is carrying on in a fine way. They have contributed liberally towards the furnishing of the parsonage, the buying of a piano and other things as well.

Special meetings leading up to Easter were conducted by the pastor, assisted by Mr. N. J. Miles of Mebane. There were many hindrances to encounter but all told we had a fine meeting with 32 reconsecrations and professions. But even at that we stopped short of the harvest that awaits us. We will renew our effort at a later date.

The writer enjoyed a few days' service with Rev. J. H. Moton and his people at St. Paul, Greensboro. The church was quickened and a fine spirit prevailed throughout the meeting. It was a pleasure to be with them and to preach to them but we lament that there were so few unsaved people in attendance upon the meetings. Congregations were fair although composed of members of the churches of the community, and visiting brethren of our own from High Point, Grace and Calvary churches, Greensboro, and Burlington and Gibsonville and perhaps others.

Yours truly,

G. H. Hendry, Pastor.

Mt. Zion.—Sunday was one of the most pleasant days to go to church we have had this year, but our attendance dropped from 168 to 123 in one week. Now isn't that encouraging? However, we are still holding Sunday school every Sunday. Thank God for the faith and interest of those who make it a point to attend every Sunday.

By way of explanation as to why our attendance drops and remains unsteady, and to call your attention to the difference between the persistent and interested Sunday school worker and the they-don't-need-me-at-Sunday-school kind of a fellow, last Sunday morning at 9:30 o'clock some of our own members (members who are very influential—the kind of fellow that boys and girls call your attention to and say, Mr. — did and said so and so, it's all right) were gathered in our local drug store leisurely passing the time away talking about what? Oh, I'd be afraid to say here. Anyway, they should have been on their knees at their family altar preparatory to going to their own church with a prepared Sunday school lesson.

Another reason why our attendance was not larger last Sunday was this. A baseball game was actually being played in one-half mile of Mt. Zion church, when the last bell rang at 10 o'clock—right in the back yard, almost, of one of our own church members. About 15 or 20 of our boys and young men and some married men who are members of our Sunday school were there helping carry on the game.

Now to show what will-power and church interest will do—we had with us two teachers in particular who, if they had done justice to their physical condition would in all probability have been in bed. But they thought so much of their class and their duty and responsibility to God and their church that they put that above physical conditions and went on to church, even though they did not feel like it.

Here is one fact that no person can get around: Our influence is leading some one somewhere all the time. Our influence speaks in actions more than words. I am afraid we as leaders are falling short, very short of our God-given ability to do good. The Bible says even a little child shall lead them. We became little children when we started to follow Jesus. We are leading somebody—somewhere. When your boys and girls and mine become men and women, which one would you rather they would pattern after—the they-don't-need-me-at-Sunday-school fellow and the meadow baseball team, or the persistent, pure-souled teacher who puts duty to church and God above everything. Somebody is watching every single one of us. Nothing would please God and those of us who are directly interested and who are working for the interest of our school more than to see every member at Sunday school. Come on, ask somebody else to come with you.

Last Wednesday evening at eight o'clock the officers and teachers met in the home of the superintendent and organized into a Workers' Council. C. W. Allen was elected chairman and W. E. Jones secretary of council. Since this meeting was held right in the midst of the busiest week of this year and considering the sickness that was in some of the homes, this meeting was attended well.

Our next meeting will be with Mrs. and Mr. E. S. Stone one month from last Wednesday night. After all business of Workers' Council was transacted, refreshments were served by Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Lawson. Everybody seemed to enjoy being here. For our part, Mrs. Allen and I were mighty glad to have all meet with us and we were sorry all the officials of our school could not be with us.

MARRIED.

Topping-Gardner.

May 12, 10:30 P. M., at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. O'Briant, Rosemary, N. C., Route 1, Mr. C. J. Topping and Miss Ila Pattie Gardner were united in marriage, the undersigned officiating. Just a few of their friends witnessed the ceremony. This happy couple are both of Roanoke Rapids, N. C., and are quite popular. The groom is manager of the Fiber Board Mills of Roanoke Rapids and the bride a graduate nurse of the Roanoke Rapids Hospital. Soon after their marriage they motored to Weldon, N. C. There they expected to take a Coast Line for points north, for a few days, and on their return they will be at home in Roanoke Rapids, N. C. Their many friends are wishing for them a long and happy life together. J. B. O'Briant.

Ridge-Smith.

On Saturday, May 23, Mr. Theodore Ridge of Denton, N. C., and Miss Hattie Belle Smith of Mooresville, N. C., were happily married in Lexington, N. C. The ceremony was performed by Rev. C. E. Ridge, pastor of Davidson circuit. Mrs. Ridge is a very popular young lady, and a successful school teacher. She numbers her friends by her acquaintances. Mr. Ridge is a very promising young man and is held in high esteem by all who know him. Their many friends wish for them many years of wedded happiness.

A Friend.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

King.—Sunday, May 17, Brother N. D. King, better known as "Peter King," died, and on Monday, May 18, the funeral was held in the home, by his pastor, assisted by Rev. Francis Joyner of Littleton, N. C. Brother King joined the M. E. Church about 50 years ago. Later in life when he moved and located near Weavers Chapel M. P. church he moved his membership there and remained a loyal, faithful member of Weaver's Chapel until death. He was loved by many because he was a good man. He was jovial, yet honest and sincere. He had been afflicted for quite a while, but was a patient sufferer. His body was laid to rest in the family burying ground nearby. He was 74 years, eight months and 19 days of age and leaves behind his aged wife, three boys, six girls, nine grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. These have the sympathy of the church and community.

Dickens.—Wednesday, May 20, two P. M., we held funeral service from the home for Miss Angie D. Dickens. She was 85 years of age, joined Ebenezer M. E. church when a girl and was known all her life to be a good Christian woman. Three sisters of this home had lived together for a long time. One of them passed over the river only a few months ago. There is only one now and she feels keenly her loss. She too is getting quite old. She has the sympathy of the entire community in her lonely hours and sore bereavement.

Faucett.—May 20, four P. M., we held funeral service in the home of Mr. N. E. Faucett, who died suddenly May 19 at the age of 75 years. He leaves to survive him his wife, one sister, six children, and two grandchildren. He lived near Hawkins Chapel and his family have the sympathy of the church and friends about.

Pittard.—May 21 we held funeral service for our Brother J. H. Pittard. We met at his home and his body was taken to the old family burying ground near Hawkins Chapel, and in keeping with his request a very short service was held at the grave. Brother Pittard was 80 years old the past February. Had been declining in health for a year or more.

He joined Hawkins Chapel church about 30 years ago. He was held in high esteem by his church and community. There were about 50 automobiles full of people followed in the procession from his home to the burying ground. His body rests under the shade of trees. He was a very quiet, humble character, but sincere in his manner. He is survived by his wife, three boys, two girls, 19 grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

The church bows in humble submission to God. Our old people are falling out of ranks with us but only to enter the holy ranks in the glory world. J. B. O'Briant.

AN UNFAIR ATTACK.

In last week's issue of The Methodist Protestant Herald there appeared the following unfair and unbrotherly attack upon The Word of Life, and its editor:

"An Inexcusable Fool"!

Mr. Editor: I was very much surprised to see in the M. P. Herald, May 21, page 14, the above expression. When one can say that Jesus was "an inexcusable fool" if he didn't do this or that he seems to me to be far gone as to taste or good judgment. It certainly did not add anything to the strength of his argument, nor was it calculated to interest or enlighten any one. All the discussions, that I have ever seen, concerning God's process of creating the world and man, seem to me to be "tommyrot." Egotists on either side may spout words all they like, but they cannot make any truth deny any other truth. The Bible says that man was made out of the dust of the earth! The scientist calls us back to the green slimy pond. What difference can it make, whether God wet the dust or not. The Bible says that man was made "in the image of God." Can anyone say that he must have had two feet, or a stomach, or backbone or liver or kidneys; or that he had none of these? Could we be satisfied with God as a sponge or a jelly fish? Could we think of Him as having any kind of body? Suppose we quit all the foolishness, including quotations from "The Word of Life," if that is the best it can do.

S. R. H.

Sam Jones used to say that "It is the hit dog that howls." I am glad "S. R. H." was hit. I am glad he howled. And I hope he will howl some more.

It is discourteous, to say the least, to attack a man in the public press under a nom de plume. Nobody but a contemptible coward will stab a man in the dark.

It was gross injustice to quote three words of my editorial entirely out of their connection. It was still more unjust to give them a meaning that the paragraph in which they occur, did not warrant. Here is the paragraph from which "S. R. H." quoted:

"Evolution denies the need of the atonement of Jesus Christ. Since man may 'evolute' out of monkeyhood into manhood, through sin into sainthood, and by self-effort into the glory world, Jesus Christ must have been an inexcusable fool to have become incarnate and die for a world that could get along so well without Him."

The plain meaning of this paragraph is this: Jesus Christ was not "an inexcusable fool" to have died for a race that is lost, dead, and helpless in sin. But the atheistic branch of evolutionists, to which all evolutionists are more or less allied, make Him "an inexcusable fool" by denying the need and efficacy of His atonement.

All glory and praise to the Son of God Who died "the just for the unjust," and "tasted death for every man." J. W. Clegg,

Editor of "The Word of Life."

Resolutions of Regret.

We, the members of the Greensboro school board, desire to express our regret in losing the services of our capable and loyal chairman, Mr. J. Norman Wills.

During the six years of intimate association, we can bear testimony to his consecrated loyalty to the schools of Greensboro; to his devoted energy in his duties as a member of the board; and to the consciousness of the sacred responsibility of his office as chairman.

Realizing, however, the unselfishness exemplified by Mr. Wills in accepting a more important and responsible post as a member of the city council, we cannot help but feel that our loss will be for the ultimate gain of the entire city, including the school system.

We desire to extend to Mr. Wills our personal appreciation for his untiring and wholehearted efforts in continuously promoting the cause of education. To him much credit is due for the many improvements in our school system. Without the spirit of co-operation and pleasant relationship existing among the members under his skillful and capable leadership, our efforts would not have met with the success now evident.

With this expression of our faith and affection, we wish for Mr. Wills the blessings of God and a continuance of his past splendid successes in his new undertaking.

—Captain Roald Amundsen's expedition "hopped off" from Spitzbergen for the North Pole on May 21. Six men, in two airplanes, started on this very dangerous trip—three men in each plane. Captain Amundsen was in command of one plane and Lincoln Ellsworth, an American, commanded the other. With each went a pilot and a mechanic. Whether or not the party has reached the North Pole is not known as this is written, Captain Amundsen's original plan was to fly to the Pole, stop there a few hours for observations, and then fly back to Spitsbergen. It was estimated that the round trip would take about twenty-four hours—nine hours each way and a six-hour stop. The distance is about 700 miles each way. The planes had enough gasoline to carry them more than 1,500 miles.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

By John Grant Newman.

Learn prayer, where humble men have bowed;
 "This world is lost without Christ's touch,"
 I hear one say. He told us much;
 But not one word spake he to show
 How this blind world its Christ might know.
 God's Word is strong, it sets men free,
 Its fruit we need. Then plant the tree!
 And for this planting there's a tool:
 The true, bright-shining, Sunday school.

Use that! Nor seek "short cuts" to truth;
 Can infants take "short cuts" to youth?
 Watch bees; they gather sweets by drops!
 And farmers toil, then wait for crops;
 All faithful students keep at work;
 While drones, alas! still try to shirk.
 Why quit ye, then, the Sunday school?
 If God's lamp dies, man lives a fool.

Come then! And sing God's praise aloud;
 Learn prayer, where humble men have bowed;
 The Bible points the higher way;
 It giveth light, as sun gives day;
 It wakens thought, it quickens deeds,
 As yon round orb doth quicken seeds.
 Truth's fount flows clear at Sunday school,
 Drink there life's waters, fresh and cool.

For helping men the Christ to find,—
 For building brotherhood that's kind,
 For kindling hope in languid eyes,
 For aiding all to seize life's prize,—
 No earthly place hath angel found
 So like God's bush on holy ground
 As is the sacred Sunday school,
 Where shineth yet Christ's Golden Rule.

GO WORK TODAY.

"Up, and be doing. The time is brief,
 And life is frail as an autumn leaf.
 The day is bright, the sun is high,
 Ere long 'twill fade from the glowing sky;
 The harvest is white, and the fields are wide,
 And thou at thine ease may'st not abide.
 The reapers are few and far between,
 And death is abroad with his sickle keen.
 Go forth and labor! A crown awaits
 The faithful servant at heaven's high gates.
 Work with thy might ere the day of grace
 Is spent, ere the night steals on apace.
 The Master has given his pledge divine,
 Whoso winneth souls, like stars shall shine."

JUST AS THOU WILT, AND WHEN AND WHERE...

By Frances R. Havergal.

Lord, speak to me, that I may speak
 In living echoes of Thy tone;
 As Thou hast sought, so let me seek,
 Thy erring children lost and lone.

Oh, lead me, Lord, that I may lead
 The wandering and the wavering feet;
 Oh, feed me, Lord, that I may feed
 Thy hungering ones with manna sweet.

Oh, strengthen me, that while I stand
 Firm on the rock, and strong in Thee,
 I may stretch out a loving hand
 To wrestlers with the troubled sea.

Oh, teach me, Lord, that I may teach
 The precious things Thou dost impart;
 And wing my words, that they may reach
 The hidden depths of many a heart.

Oh, fill me with Thy fullness, Lord,
 Until my very heart o'erflow
 In kindling thought and glowing word,
 Thy love to tell, Thy praise to show.

Oh, use me, Lord, use even me
 Just as Thou wilt, and when and where;
 Until Thy blessed face I see,
 Thy rest, Thy joy, Thy glory share.

SO BUSY.

A busy woman entered her own room as twilight shades were falling—went directly to her desk, turned on the light, and began to write. Page after page she wrote. The solitude became oppressive. She wheeled her chair around, and with a shock of joyful surprise looked squarely into the face of her dearest friend lying on the lounge at her side.

"Why, I didn't know you were here," she cried; "why didn't you speak to me?"
 "Because you were so busy; you didn't speak to me."

So with Jesus—here all the time. The room is full of him, always ready to greet us with a smile—but we are so busy. But when the solitude grows oppressive we suddenly turn, and, lo! he is at our side. We speak to him and he speaks to us, and the soul's deepest yearnings are satisfied.—Selected.

GIRLS SHOULD KNOW.

That the home kitchen, with mother for teacher and a loving willing daughter for a pupil, is the best cooking school on earth.

That true beauty of face is possible only where there is beauty of soul manifested in a beautiful character.

That the girl everybody likes is not affected, and never whines; but is just her sincere, helpful self.

And, finally, that one of the most beautiful things on earth is a pure, modest, true young girl—one who is her father's pride, her mother's comfort, her brother's inspiration, and her sister's ideal—which all should try to be.—Selected.

THE FULLNESS OF LIFE.

I say to my friend, "Be a Christian." That means to be a full man. And he says, "I have not time to be a Christian, I have not room. If my life were not so full! You do not know how hard I work from morning till night. What time is there for me to be a Christian?" "No time to be a Christian? It is as if the engine had said, 'I have no room for the steam.' It is as if the tree had said, 'I have no room for the sap.' It is as if the ocean had said, 'I have no room for the tide.' It is as if the man had said, 'I have no room for my soul.' It is as if life had said, 'I have no time to live,' when it is life. Life is the thing we seek, and man finds it in the fulfillment of his life by Jesus Christ."—Phillips Brooks.

A BILL THAT WAS NEVER PAID.

A ten-year-old lad overheard a conversation about certain bills to be paid and conceived the idea of making out a bill for his own services, says the Compton Enterprise. So the next morning he laid this statement of account on his mother's breakfast plate:

"Mother owes Willie for carrying coal six times, 20 cents; for bringing water lots of times, 30 cents; for going ten errands, 15 cents."

His mother read the bill but said nothing about it. That evening Willie found on his plate the 75 cents, and also another bill which read as follows: Willie owes mother for his happy home for ten years, nothing; for nursing him through a long illness, nothing; total, nothing."

When Willie saw the 75 cents he was pleased; but when he read his mother's bill his eyes grew dim and his lips quivered. Then he took the money to his mother, threw his arms about her neck and begged that she would let him do lots of things for her.

Mother's bill is rarely presented, but it will pay each person to think it out and over for himself and then pay it in love and service.—Downey, Calif., Champion.

—Dr. Herbert H. Ogburn, son of the late Rev. T. J. Ogburn, has opened an office for the practice of medicine on his own account after years of practice in the Wesley Long Hospital. He is a skilled surgeon and is just now adding to his equipment a new X-ray machine. You will find him occupying a suite of three rooms in the Jefferson Standard Building, this city. Call on him if you need his service. You will find him sympathetic, and he will go thoroughly into your case to be sure what is the matter with you before he begins the treatment.

Scuth Davidson.—The "Hot Shot" Evangelistic campaign will go on for a week or two yet, for we are turning things up now. We have had nearly 40 conversions and are getting better fortified.

We have had rain, cold, high school examinations, Chautauqua, mumps, measles and God knows how many other things to contend with.

It was a great surprise Saturday night when they (all denominations) loaded my car down with good things to eat, so that I had to get another car to bring my wife home. The names are too numerous to mention but we got 75 pounds of sugar, 100 pounds of flour, and other things according.

Pay for our campaign. W. L. Carson.

FREE SPEECH AND A FREE PRESS.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

Progress in America is largely due to the spirit of freedom that so far has prevailed here.

The people have increased in learning because they were free to investigate, and the means of education were open. Industry has developed because anyone could start a new enterprise, and some—Henry Ford, for instance—have achieved marvelous success. Our social institutions have increased in number and strength because men and women, seeing need and opportunity, have organized to meet them. Religious enterprises are nowhere more numerous and varied than among us, and money by the millions is being contributed for their support.

True, there is much unwise and wasteful promotion. Our country is still in a somewhat new and unformed state. We make mistakes. We suffer, now and again, from the wild vagaries of people to whom we grant liberty. Thus arises the call for censorship and repression. But curtailing freedom is not the way out of the difficulty. Our only hope is in an increase of intelligence among the people, in a clearing and quickening of their moral sense, in a strengthening of the purpose of men to follow faithfully their highest convictions.

In order to reach the truth, in order to achieve an enlightened conscience, there is no better means than open, frank, and free discussion—a free platform and a free press in a free country.

In the opening exercises of most lodges the presiding officer makes a statement somewhat like this: "During which time we admit of no political or sectarian debate." This is well. Men get together in the lodge as men. They belong to different political parties and to various religious denominations; but for a time these differences are held in abeyance, and the men enjoy a simple, human fellowship.

It has been the custom to guard against the discussion of denominational differences among Christians. One's religious beliefs and practices are thought of as one's own private concern, with which no one else has any business to meddle. Where discussions have taken place they have frequently partaken of the nature of partisan debate. More heat than light has been developed, and each party has succeeded only in more fully assuring himself that his opponent is in error and that his own views are correct.

Has not the time come when all these matters may be brought on to the platform and into the press and, without anger or prejudice or unfairness, thoroughly threshed out? I believe the time is here. Every right-minded speaker and writer, every truth-loving hearer and reader, has now the opportunity and the obligation to speed the cause of intelligent righteousness.

Sometime ago The Christian Century, Chicago, in discussing the perils of tax-exemption of church property, had something to say concerning the Roman Catholic Church. The editor of The Commonwealth, a Catholic organ, objected to speaking of that church as "a menace to American institutions and American ideals of civil and religious liberty." He also challenged The Christian Century to confirm its statement with proofs.

The editor of The Christian Century exhibits his splendid irenic spirit in these sentences:

"We rejoice to know that there are many Americans, adherents of the Roman Catholic Church, who not only claim the use of the term Christian, but who, as individuals, conform, to all practical intents and purposes, to the standards prescribed in our use of the name. We greatly value our two-fold bond of fellowship: we are alike Americans and Christians. We do not cease to wonder that these are able to reconcile themselves, as Americans and Christians, to the allegiance of the Roman Catholic Church. But our surprise is no greater in their case than in that of certain others who maintain other ecclesiastical relations." Then, in thorough-going fashion and with fine Christian spirit this editor makes three points. He says:

"In the first place, the Roman Catholic Church in the American democracy is dominated by a foreign potentate, the head of the Roman see, who claims to be a potentate, is accepted as a potentate, and is a potentate so far as modern civilization will permit him to be. This we believe to be irreconcilable with the civil and religious principles upon which our commonwealth is founded, and to constitute a permanent menace to essential ideals of our civilization. . . .

"An ecclesiastical system so profoundly and essentially autocratic; so ready when the opportunity has offered, to claim and wield arbitrary temporal power, and so loth at this very day officially and formally to relinquish that claim; so unequivocal in its claim to infallibility in interpreting truth, assuming to have received from God the keys of heaven and hell—a church which asserts all this as its right, and properly within its powers, seems to us an alarming menace in a society committed to the social and religious ideas which the fathers and the present citizens of the American commonwealth have always most devoutly cherished.

"In the second place, a system of leadership is maintained in the United States by the Roman Catholic Church which is as inconsistent with these ideals as it is consistent with the claims of the Roman see. . . . Autocracy is always a menace to democracy. The modern democratic world has asserted its right to remove the menace in civil affairs. Neighboring democratic nations have denied the right of adjoining states to maintain aggressive autocracies. We believe that Americans, committed to religious liberty, have a right to appeal conclusively to their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens to remove from our common life this menace of a priesthood not democratically controlled. To permit a large element in our population to live under an autocratic ecclesiastical regime constitutes a menace to the liberties of all, both religious and civil.

"In the third place, we note the extension in our society of so-called sacred shrines, which we feel have debased the intelligence of large elements in European populations. The 'miracles' which occur at these resorts we do not consider to be what they are alleged to be. We would characterize them as impostures, out of which revenues, unreckoned by any public accounting, but manifestly large, accrue to the Roman Catholic Church, by which the resorts and what goes on in them are financially sponsored."

There is reason for encouragement in attitude of some Roman Catholic people toward their church. They are by no means solidly united in the acceptance of the claim made by the priests and bishops and popes. They are in the church because they were born in it and brought up in its ways. While maintaining a connection with the old church they are perfectly willing to discuss with Protestants its unfounded claims and un-American methods—for they do much of their thinking, and never forget for a moment that they are living in America in the twentieth century. When Protestant Christianity comes fairly well united and harmonious multitudes of these people will readily find a genial home within its fold.

The attitude of many Christians toward other denominations is cause for encouragement, in these trying days when churches are in danger of being split asunder. Since prayers are being offered that Presbyterians may rise to a higher note of harmony, that Baptists may not become permanently divided into contending camps, that all Christians may be enabled to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace. We are getting out of the habit of praying at or against other denominations.

The fact that within denominations there is considerable controversy is not altogether to be regretted—it helps to develop a fellowship between men who have long been separated by sectarian lines. The lines are mixed and crossed that we do not find fellowship exclusively within our own fold. Men are getting together. This helps toward freer and franker discussion of likenesses and differences, and is destined to lead to a more rational apprehension of the great facts and principles fundamental to our common faith.

TEACHING EVOLUTION AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

To forbid the teaching of evolution in state schools is not an infringement on religious liberty or freedom of conscience as is loudly claimed. It is strange that the evolution promoters cannot see that religious freedom, or freedom of conscience, as we have in this country, as it relates to the different religious beliefs, or religious denominations, is not the same as the license, or privilege, to teach evolution in the State, or free public schools. The two things are not parallels. In this country we have the right accorded—privilege, freedom, to build church houses by private subscription or donation—not by public taxes—where the different denominations of Christians can teach their peculiar views and worship God in freedom as they see fit. But no one is compelled by law, under penalty, to attend any special church, or send children to hear the teaching of any special church, or to attend, or to have his children attend, any of them. This is a matter of individual choice. This is religious freedom. Whereas, as touching the State, or public schools, in North Carolina and in other States—perhaps in all—the parent or guardian is compelled by law, under penalty, to send children to these State schools, to be taught that which he does not believe, and that which he conceives to be at variance with common sense, true science and the Bible. There is no choice in the matter. No freedom of conscience, no religious liberty. But religious slavery and tyranny of the most pronounced and abandoned kind. Strange persons cannot see this radical difference. In the one case there is choice. In the other there is none. The Bolsheviks of Russia cannot exceed the tyranny of compelling a man to send his child to school to be taught a theory—but these evolutionists do not stop at teaching evolution as a theory, but teach it as a fact—at variance with the Bible and the belief of the Christian and Jewish world all down the ages.

If these evolutionists feel that they are conscience compelled, or bound, to teach evolution and infidelity, let them build their own schools and colleges, pay their own teachers, bear their own expenses, and then if any one wishes to send his children to these schools to be taught evolution, infidelity, skepticism, etc., etc., ad infinitum, he will have the privilege to do so. This is liberty. This is freedom, such as obtains among the different religious denominations. No compulsion. No one taxed to support these schools, but everybody perfectly free to contribute to the erection of buildings, paying salaries and other expenses of upkeep, etc. No fines to be paid, nor prison terms to be served, if one sees fit not to patronize these schools.

These evolutionists prating about religious liberty and freedom do not know what it is. Their conception of it is the most relentless and abandoned tyranny. It is license for themselves, and slavery, tyranny and oppression for any and all who disagree with them. All their pious talk about persecution and the inquisition is the veriest falsehood. They are the ones who are playing the role of the inquisition. Tax us and force us under penalty to send our children to them to be taught what the overwhelming majority of the world believes to be the veriest falsehood.

It does not help the matter for them to say that evolution is true. That is the very question at issue—to be proved—and it has not been proved. Also, it does not help the matter for the evolutionist to say that it does not affect one's faith or religion. The most devout, well-informed Christian people of the world know better. They know it has done it, and is doing it. The teaching of evolution may not affect the religion of the evolutionist; for he betrays the fact—no doubt unconsciously—by his writings, that he knows little, or nothing, of real religion, as the real Christian knows it. It is a kind of rationalism and infidelity. They throw away Genesis, and in doing this they throw away the law and the prophets, Christ and the apostles. This they have not the mental penetration to see, or seeing it, have not the courage to acknowledge it. We are talking about the so-called Theistic evolutionist. All other evolutionists know and affirm that evolution and the Bible do not agree.

All this talk of the evolutionist that the church is trying to stifle investigation and research is false. It is unwarranted conclusions drawn from insufficient data, conclusions at variance with the Bible, being forced on our children against our will, and we forced to pay the bills, no less volens. Tyranny, tyranny—Bolshevism!

But let the evolutionists build their own school-houses, pay their own teachers, run their own schools on their own merits, like the denominational schools. This is liberty. This is fair. Then let any who wish to patronize these schools do so. And any who do not, be at liberty to refrain from patronizing them. This is no injustice to any one—fair to all, and the matter of conscience left free. Any fair-minded person can see this. Believing is one thing, teaching is another. Because a man believes in evolution does not necessitate his teaching evolution. I do not interfere with his belief. But when he presumes to teach his belief to my boy, against my will, I have a right to interfere, and will interfere. As has already been said, the evolutionist's conception of liberty is license. According to his position, John Thomas Scopes, if one so wills, let him teach communism, free-lovism, I. W. W.-ism, bolshevism, red anarchy, or any other moral, social, or political monstrosity. These moral and mental anomalies prate much about liberty—let them practice what they preach. And if they will not, they ought to be curbed, or restrained, like any other trespasser upon the rights of others. And if the great mass of the people ever become awakened to the real situation, we believe it will be done. But if we sleep on until the rising generation is inoculated with this virus of infidelity, the result no one can forecast.

Evolution is spoken of as a science by the papers and magazines, and even the evolutionists themselves, which is false and misleading, as science is knowledge—that which is unquestionably known—not speculation. Evolution at best is bare speculation, but taught and spoken of as an established science. The whole thing bears the mark of the serpent. Characteristic of his doings ever since the garden episode. Tear off the mask and let the people see its true nature. Horns, hoofs, and all. Then if any one wishes to embrace its hideous form, let him do so. But don't force it on the young and unwary.

J. F. Dosier.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JUNE 14.

The Church in Antioch.

Lesson Text: Acts 11:19-30.

Golden Text: Acts 11:26.

The Central Truth: To be a Christian is to be like Christ, in purity of heart, uprightness of life, and in self-sacrificing service.

Scriptural Points.

1. This lesson takes up another thread of history, starting from Stephen's martyrdom, where "they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word." Acts 8:4. The ministry of Philip, the conversion and early ministry of Saul of Tarsus, and the ministry of Peter at Lydda, Joppa and Caesarea are recorded sequels of this persecution. The origin and growth of the church at Antioch in Syria is another product of this forced missionary movement.

2. These firebrands of the cross carried the word of life to Jews only, having not yet grasped the greater truth of the universality of the gospel. But some of these witnesses for Christ from Cyprus and Cyrene were bold and farsighted enough to bear testimony to Greeks sojourning in Antioch. And it was a message approved of God: "And the hand of the Lord was with them;" and their ministry was accordingly greatly blessed,—“and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord.”

3. This revival among the Gentiles at Antioch created as great a sensation as the outpouring of the Spirit in the house of Cornelius. The Jerusalem church took immediate action upon receiving such unexpected tidings. They sent Barnabas at once to investigate whether this was wild fire or a genuine work of grace.

4. Barnabas was enabled to recognize without question that the conversion of these Greeks was a real work of God. He saw the grace of God, the grace of joy in their countenances, the grace of love in their testimony, and the grace of straight living in their conversation and conduct. He was overcome with gladness and exhorted them to continue faithful to their new-found Savior and Lord.

5. It seems that Barnabas entered most heartily into this Gentile revival. He probably took official control of it. With his large gifts of faith and Holy Ghost power, he must have had wonderful success in winning souls to Christ, for it is recorded that “much people was added to the Lord.”

6. This work of grace assumed such large proportions that assistance was much needed. Barnabas thought that Saul of Tarsus would be the very sort of help desired. So he went to Tarsus and brought Saul back with him. And they two carried on the good work for a whole year.

7. “And the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch.” “Were called” indicates that this was not a name that they had primarily chosen for themselves. It was a name given by the enemies of Jesus Christ, a name of derision and contempt. It is evident that these Antioch believers cheerfully accepted this title as the most fitting and honorable that could be given.

8. The cheerful willingness of these Antioch Christians to send relief, “every man according to his ability, “to their famine-stricken brethren in Judea, was a most gratifying evidence of their newfound love to God and to mankind.

Practical Points.

1. The love of Christ is too good to keep. It grows by division. The more you love the more love you have. The waters of affliction cannot drown love, nor can the fires of persecution destroy it. “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? . . . Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.”

2. This love of God is most impelling and compelling. It cannot be hid. It is glad to bear testimony to “the author and finisher of our faith.” To confess Christ by word, conduct, and service is the supreme privilege of the Christian.

“What we have felt and seen

With confidence we tell;

And publish to the sons of men

The signs infallible.”

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE SPECIAL SESSION OF THE NORTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

High Point, N. C., June 9, 1925.

My dear Brethren:—By the request of the High Point College management, and by the direction of the Standing District Committee of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church you have been called in extraordinary session at this hour, June 9, 1925, ten A. M.

The object of this meeting is three-fold, and yet it all has to do with the financial condition surrounding the High Point College, and when all the necessary business pertaining to the High Point College is attended to this special session will adjourn. The voting members of the 1924 Annual Conference, of course are the voting members of this conference. However, a number of laymen from the various charges have been invited here today, and I suggest that you give them the courtesies of the hour that they may feel perfectly free to participate with us in all discussion.

The Object of This Meeting Briefly Stated.

You have been called here today to consider with us three things pertaining to the High Point College.

1. The indebtedness over against the pledges now due and soon to be due the College.
2. The Insurance Endowment for the College which must be paid at the rate of $15,000 per year.
3. Our own young men and young women must be led to attend the High Point College.

You may also consider anything else pertaining to the High Point College that this body may deem wise.

The Three Objects Briefly Discussed.

1. A clear-cut report will be made to you today of the valuation of this splendid property, and of the indebtedness on same. The first intention of our Board of Education, as published to the church, was to raise money for this College as fast as possible and build to the limit of the money and not go in debt for anything. But in the midst of building operations it was expensive to stop; and besides that there was such an insistent demand, on the part of our people, that sufficient buildings be completed to begin actual class work in September, 1924, that the Board of Education changed its policy and borrowed enough money to complete the four buildings now in use, and to open the College in September, 1924. This was done; but our leaders did not proceed blindly. They calculated and operated upon our promised resources. Pledges made by our own people to the amount of about $107,000, and by the High Point people to the amount of about $28,000 remain unpaid, and if this $135,000 were in the hands of Mr. J. Norman Wills, the treasurer of our building fund, he would be largely relieved of the great financial burden which is bearing so heavily upon his mind and heart.

Brethren, in some way these pledges must be collected. And it seems to me that if the makers of the pledges could realize that the College is in very great need of this money, and that it cannot very well get along without this money, many of them would somehow get the money and pay up speedily, even if they had to borrow it.

2. We have supposedly had on a campaign for Insurance Endowment for the last four months, and the greater number of our charges have been visited with a view to organizing a "Three Hundred Club," or its equal, each one of which would pay $50 per year for 10 years, and thus pay $15,000 per year, or $150,000 in ten years, which would net us about $190,000 at the end of the ten years; but not many of our people have seemed to take this matter at all seriously. So we have only received pledges on the endowment to the amount of about $6,500 per year, or considerably less than half the amount. We must have the full $15,000 per year or the good name of our church and conference will suffer, and the College which is the very heart of all our work now, will suffer. Brethren, we have obligated to pay this $15,000 per year, and it must be raised. It is simply one of the things we have to do. All of us know that it would have been better if we could have waited to complete the building fund before launching a campaign for endowment, but we had to take the insurance to get the loan with which to finish the buildings, and the first payment on the insurance came due in March, 1925, so we had to launch the campaign to raise it.

3. If we are offering our own people just as good as the other colleges are offering them, and we believe we are, then our own young people should be led to attend the High Point College. The running and the maintenance depends largely upon its student body. We are giving just as good and we are giving it at just as low a rate as any of the other Colleges our equal in this section. We should have every available dormitory room filled with eager, anxious students next September, besides a goodly number of day students from the surrounding community. To do this all of us must become boosters for the College, and not wait for Dr. Andrews, Brother Little, or Bro. Harrison to come around and line up our own young people for the College. Every M. F. boy or girl who is graduating from a high school in your home, or on your charge is certainly a prospective student for the High Point College. Of course not all of them will come here. We could not house all of them if they did; but our buildings should be crowded with our very best next fall, and they will if all of us work to that end.

The above statements give us the reason for being here today, and the committee considering the work to be done today thought that it could not be done next week in connection with the Summer Conferences. We needed just you to come here on a day with only this before you to help solve the problems of your College. For this reason please permit me to say two other things before I close.

I. Our First Year.

In September, 1924, we launched out upon the untried seas of opening and running a College, and I feel safe in saying that this time last year we did not have a single student registered to take the course. And with Dr. Andrews and Brother Harrison both working as faithfully as they knew how we did not have 50 students registered by the first of September, 1924. There was an air of uncertainty about it all which made all of us fearful for our first year. The buildings were not completed, the grounds were muddy, the faculty was new, and the high school principals back among the home folks were openly advising the high school graduates not to go to a new college which was just opening. They were telling our own boys and girls that life was too short to waste a year by entering a new college. They were telling them to let some one else make the sacrifice, you cannot afford to do it. Brethren, our College management met just those conditions last fall, and they were powerless to help it. And yet through their persistent and painstaking efforts God has led us on through a great year's work, with just two classes, and with an enrollment of 134 students in this our first year. And the income from the student body, without any endowment whatever, has paid nearly 70 per cent of the running expenses for the first year. Every other college in the state, that we know of, has a stated income over and above the income from the student body. All our state institutions draw heavily upon our state treasury, or they could not run. I have not made investigation to verify this statement; but I feel sure that an investigation would reveal the fact that not another College in North Carolina came as near meeting all its running expenses from the income from its student body as did our own.

And mind you, if the churches back home had really accepted the challenge, and had responded to the challenge, and had raised in cash and good pledges the full $300,000, which the challenge called for, this College would not only have had the benefit of the $107,000 now due it, and of an added $37,000 in subscriptions, but in this its opening year it would have had the advantage of 20 per cent of the income from a $100,000 endowment and at least a part of the income from the publishing house in Greensboro. But as it is, the College has had to work for its first year without this $107,000, much of which is due, and without the added impetus of the needed $37,000 in subscriptions to complete the $300,000, and without 20 per cent of the income from the $100,000 in endowment, and without any part of the income from the publishing house.

Thus we have unintentionally placed upon Dr. Andrews and his associates the tremendous task of running our College for this its first year without these funds. And these funds placed to the credit of the College would doubtless have enabled him to secure other funds for endowment.

This is no complaint against our people. It is simply a statement of facts. Let us not get away from the fact, that we have done well, but with a little extra effort we might have done better. And we will do better when all our folks know the actual conditions. I know that our people talk "hard times," but in other things save Kingdom service the most of them are going right on living and acting and spending in the usual way.

About the bravest and the happiest set of students anywhere in North Carolina for the last College year were housed here. They were brave because they hung right on and plowed right through the mud for the greater part of the fall and winter; and they were happy because of the sunshiny, congenial, happy, Christian conditions which confronted them in these halls and class rooms. If you have kept close watch on the conditions here for the entire year, I am sure you feel as I do, that we Methodist Protestants in the North Carolina Conference have great cause to lift up our hearts and sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," because of the way He has led us on, and because of the success He has given us in this first year's work. Blessed be His Holy Name.

II. The Time Element.

We have done exceedingly well during the last four years. Better, I think, than the most hopeful among us ever dared think we could do in so short a period of time. I do not mean that all the work has been done within the four years, much of the foundation work was long in laying; but the launching of a campaign, the choosing of a site, the erection of buildings, the opening and running of a College for its first year have all been done within the last four years, and the accomplishment here within those four years is nothing short of marvelous. We have builded better than we planned and we have gone forward faster than we had ever dreamed. We have done exceedingly well; but we must do better. And in order to do better we must be cheered on by past accomplishments to sit steady, and to keep working away with a will and with a co-operation that will put here something like an average of $50,000 per year for the next ten years. Ten years is a mighty short time in the history of an institution like this. With many of us life's tasks will be over within the ten years, while others of you will still be carrying on in the vigor of manhood; but this College will still be in its infancy ten years hence. We are building for the future, and many of us must put our life-blood, our nerve energy, our personality, and our money into it during these ten years. By that time it will have its alumni and alumnae throughout this state and other states, who will be working for the College in a way that will bring influence and money and students here, but even then the church will have to keep working right steadily on for this institution, which is already the pride of our conference.

The growth here has been so wonderful that leading men of other denominations have stood in amazement at the thought of what has been done, and some of our own leaders have said, "It is the greatest accomplishment in the entire denomination." Since others speak thus of us, it seems to me that we have a right to lift up our heads and be happy. And it seems to me that this should spur us on to greater things.

The growth here has been phenomenal. I believe we can truthfully say that its equal has never before been known in North Carolina, in so short a period of time. Certainly it has never been surpassed by any church college. Now, brethren, we must remember that the job is not completed simply because these buildings are up and open. Nor will the work be completed within the next ten years; for at the end of ten years this College will still be a growing and we trust a prosperous youth. But during that ten years it is going to take the very best there is in all of us, or else a few of us must give our lives for it.

Brethren, before the Lord, we have no right to ask Dr. Andrews and Mr. Wills to bear the financial burdens they have had to bear during the last 12 or 18 months. A few of us have gotten down beside them and have tried to help carry the burdens, but it is high time that the rank and file of our church members in every church in the conference come to pray for and work for and pay toward this enterprise until they feel the pinch of sacrifice. I sometimes wonder whether or not any of us have gone without a new hat or a new suit, or a new pair of shoes, or a gallon of gasoline, or a bite to eat that we may help along with this the greatest undertaking in the history of our church. By the grace of God it is up to every one of us to get right down to business with our people and talk this College and boost this College at breakfast, dinner and supper, and then between meals, and before we go to bed and when we get up, and when ye journey along the road and when we go to church. Anywhere and everywhere until more of our people respond, and until all of us who have responded respond again. Our names must constantly be on file in the office of this College with a pledge to pay something, and when that pledge is paid we must pledge again. With all my heart I believe that is the only way to carry on to success the work we have begun. There must be no drones and slackers among us.

Please bear this in mind: There is no one man among us, nor are there any two or three men among us, nor are there any half-dozen men among us who can arouse all our people, or even half our people to do their duty by the College. All of us must go back and lay the great need of our College upon the hearts of our people. We must teach our children diligently about this College, we must talk of it when we sit in our homes, and when we walk by the way, and when we lie down, and when we rise up. We must bind the thoughts of this College for a sign upon our hands, and they should be as frontlets between our eyes. And we should write them upon the posts of our houses and upon our gates. Every boy and every girl in every Methodist Protestant home in this conference, who even thinks of going to College when they graduate from a high school, should think first and uppermost about entering the High Point College. I cannot imagine my child thinking first of some other College. She might turn from this one to another because she couldn't get just the course desired here, or for some other good and reasonable reason; but certainly she would think of this one first and investigate its courses and its costs.

May God help us to be up and doing, leaving no stone unturned and no task omitted that might turn either dollars or students toward this College. Every individual here should at once become an energetic, persistent canvasser for funds for this College during the next thirty to ninety days. Solicit your neighbors, solicit Methodist Protestants, and especially solicit your wealthy friends, if you have such, who are not Methodist Protestants. And may the great God of heaven add His blessings to whatever efforts may be put forth.

Not Too Much Talking.

Remember, brethren, that we are in a short session of the conference with just one thing before us, the interests of this College. We trust that it will not be a day of too much talking. We have no desire to keep anybody from talking, if you are sure you have something that will help; but please don't talk at random today. There will not be time for that. Whatever proposition you have that will help make it, but make it very brief. And it will be well if you will put your proposition in writing. It may be that the discussions and propositions of this day will be committed to a committee, or to a board for the working out a definite and final course of action. If that should be done then such committee will need your proposition in writing.

With a prayer of thanksgiving to God for leading us thus far, and with a prayer for His guidance in our deliberations today and in our efforts in the coming days, I am,

Faithfully yours, A. G. Dixon,
President.

Following Dr. Dixon's address, Brother J. Norman Wills made a statement of the assets and liabilities of the Board of Education, and President Andrews reviewed briefly the opening year of the college. Talks were made by Rev. W. F. Kennett, Rev. N. G. Bethea and Dr. T. M. Johnson. On motion a committee of three ministers and three laymen (T. M. Johnson, J. F. McCulloch, J. E. Pritchard, J. E. Stone, J. M. Cutchin, and Brother Williams of Winston) was appointed by President Dixon to report their findings and recommendations. The Conference adjourned for dinner in the College Dining Hall. After dinner the Committee on Findings reported as follows:

Report of the Committee on Findings.

Your Committee on Findings feel that the Methodist Protestant Church in North Carolina is fortunate in having the splendid buildings already erected for High Point College. Our college has opened encouragingly, justifying high hopes for the future and we believe in maintaining as our goal the rank of an A-grade college by the time the first class is graduated.

The present financial situation, while serious, is simply the result of building faster than income was provided, and should not discourage us but stimulate us to diligent and strenuous effort to discharge our obligation to the contractor who has kindly favored us.

With a view to quickly collecting balances on pledges to the building fund, we recommend that statements of accounts be sent to pastors, each for his own people, and that pastors be requested to look personally after collections, calling in such help as they may find necessary or desirable, and reporting results to the president of the college. We further recommend that each pastor be requested to lay this matter upon the hearts of his people at his next appointment with them, and that the president of the college be requested to send statements of account to individuals owing as much as five dollars each.

The Endowment Fund is just as essential as the Building Fund, and we recommend that the effort to secure pledges for $15,000 a year for ten years for endowment insurance premiums be continued until it is completed. To this end we recommend that full information as to quotas and amounts already pledged be furnished all pastors by the president of the college and that pastors be requested to carry on the canvass, with the aid of neighboring pastors if deemed advisable, until the quota has been secured in good pledges.

SPECIAL OFFER OF TITHING LITERATURE.

The unusual partnership proposition described in pamphlet No. 38, "Winning Financial Freedom," is now so popular and effective that we are again offering to furnish any minister, without charge, postage paid, a sufficient quantity of the pamphlet to supply one copy to each member of his official church boards.

If you so request in your order, we will add an "Offer No. 3" package which contains samples of the 38 pamphlets we publish—about 475 pages—for $0.50.

When you write please mention the Methodist Protestant Herald; also, give your denomination, The Layman Company,
50 E. Superior Street,
Chicago, Ill.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.Resolutions of Respect.

Whereas, it hath pleased the dear Heavenly Father to call two of our beloved members, Mesdames Joyce Camaline Snotherly, and Mary Louise Hatley to their reward; therefore be it resolved:

First—That we bow in humble submission to Him who doeth all things well;

Second—That the Ladies' Aid society of the First Methodist Protestant Church of Albemarle, N. C., has lost two most loyal members who walked close to their Lord, and did their best in all their tasks;

Third—That we shall always treasure their memory as co-workers in kingdom service;

Fourth—That we extend our love and sympathy to their loved ones, and pray that God in His love may comfort and bless them in their great grief and loss;

Fifth—That a page in our record be inscribed to the memory of these beloved women;

Sixth—that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of each, a copy to the Methodist Protestant Herald, and one to the county papers for publication.

Mrs. John U. Whitlock,

Mrs. J. L. Trollinger,

Mrs. R. J. Shoe, Committee.

Albemarle, May 18, 1925.

Mrs. Sarah Emma Swicegood.—May 27, 1925, death entered the home of H. G. Swicegood and claimed for its victim his beloved wife, the daughter of T. J. and S. C. Frits.

She leaves husband, one son and one daughter, father and mother, six sisters, three brothers.

She professed faith in Christ at the age of 12 years and joined the Methodist Protestant Church at Shiloh. About 17 years ago she moved her membership to Mt. Carmel.

November 16, 1913, she was married to H. G. Swicegood. She was the most devoted wife, a loving mother, and a consecrated Christian and we believe that her departure was an uplifting, exaltation, an enthronement.

A brief song and prayer service was conducted at her home, but the funeral service was conducted at Mt. Carmel church by pastor, assisted by Rev. C. B. Way, her former pastor. Brother Barr from Reed made a short address and the pastor from Sandy Ridge made a brief talk. Services were conducted at grave.

An evidence of her good name was the great host of friends who gathered to pay their last tribute of respect to her. W. L. Carson.

CONFERENCE JOURNALS WANTED.

I am interested in collecting a file of the Minutes of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church for the North Carolina Collection in this library. Can you give me any help in securing back issues? My file lacks the following: All before 1883, all between 1889 and 1899, issues for 1900, 1903, 1904, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1920, 1921, 1923.

I will appreciate your help. The file will be bound when completed, and will be a most useful reference work for the student in church history.

Very truly yours,
Chapel Hill, N.C.

Mary Thornton,

[Can any of our readers supply the copies wanted? If so, please write to Miss Thornton.—Editor.]

Resolutions of Respect.

Alfred N. Roberson was born October 14, 1847. Died March 14, 1925, age 77 years. He was born in southern Alamance and spent his entire life in this community.

He was converted in early life and joined Concord Methodist Protestant church where he remained a faithful member until death. He was always present at church services and contributed of his means monthly.

He had been an official member of his church for years, and was delegate to the annual conference several times and also president of Newlin Township Convention for about twenty years.

He was educated at Graham Normal College which later became Elon College. He taught school for a number of years and was always interested in all educational activities.

Mr. Roberson was not only loyal to his church but was ready to support every progressive move of his community. He had great influence over all who came in contact with him and his advice will be missed in years to come.

In the death of Mr. Roberson the home has lost a true husband, a loving father, the church a faithful member, and the community a most esteemed citizen.

His popularity as a friend and neighbor was proved by the vast audience that was assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to him. Funeral services were conducted by his pastor, Rev. H. L. Isley, assisted by Rev. S. W. Taylor.

While we shall miss him in every walk of life, yet we feel that Mr. Roberson has gone to the home beyond to dwell there forever. May we each who knew him strive to make that preparation that he made and be ready when we shall be called to our reward. Therefore be it resolved,

First, That we bow in humble submission to the will of Him that doeth all things well;

Second, That we extend our heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved ones;

Third, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Methodist Protestant Herald and the Burlington Daily Times for publication and a copy be furnished the bereaved family.

Holmes.—Myrtle Holmes was born January 4, 1905, died ay 30, 1925, aged 20 years, four months, 26 days. She had been a member of Chestnut Ridge church for about eight years. Funeral services were conducted by the writer at Chestnut Ridge church May 31, after which the remains were laid to rest in the church cemetery.

One of the largest crowds this writer has ever seen on an occasion like this was present to pay respect to the memory of the deceased May God comfort the bereaved ones.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

We look upon immigration as a purely domestic problem, but it is far more than that. These thousands who are coming to us from lands beyond the seas were coming to a thoroughly Christianized and consecrated America. Our problems would be essentially different. But while Protestantism, and Christianity are making substantial and fairly rapid progress in America, we as a nation are not Christian as we ought to be. During the century from 1800 to 1900 church membership in America rose from seven per hundred to 24 per hundred. The total Protestant church membership as reported by the Year Book of churches in the 1924-25 edition is 28,366,000. Our cry is not the cry of those who have led, but the challenge of those whose great opportunities are at hand, and whose best efforts are being limited by a lack of the work and funds necessary to the accomplishment of our great task.

Religion was the chief concern of the Pilgrims. Their first desire was to establish a nation where duty to God and service to Him would have primary consideration. Temporal interests and affairs were absolutely dominated by religious convictions. The Puritan faith came to America not to reproduce the institutions and life of Europe, but to create a new commonwealth whose principles and practices should be in harmony with the ordinance of God. What a comment upon present-day conditions was the reply of Tony, a little Italian boy at a Vacation Bible School in New York City, "Oh, no, teacher—we don't go to church any more—we're Americans now." Or the report of a teacher in Arkansas who found many children in one district who were entirely ignorant of the meaning of Christmas.

The finest ideals in our American life are the product of the standards established by the Pilgrims, and these ideals must be reproduced in every generation if America is to fulfill her mission to the world. The real America in those days was then as now, a certain set of ideas, and an inner life of vision and hope. It was a bundle of convictions about God, and freedom; about life, and liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Our chief legacy from the generation that lived in America a hundred years ago was not our lands, our buildings, or our wealth—not even the forms of government. Our finest inheritance from the founders of our country is that intangible asset of ideals, beliefs about God, freedom, and justice, and brotherhood. This was the real America that was instilled into the hearts and minds of the growing youth of America a hundred years ago.

But what chance have the children of the immigrant reared in the Ghettos, the Little Italys, the Bohemian Hills, the China-towns, the mill-towns, and the mine patches where many of our "new Americans" are found? The question of the foreigner will be discussed more fully in another article. It is introduced here to call attention to the contrast presented in the coming of the first settlers, and in the coming of these new pioneers. The earlier America must impress every careful student of history as being more nearly committed to the purpose and spirit of our Heavenly Father,

Charles H. Back.

NEWS FROM JAPAN.

Dear Friends:—I realize it has been some time since you have heard from your missionary in Japan.

I received the Conference Journal and a letter from the secretary of the Conference some time ago. It does a fellow good to know the folks at home are thinking about him. It was a great joy to read the journal through and note the forward steps taken by the Conference.

The Japan Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church met the last of March, and had for three days a most splendid session. There were many signs of real growth and progress. This conference took a most hopeful step in the direction of self-support. As many of you know this Conference is still a Mission Conference and draws most of its support from the Board of Foreign Missions. There are enrolled twenty ordained preachers and six probationers. Six young men are in the Seminary preparing themselves for the ministry.

There is an interesting story connected with one of the young men who entered the ministry this year. While in our school he decided that he would preach. And his mother and father gave their consent for him to follow such a course. But at the time of his graduation his father, having started business of his own, changed his mind about the future work of his son. In Japan to go contrary to the wishes of one's parents means many times expulsion from the home. The pastor of the church pleaded with the parents, who by the way were not Christians, but they would not consent. The young man, rather than to give in to the wishes of his parents, prayed earnestly for them for about a month, with the result that they saw the folly of their way and encouraged him to prepare himself for the work which his heart yearned so much to do, namely the spreading of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

We are constantly reminded of the foe which we are here to fight. Almost every morning we are awakened by the bell of a near-by temple, calling its attendants to worship that which they know not. Notwithstanding Christian missions have been at work in this land for over fifty years there still remain some 71,626 temples dedicated to the worship of Buddha, requiring the services of about 52,836 priests. Besides these, shrines of the Shinto faith number 114,548, with 14,836 priests to direct their worshippers. Although the Government has gone on record in recent years as saying that Shintoism could not be considered any longer as a religion, yet the older and more uneducated people in particular still use its places of worship as such. Against this great body of heathen priests, stands 6,497 Christian workers, including both Japanese and missionaries, and 2,300 churches. Although the forces for Christ are still much smaller than other religions as to number, yet what a mighty influence this body of Christians is having in every avenue of this nation's life. It is a blessed experience to be living in this land and note the influence of the Gospel of Jesus Christ gradually changing the thoughts and ideals of these people. They are not always conscious that they are honoring Christ and His Gospel, but they are nevertheless,

The battle is not won yet, nevertheless there are signs of victory. Our strength as a Christian army will continue to depend right much upon the home-base of supplies. Remember we missionaries are not only fighting for the cause of righteousness, but we are here to train soldiers, who will little by little swell into a mighty army for our Lord here in the Far East.

Don't permit the Jingoists in the homeland to lead you astray to the real spirit of these people. But may God give each of you the spirit of good-will toward these your brethren in Christ. There is no country in the world that watches every move the American people take more than the Japanese people.

I see in the Herald that the North Carolina Conference has been asked to raise $500 toward the school church here. I wonder if you fully realize how badly we need a church. First, remember we have an enrollment of over a thousand boys. Then remember the only place we have for the Christian training of these boys is a little building without ceiling, and a floor which many of you would not have in your barns. When the present church building is packed, it will not hold over 200 boys. Unless we can get a new church pretty soon, I am afraid the fathers and mothers of this land who are looking to us for the Christian training of their boys will lose faith. I sincerely trust that those of you who have been so faithful in the support of your home institutions, will also be able to give us a lift in Japan at this needy moment.

Your missionary in Japan,

J. Clyde Auman.

—Serious trouble broke out at Shanghai, China, a few days ago. That unhappy land is torn by factions which are warring for supremacy. "Where the carcass is, there will the vultures be gathered together."

—Madames Pope and F. M. Taylor, of near Enfield, were among the visitors at High Point College this week.

The college was built primarily for our young people, and we recommend that every pastor be requested to furnish President Andrews with a list of his young people finishing high school this year and any others ready for college and that he visit these young people and endeavor to enlist them for our college, promptly forwarding the names of those secured and advising the president as to others that might be secured.

With a view to meeting immediate demands for money due the contractor, we recommend that an appeal be made to those present to raise at once the sum of $50,000 either by loan to the Board of Education or by signing with the Board of Education a note to the contractor.

We recommend that the address of the president of this Annual Conference, Dr. A. G. Dixon, in which he stated the object of this special session of the Annual Conference, be published in the Methodist Protestant Herald.

This report was adopted. The appeal for money on loan secured promise of $5,000, and fifty of the brethren present endorsed a note for $45,000 to be given by the Board of Education to Mr. Stewart, the contractor.

A number of the brethren made speeches in appreciation of the college, and more would have spoken had there been time.

This was the first special session of our Annual Conference held within our recollection. It was made necessary by the exigencies of the situation, and we trust that time will show that it fully accomplished its purpose. Surely it will help us to realize the need of general co-operation in the work given us as a church. In union there is strength, strength sufficient for our God-given tasks. This session of Conference lasted but a few hours, six or seven, but we believe it did a great day's work. May our Father's blessing be upon it and upon those who put their hearts into the work and upon all who in like spirit join in hereafter.

Wood-Gibson.

At the M. P. parsonage in Henderson Sunday, June 7, at 12:30 o'clock, the writer united in marriage Miss Annie Gibson and Mr. William Erwin Wood. Mrs. Wood is the only child of our Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Gibson and has lived in this community all her life. She is a member of the Henderson M. P. church and is a splendid young woman. Mr. Wood has a position with the Riggan Opera House in this city. After the ceremony the happy couple took a northbound train for a short wedding trip. We are glad to know that they will continue to make this city their residence. The best wishes of the community follow them.

J. E. Pritchard.

—The special session of the Annual Conference at High Point College last Tuesday was attended by a large majority of the ministers and by perhaps one third of the lay members. These are busy days for laymen who farm.

Not many changes this time. On the G. C. B. Mt. Pleasant is following up fine. We have come to depend on Mt. Pleasant's contribution. On the G. C. B. Concord made a fine contribution. Randleman and Charlotte, Roberta and Fairview each made advances. We are looking forward to a great many more contributions in this next week. A. G. Dixon.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES FOR SUNDAY, JUNE 21.

Life as a Hurdle Race.

Daily Readings.

Mon. Overcoming temptation. 1 Cor. 10: 11-13.
Tues. Overcoming doubt. John 20: 24-29.
Wed. Overcoming hatred. Rom. 12: 17-21.
Thurs. Overcoming fear. Ps. 91: 1-16.
Fri. Overcoming misfortune. Job 1: 13-22.
Sat. Overcoming selfishness. Rom. 15: 1-7.
Sunday. Topic. Heb. 12: 1-4.

Some Bible Hints.

The living are spectators as we run this race, a fact which should inspire us to do our best (v. 1).

Weights are bad things to carry over hurdles or obstacles, and sins, anger, temper, gossip are weights (v. 1).

Jesus is the pace setter in this race. He knows what we should do, and will do if we follow Him (v. 2).

Jesus is both example and trainer. If we follow Him we get the benefit of His knowledge and experience (v. 2).—The Daily Companion.

A Hurdle-Race Meeting.

Let the hurdles be songs, prayers, readings, talks, visitors, etc. Give every member of the society an opportunity to leap each hurdle in order named. Or, if you wish, divide the society into opposing teams for the race. Let each hurdle count a certain number of points. Tally the counts and announce at the close of the meeting which side leaped the most hurdles. Other variations of the idea are possible.

The Leader's Talk.

Life is before us. We had nothing to say about coming into the world, but we have everything to say about what we shall do with our lives. Our parents and others may help us to decide our course to some extent, but, in the final analysis, the decision is up to us. There is no better place in which to face this question squarely than a Christian Endeavor meeting.

Life is a challenge to every red-blooded young man and woman. Its possibilities are almost unlimited. The opportunities before us call out the very best within us, if we look at them properly. There are plenty of things to be done in the world, things worth while, and the young folks who decide to do their best to make the world better are the ones who will accomplish them.

Our topic tonight is about a race—the Christian race. Nobody can live up to his highest and best unless he is willing to run this race for just what it is, a race in the name, in the cause, and in the power of Christ. The Christian life is the only life which counts for the utmost in this world and in the world to come. We must determine to run it to a finish and to receive the crown.

Determine to Win.

No runner ever won in a foot-race unless he first made up his mind to do so, or, at least, to do his level best. Determination is essential to satisfactory living and working. Make up your mind what particular sort of race you are going to run—after getting all your facts in hand—then decide to use your utmost strength and ability to run it well.

Many parents' hearts are saddened because they expect something worth while from their children, and yet the children apparently make little effort to measure up to their expectations. Sacrificing on the part of your parents will accomplish little unless you determine to do your part in running the race set before you. Gratitude, alone, should impel you to do your best, for their sakes.

Overcoming Life's Obstacles.

Hurdles are necessary in order to develop us properly as we race onward in life. Smooth running, in itself, is not sufficient. Obstacles must be met, they must be overcome, and in so doing we gain character and ability. The young person who starts out in life with the idea that he should never have any difficulties to surmount will not get very far without some hard tumbles.

Self-Made.

There are very few "self-made men" in the world. Some will tell you that it is what they are, others will be given that designation by an admiring public, but usually there is somebody else and something else which furnished them a part of their power. Sometimes men are "mother-made," sometimes "father-made," often "God-made," but never made successful by their own power and ability alone.

First Essential.

Faith in your God, in yourself and in your life undertaking is essential if you would run well your race. You can not make a proper success of something in which you do not believe. You can not have power with men unless you have power with God—and that is based upon faith.

Other Essentials.

The runner has to keep moving if he expects to win. The runner in the race of life must keep moving also, if he expects to succeed. The slothful worker never satisfies anybody, not even himself. He has to be watched. He must be prodded continually. And finally he is discharged. Keep fire in the fire-box, keep steam in the boiler, and keep moving.

A goal is necessary in a foot-race. You must be sure you are running in the right direction, and upon the right track. You can't afford to waste your effort in getting nowhere. Activity alone will not bring success. It must be activity with a purpose. And, too, that purpose must be right if a person expects the blessing of God upon it.

Never give up in the race of life. Victory has been snatched from defeat, oftentimes, simply because one refused to give up. Young folks need to burn this truth into their consciousness—that they will meet obstacles, that enemies even may try to deter them, that various things will occur which tend to discourage and to defeat them—but if they never give up, the victory will be theirs.

There is a lot of satisfaction in work well-done, even if the goal be not attained completely. Every runner must learn to run well, even though he may never take first place. He must be a good loser. And in being a good loser, he usually proves himself a winner. So it is with our life-work. We may not be able to do everything we plan, but we can do well what we are able to accomplish—and God will give us the blessing we merit.

At the End of the Race.

The crown of victory meant a great deal to the winner in the Olympian race. It usually doesn't mean much to young people. Life seems so sweet; there are so many unpleasant things which come our way; we don't have time to think of the crown over on the other side. But some time the crown will look beautiful to us, as we come nearer to the other shore. And what a beautiful thing it will be when we receive it from His hands!—From the C. E. Quarterly.

OVER THE TWELVE HUNDRED MARK! Abemarle and Lexington register a Hundred Percent!

With just a week yet to go, our registration for the Young People's Conference has gone beyond the 1200 mark and is still going strong.

Abemarle and State Street, Lexington, have done the unusual and have registered more than 100 per cent of their membership for the conference. Good for you, Abemarle and State Street. Abemarle stands at the head of the list now with a total of one hundred and forty-one! That's simply great! She has a membership of one a hundred and thirty-five. State Street also goes five beyond their actual membership.

Come on! Let's go, High Point, Greensboro, and all the rest of you folks and help out Abemarle, Burlington, Concord, State Street, and the rest of us. Remember we must have fifteen hundred by next Monday!

EVERY DAY AND SUNDAY TOO.

There're so many kinds of joy
Waiting for a little boy
'Round the corner, in the street,
Over head and under feet,
In the sunlight and the gloom,
In the cheerful dining-room,
He should look for something new
Every day and Sunday, too.

He should make it then a rule,
When each day he goes to school,
Always willingly to look
Through the pages of his book.
Hidden in their words he'll find Joys indeed of every kind
Growing plainer to his eyes
As he studies, growing wise.

And is mother not a joy,
Always thoughtful of her boy?
Daddy, too—for who's so good
Playing he is Robin Hood?
Sister goes away awhile
With her cheery laugh and smile.
Then who is it feels so blue
Every day and Sunday, too?

Could a little chap behold
Skies of red and white and gold;
Feel the grass beneath his feet,
Emerald-green and flower-sweet,
And not feel the joy they hold?
Cloud and sky and grassy mold
All were made for our delight
If we look at them aright.

There is joy for every day
That will meet you on the way.
Monday's joy may quickly fly,
Tuesday's joy may hold a sigh—
Never is our joy complete,
Though 'tis often very sweet—
But there's joy awaiting you
Every day and Sunday, too.

THE APPLE CORE.

Joe Ramsey sat studying by the open window, for he was a Fresh Air Fiend. He wore a red-checked mackinaw and a cap and his nose and ears were red. He could think better in the fresh air, he explained to his family, so they all went to sit in the living room upstairs where the air wasn't so fresh—that is, all except Bust, Joe's faithful dog.

Suddenly Bing! something flew in the open window and hit Joe on the cheek. It was something a good deal tougher than fresh air. Bust set up a terrible velping and barking. Joe sprang angrily to his feet. He leaned out of the window and saw Mildred Crane coming toward the house. He looked back into the room and saw an apple core that had been hurled at him. He put two and two together.

Of course, Joe shouldn't have done it, but he didn't take time to think. Bing! out of the window flew the apple core, landing right on Mildred's neck. She was a thin girl with a long white neck, which always reminded Joe of a piece of cooked macaroni—it was so long, so white and soft-looking.

Mildred gave a cry, not because she was hurt much, but naturally she was surprised. She looked around but, of course, Joe had ducked out of sight. Her best friend was Joe's sister Anita. Anita saw Mildred and opened the window of the upstairs living room to speak to her but Mildred thought Anita had hit her with the apple core which she saw lying on the walk. So she picked up the core and threw it at Anita. Bing! it flew in the window, but instead of finding its mark, it flashed into the room and landed square on the side of Dad Ramsey's head.

"Who did that!" roared the gentleman, springing to his feet.

"Mildred did," said Anita. "But she meant it for me, but I'm glad she missed."

"You are, eh?" said her father. "Glad it hit me, I suppose."

"Yes," replied Anita giggling, "because you have a better aim than I. Come on, Dad, sock her with it."

Dad Ramsey was a big, stout man but he got to the window in a flash—no nimble squirrel could have beaten him to it! Somehow his little daughter's advice appealed to him. The apple core was good and Dad Ramsey's hair was thin, and while he saw the joke he felt that one good joke deserves another. All the same I am sorry to have to tell it but he raised his arm and threw the apple core rather hard. Bing! It hit Mildred on the shoulder and glanced off, losing two seeds on the journey.

Mildred looked up again and saw Anita's grinning face.

"All right for you!" she cried, dashing after the apple core.

Bing! It flew back into the Ramsey house; This time it hit a picture on the wall above Mother Ramsey's head, glanced off the picture and landed right in the lady's part on the top of her pretty brown head.

"Oh, how horrid!" she cried, jumping up.

"Let me have it!" cried Phil, Anita's young brother.

Before anybody could stop him, Phil dashed to the window and threw the core again. Mildred had decided not to call that day, and was hurrying off when bing! the apple core hit her on the back between her shoulder blades. It was a good shot, considering the distance.

Mildred started to run and she ran all the way home and told her mother that she didn't like Anita Ramsey any more.

Meanwhile a roguish face appeared from behind a fence near the Ramsey house. Al Brown loved a practical joke and he had been all doubled up with laughter ever since he had hit his studious friend Joe with the apple core. It was too good a joke to keep, so he hustled as fast as he could up the walk in the Ramsey's to tell Joe about it.

Phil Ramsey was still looking out to see if Mildred came back. He was just the age and kind of boy when eating is a serious business. In fact, he was almost always hungry. Now he was just eating a fine banana. He knew it was wrong, but with his last big mouthful he checked the skin out of the window. It fell on the walk in front of Al Brown. Al's heel came flat on the skin, he skidded and fell bing! on the walk.

"Gee!" Phil exclaimed. "Al's fallen down and now he's lying there sort of writhing."

The Ramsey family crowded to the window, then they all raced down to help Al. Joe was already helping him to his feet when Dad Ramsey reached him.

"I'm all right," said Al, but they made him come in and rest his foot, which had been wrenched a little.

Sitting in the living room with a large piece of ginger bread in his hand, Al told them about the apple core. Of course, they all laughed, then Anita went and telephoned Mildred. Her mother answered the telephone.

"This is Anita," the little girl said. "May I speak to Mildred?"

"She doesn't care to speak to you, Anita," was the answer. "She says you threw an apple core at her three times."

"I didn't, it was Dad!" replied Anita, indignantly.

"What!" cried Mildred's mother, "You mean, Mr. Ramsey threw apple cores at my little girl?"

"He and my brother Phil," said Anita. "It was just in fun."

"Well, I don't think much of that kind of fun," snapped Mrs. Crane. "Mildred came home all upset."

Anita didn't like to tell on Mildred, but she felt she ought to defend her own father and brother. She was just going to explain that Mildred had started it, when Mrs. Crane hung up the receiver. Mildred was her only child and Mrs. Crane felt full of indignation.

"Why did you go and say I did it?" demanded Dad Ramsey. "They'll think I'm crazy, a respectable lawyer like me throwing apple cores at people. Now, what'll we do?"

They talked about it, as families will do, each suggesting different things. Suddenly Joe called out: "Look! Here comes Mildred."

Sure enough! There came Mildred, with her father's walking stick on which she had tied a white handkerchief. Down swarmed the Ramsey family to meet her with explanations.

"Al," said Dad Ramsey to the boy, "If you hadn't been punished already by the banana peel and the law of gravitation, I would certainly give you a good licking for all this."

"Then I'm sure glad I slipped on the banana peel, sir," said Al, with a giggle. "Mrs. Ramsey, this ginger bread is awful good medicine for ankles, mine is almost well. There's only one little sore place right here."

"And I suppose, you dreadful boy, you need a little more ginger bread to cure that, eh?" said Mrs. Ramsey, trying to look severe.

And, of course, he did.—Selected.

TOMMIE TURTLE, RUNAWAY!

By Maud Wilcox Niedermeyer.

Down on the beach Tommie Turtle was moving along slowly but steadily. Every now and then he would thrust his head out of his shell house, which he carried on his back, and look behind him.

"I'll make it this time," he chuckled to himself, as he drew in his head and plodded along. "I bet that they won't catch me now!"

Tommie Turtle was running away. Would you believe it? He was running away from his father and mother and brothers and sisters!

Now Tommie had tried to run away lots of times before, but his father had always found him and dragged him back home. Then, he had given him a regular turtle spanking!

But this time Tommie had traveled a good ance, way down to the beach, and nobody caught him. He didn't know where he was going, but he was sure that he would have a great adventure. And I tell you he did! Pretty soon he heard a child's voice. He looked in his head and lay very still. He thought that he could fool the person, but the next moment he heard the voice cry out: "Look, look, Uncle Jack, look at what I've found!"

"It's a turtle, Sonny. Well, well! Shall I take it back to the boat with us?" Tommie Turtle could hear Uncle Jack clearly, and he shivered a bit. "Yes, let's!" cried Sonny, and he picked up the turtle by its house.

There was a queer feeling to Tommie to be carried in the air, and he drew in his head and lay still farther. It frightened him at first, since he was out for an adventure, he decided that he would enjoy it. So he kept a top lookout from inside his shell. Sonny carried him down to the edge of the water and put him in a box that he found on the beach.

"Now, then, Mr. Turtle, we'll put you in the stern of the row boat," Tommie heard Uncle Jack say.

Of course there was nothing for him to do but go where he was put, and back to the boat he was carried. Sonny got in and sat down beside him, and Uncle Jack took the oars.

There was only a short row to the yacht that was anchored in the harbor. But when they got aboard such confusion! Sonny's brother and sister shouted and fairly shrieked at sight of the turtle, and Tommie was passed around and around. He felt very much like sticking out his head and snapping at those pink fingers. He was a little bit afraid for his head. When some one mentioned turtle soup! Tommie shuddered. Horrors! He crept farther and farther into his house. He wished with all his might that he had minded his parents' advice and not run away.

At last the children grew tired of him, and Uncle Jack put him back in his box, and set it on the deck.

Those awful words, "turtle soup," kept ringing in Tommie's head. He must get out of that box and back on land somehow. But how?

Cautiously he peeked out of his house. It was quiet everywhere. Not a soul was in sight. He could hear the lapping of the water against the side of the boat, and how good it sounded! Out came a front foot; then the other. Out came a back foot; then the other. The box was small and by scrambling about Tommie finally got his head and one foot over the edge. Then he jerked himself up, and as he tumbled over the top and sprawled on the deck.

He crawled along to the edge, and peered down at the water. It looked a long ways off. Then he thought, "turtle soup"! And the next minute he made up his mind and tumbled overboard. Down, down he went. Ca-plunk! Ca-plunk! And he disappeared beneath the surface. But he came up almost at once, and started to swim toward shore.

Why! but that was a long swim. His legs ached, and his house seemed terribly heavy. He wanted his father and his mother, and oh, how he wanted to be home! Suppose he should drown! That was nearly as bad as being made into turtle soup.

He caught at a piece of driftwood that floated by, and crawled up on it. Gracious, it was good to rest! But the tide was falling, and the wood drifted out, so he didn't dare stay long. Off he tumbled and started again on his long swim.

At last, weak and exhausted, he crawled up on his own beach. He was so thankful, he just lay there a while, and enjoyed the feeling of the wet sand under him. Then he heard his father's voice. It sounded like music to him.

He knew now the dangers of running away, and he was ready enough to promise his parents he would never do it again.

Of course, he had to get a turtle spanking for being naughty, but that was lots better than being made into turtle soup!—Selected.

THE CAT THAT WENT TO MARKET.

By Frances Marget Fox.

The cat belonged to Mrs. Eliza Hard in the long, long ago when Philadelphia was new. Mrs. Hard and her husband were Quakers who had come sailing overseas to the new world because the King of England wouldn't let folks have their own kind of churches and do what they believed to be right. He insisted that they must say their prayers in church, just so, and so, and they must do this, and that, as the king advised and not as their hearts required. While Mr. Hard lived in England he must do as the king told him to do about going to church and saying his prayers, and not as his conscience said was right.

That was why Mr. Hard and many of his relatives and neighbors of old England came with their wives and families to make new homes in wild America. William Penn himself invited Mr. and Mrs. Hard to come with him in his ship, to live in the Colony he had started in the new world, on purpose for those who believed as he did. All the way across the Atlantic in that little ship Mrs. Hard heard her husband and others talk about the land where they could have what they called "liberty of conscience."

In England Mrs. Hard had a comfortable home with servants to do the housework. In Philadelphia Mr. Hard had to build with his own hands a house to live in; not because he was a poor man but because there were no workmen to be hired.

Mrs. Hard's first home in America was a cave. This cave was the place where her sister was living with her husband, and where Mr. and Mrs. Hard were invited to stay until they could put up their tent.

The first thing all the Quakers of that early time did when they landed was to begin building their houses. Mrs. Hard followed the example of all the women; she tried to help her husband build their house.

Just when the cat came to live with them we are not told. It may be that Mrs. Hard brought the cat from England. Anyway, she had a fine, high-stepping cat before she had a home of her own.

One morning when Mrs. Hard had been at work helping her husband saw logs and carrying water for the mortar when he was building his chimney, she was so tired she looked ready to drop. She had never worked at any real labor before in her life. Mr. Hard felt so sorry that he said gently.

"Thee, my dear, had better think of dinner."

As he had said, "Thee, my dear, must no longer help me saw logs because thee is too wearied," Mr. Hard knew that Mrs. Hard would have of no more end of the saw and would have sawed and sawed and sawed.

She turned away in a minute when he spoke of dinner. She knew, though, what Mr. Hard didn't know: and that was that there was nothing left to eat in their tent but bits of crackers and cheese; it seemed as if there could be no dinner that day. Mrs. Hard went weeping all the way to her tent. What to do she didn't know. She wondered why she ever crossed the stormy Atlantic to endure such hardships in this new world. Just for a few seconds she wished that she had stayed in England. Because Mr. Hard had so many troubles of his own, Mrs. Hard had not told him that their supply of food was gone. There were no shops in Philadelphia then, so there was only one thing she could think of to do and that was to ask her friends for help; but she could not do that until she stopped crying.

Suddenly a question came into Mrs. Hard's mind; it was something like this: "Did thee not come for liberty of conscience, and has thee not got it,—also being provided far beyond thy expectations?" She was probably thinking then of her sister, from whom she had been parted for several years, but who welcomed her on her arrival and shared with her a cave.

Anyway, Mrs. Hard straightway said her prayers. Down on her knees went that beautiful girl, for she was only a girl then, even if she was married; down on her knees she went to thank God for his goodness and to ask him to forgive her and to continue his loving care.

Just about that time the cat went to market, and his market was the wildwood. When Mrs. Hard rose from her knees, with the tears wiped from her eyes and serene trust in God in her heart, in stepped the cat. That cat walked into the tent and gave to his mistress what he had caught in the wildwood market,—a fine, large rabbit.

When Mr. Hard came to dinner, he found a feast prepared in his tent. When he heard the story of the cat and the rabbit, he too gave thanks to God, just as his conscience advised, and never, never was this story forgotten by those who belonged in this Quaker family, but has been told over and over to their children even to this day.—Sunday School Times.

SKYSCRAPER CHURCH.

"Broadway Temple," a combination of Methodist church, apartment house and business building, is soon to be erected in New York City. It is to be 24 stories high and will cost four million dollars. Half of the sum has been raised by popular subscription, of which John D. Rockefeller, Jr., (a Baptist) gave a quarter of a million dollars. The other half will be raised by placing a mortgage on the property. Besides the church the building will have 500 rooms for young men and more than 100 apartments for small families.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

State Street, Lexington.—Notwithstanding the hot weather our work here is encouraging. Last Sunday we reached the 99 mark in our Sunday school and we had splendid attendance at both preaching services. It looks now as if we will have to enlarge our quarters before we had planned. Our Christian Endeavor society is doing fine work and the W. F. M. Society is going right on. Two new classes have been organized recently in our Sunday school.

Reporting on the work of our high school students in other places, the M. P.'s in Lexington come in for their share of the honors along that line. Miss Clara Tayloe, of our church, was the valedictorian of her class of 60 graduates here and Lloyd Leonard, who is president of our Christian Endeavor society, but a member in the country, won second place in the high school contest; and Willie Veigh Leonard, his sister, won the medal in the seventh grade declaimers' contest. These, with other reports that I see, notably Mebane, show us the importance of providing the very best for our own in the way of a college, for we have our share in some of the brightest boys and girls in the country.

These people here do not forget to send in good things to their pastor if they do live in town. Some say that the country preacher is the only one that gets good things, but look at this list. Mrs. J. B. Leonard, buttermilk and sweet milk and butter a number of times; Mrs. Evans, sweet milk and butter and eggs when we need them; Mrs. F. J. Cox, two dozen eggs; Miss Mary Nobe Evans, gallon strawberries; Mrs. J. W. Lindsay, peaches and strawberries; J. A. Walser, fish; Mrs. Penninger, onions and lettuce, and a nice lot of strawberries from Mrs. Harkey and Mrs. Evans. And last but not least, while in Thomasville helping Brother Reynolds, Brother D. R. Connell gave me a nice straw hat. Thank you, good friends. All, from the least to the greatest were appreciated. Now to you, dear reader, will you please pray for us here, for we have a great task ahead of us to build as we need to in order to do our part in this town and community. There is a big opportunity here and we have a faithful little band to undertake the work. All working harmoniously, which is a great asset for a great task.

Sincerely, N. G. Bethea.

Shelby.—Last Sunday was one of the warmest days we have experienced here this summer. Despite the warm weather our Sunday school made another climb upward. We had an increase of seven over the previous Sunday. An increase was also shown in the amount of the offering as compared with the preceding Sunday.

The children of the Sunday school who are to be in the Children's Day service met again Sunday afternoon for a practice. They are progressing fairly well with the program.

Refreshing showers of rain fell in the afternoon last Sunday and cooled the atmosphere considerably and as a consequence there was a larger congregation present for the evening church service than there was at the morning service. We are glad to have several visitors in the service, people who have recently moved to Shelby.

All regular services will be held next Sunday and we are expecting further increases in attendance at both the Sunday school and church services. C. B. Way, Pastor.

Shiloh Church, Connelly Springs Charge.—We decorated the church and cemetery last Saturday evening and Rev. R. Gurtner preached Saturday night.

We had Sunday school Sunday morning with 53 present. Collection, $1.21. Chapters read past week, 358. A Reporter.

Burlington.—In our recent reports we have been so absorbed with the results to our church of the Ham-Ramsay meeting that other matters of interest have been overlooked. Especially has this been true of our young people in the graduating class of the Burlington high school. Ten of our boys and girls were awarded diplomas. These are bright young people, and we hope and pray that this is but one of the many happy achievements to crown their life-careers. The names of the graduates follow: Juanita Amick, Mary Elizabeth Cheek, Vallie Griffith, Mildred McPherson, Jessie Quakenbush, Margaret Thomas, Frank Demos, Willie Ingle, Dace Jones, and Dan Loy. Miss Vallie Griffith has a very unusual record; for eleven years she has never missed a day in school, nor been tardy. We hope to furnish the Herald with her picture soon. Some of the graduates will take business courses, while others will go to college. Our earnest wish is that they may do well in their chosen fields, and above all, that God may be honored in their lives.

Our last Wednesday night prayer meeting was almost like a preaching service in the number attending. One woman accepted Christ at this service and united with the church yesterday. Twenty-nine others were received at the morning service, and two others, a man and his wife, applied for membership at the night service to be received later.

To date we have received 121 into full membership and have the names of 75 others. The doors of the church will be opened again next Sunday morning. The prospects seem good for an addition of nearly or quite 200 members. These large additions should add great strength and usefulness to the church.

The Sunday school attendance yesterday was 488. Pledges on the college endowment, taken at the morning service, amounted to $255.

William Henry, the six year old son of Brother and Sister E. S. Pugh, had the painful misfortune of getting his left arm broken this morning. The accident occurred when he fell from a swing on the kindergarten grounds. The little boy and his family have our deep sympathy.

We understand that Ferry Lee Gibbs, one of our church boys, was the successful speaker in the oratorical medal contest at Elon Commencement. Our hearty congratulations!

Some of our young people who have been college students during the past year are at home for the summer vacation. We are glad to have them with us again.

June 8,

Welch Memorial Church, High Point.—On the third Sunday in May we began our special meeting. Rev. J. L. Trollinger of Albemarle came on Monday and did the preaching throughout the meeting (which continued for 11 days), preaching only at night. Brother Trollinger did some good preaching; the folks were very appreciative of him and his work. The meeting resulted in six additions to the church. Several others came forward and pledged themselves for a closer fellowship with God.

Yesterday being the first Sunday in June we observed Home-coming Day. The morning hour was given to memorial service, memorial for Brothers C. G. Southern, J. D. Taylor, Thomas Foldwell, and Sister Cassell. The pastor read the obituaries, after which many friends of the departed, including the former pastor, Rev. J. H. Moton, spoke in the highest terms, telling of their beautiful Christian character and the usefulness and loyalty to the church of each. Several beautiful selections of music were rendered. We were glad to have with us the former pastor, Brother Moton will always have a warm place in the hearts of the people at Welch. This was manifest yesterday when it was discovered that he and Mrs. Moton had arrived, they were kept busy shaking hands with their old friends. We did not have any afternoon service, on account of the service at the College. We thought most of the people would like to attend. We were there ourselves and found large crowd present.

At the evening service Dr. Dixon was present and gave us a fine sermon. It is characteristic of him to preach a good sermon. He does not know how to preach anything else. We are always glad to have him with us. He was accompanied by Mrs. Dixon and her sister Miss Hughes; we were also glad to have those ladies present.

Our Sunday school for the day was very good, there being present 195. Our attendance usually runs from 190-odd to over two hundred. Mr. C. A. Ward is the efficient superintendent. He is one of the best. Miss Catherine Gill is the pianist; she is one of the most efficient I ever had in any of the churches have ever served. She is not only efficient but she is loyal, always present, not only at the Sunday service, but at the midweek service as well. Mr. I. B. Ridge is the efficient and faithful choir leader; he is a splendid singer, and has a number of good singers, who assist him with the music. We have not time or space to mention all the good people at Welch Memorial church, nor can we tell of all the many good things that might be said about them; we can only say that we are glad to have the pastor.

We ask an interest in the prayers of the Editor, and the many readers of the M. P. Herald. T. E. Pierce, Pastor.

Forsyth Tidings.

At Home Again, Remembered Again.

Because of the death of the good wife at mother the home of the pastor of Forsyth charge was broken up about one year ago. I looked then that it and all that goes with sweet home was forever gone. But recently was thought that the children could brought back home and that home life could possibly be re-established. On May 30 the children all returned and we had a happy come-coming and family reunion. This occasion will long be remembered by us—father and children—whose hearts were longing for each other.

But this was not all, for when the good Forsyth people learned of our plans they began to make plans all their own, but such as would add much to the happiness and welfare of the occupants of the parsonage. It was planned that the pastor and children should be invited out to supper. This good supper was served to us by Brother and Sister Ira W. Hatley. This was a bountiful supper and was greatly enjoyed by those of us who partook of it. But when we returned to the parsonage we found that we had a number of visitors and others were soon pouring in from every direction. When the people had gathered and greeted us with good wishes they then proceeded to their cars and began to unload cars and load up our home. I do not know what all was brought, neither do I know quantities. But there was much of almost everything good for the home. I do not know what was given by the different persons but I do know that every church on the work was represented except one. While I do not know all, the good Lord of us all knows and through Him every one gets credit. After the good things were deposited in our dining room the pastor tried to express thanks but words could not be found to express the appreciation of our hearts. Rev. Mr. Franklin, pastor of the Southside Church of Christ, who was one of the party, then led us in prayer. Some of the people then went home but others remained until late in the night enjoying the fellowship one with the other. This occasion reminded us of other days when our home was so happy and the people would occasionally come in and make us still happier. Then it reminded us of the ever readiness of the good Forsyth people to remember their pastor in such a way that he must know that they are good people ready to serve as well as to be served. Good people, we so much appreciate his kindness and may the Lord richly bless you every one.

Geo. L. Curry, Pastor.

Orange Charge.—Yesterday as a good day at Union Grove. Children's Day exercises were held at 11 A. M. The children rendered their parts well. A large congregation was present. The offering for foreign missions was $20. Dinner was spread on the grounds. After all had eaten, the ladies' missionary society held a meeting. Then at two P. M. we had our regular preaching service.

Union Grove is one of the most progressive churches this writer has ever served.

Sincerely, B. M. Williams.

THE PENNY WARD FUND.

The following have paid their 365 pennies on the Ward Penny Fund: N. G. Bethea, Calvin Garmon, J. M. Cutchin, Jr., F. W. Paschall, J. T. Sisk, George W. Garrett. This money has been sent in and I am now in a receptive mood for any others who have promised to this fund and for any new additions either for every day in the year, or for any amount of pennies that you may wish to contribute. A letter from Dr. Ward has this to say: "I read your article in the church paper with a great deal of interest. It touched me deeply . . . My address which dealt with a penny was just as serious a piece of business as I have ever engaged in and I am persuaded if our people could catch my point of view in this matter, that a tremendous advance would be effected in properly supporting our church work and institutions."

"I thank you very much for your interest in this matter and I wish you success."

So we see that this great man does not object to using his point for the accomplishment of a work that is very much needed at this time.

Suppose instead of throwing away two cents in arguing about whether we spend our pennies foolishly or not, or in telling that we do not, that we send them in to a fund that will be helping and thus prove by a real deed that we do not waste them. But possibly you are saving them to the end of the year and will send them in then. That is the practice of some so we are still hoping that those who have not promised will, and that those who have will—send on the Lincolns.

If you do not understand, write me and I will be glad to write a letter of explanation of the Penny Fund.

THE "R" OUT OF PRAY.

How many readers of the Herald noticed the error in the last line of the report from the South Davidson charge in the Herald last week which changed the meaning of Brother Carson's sentence very materially? The "r" was left out of the word "pray." Brother Carson meant to request prayer for his evangelistic campaign and the linotype refused to drop the "r," thus changing his request for prayer to one for money. We presume he meant to say, "Pray for our campaign."

After meditating on the little error, this writer thinks perhaps it would be well for some of us to drop the "r" from the word, or in other words pay as well as pray. There are many church people who do more praying than paying. This pastor would not advocate less praying, but we think there should be a better proportion of paying and praying. The most effective praying is done by the persons who do their share of paying in the work of the church and the Kingdom of God. It has been said by some one that religion will open the pocket-book as well as the heart, and this writer agrees with that statement.

God has promised to bless his people just in proportion as they render to Him and the cause of His Kingdom the sacrifice in tithes and offerings which every Christian is called upon to make to the Lord. That day when the Methodist Protestants of North Carolina realize in the fullest sense their obligations to God with reference to their stewardship will bring to our beloved Zion wonderful prosperity and rich blessings to every believer in His Kingdom and every zealous worker in the vineyard of our Lord.

KILN-DRIED.

Frank Derrance Hopley, in C. E. World.

"Stayed in this town too long; about time I saw the world. Going to New York and get a job."

In these words Tom Wilton resigned the position he had held for five years in Dan Sheldon's news and stationery store. The lazy blue eyes of Sheldon showed his surprise, and he came slowly out from behind the counter.

"Give you two dollars more a week to stay, Tom," he drawled. "Never thought much of New York myself, too big and noisy. Better think it over, and not go."

Wilton shook his head. "Nope, I'm going. Give you two weeks' notice; then I'm off."

Dan Sheldon was annoyed. If Wilton left, it would mean more work for him breaking in a new clerk; and Sheldon and work had never been on intimate terms. He tried to argue the point, but Wilton would not listen.

Two days before the time set for his departure Wilton brought a young woman to the store, and introduced her to Sheldon as Bessie Hayward.

"My cousin, from up York State," he explained. "She wants work, and I told her she could have my job. It's a good place for a girl," he added. Then with a nod toward Sheldon Wilton told Bessie, "He'll treat you right; wouldn't leave him if I wanted to stay in town."

Sheldon's face reddened. He did not approve of women's working, and had never hired a woman himself. He had always thought they would be a nuisance around the store; but now, with Wilton going and no one in view to take his place, he might be forced to hire one.

He looked at the girl appraisingly. She was of medium height with an inclination toward plumpness. A round face, with fresh pink cheeks, hazel eyes, and hair that was near auburn. All together, Sheldon was not sure but that she was good to look upon. It might attract trade to have her in the store. Still, he hesitated.

Bessie smiled at Wilton's crude introduction. She put out her hand, and gave Sheldon's fingers a friendly little grip.

"I'm pleased to meet you, Mr. Sheldon," she said. "Tom has been telling me about you, and I am sure that we will get along fine together."

Sheldon gasped as she began to take off her hat. The matter seemed to be settled with no chance for an argument. He looked at the grinning Wilton, then at the girl again, who had put her hat on the counter.

"I can't afford to give you much to start," he began. "Twelve dollars a week would be the most. But later on—if you suit—I might—"

The girl smiled, and looked around for a place to hang her coat.

"That's all right, Mr. Sheldon. It will do fine to begin; and, when I catch on to things and get more valuable to you, then—"

"Yes," interrupted Dan hastily. "When you really get valuable to me, I'll do better by you. But of course at first you will have to learn. Now, if you don't mind, I'll show you where some of the stock is. I know just where to put my hands on everything in the dark."

The arrangement of the stock in Dan Sheldon's store, to the casual observer, was on no systematic plan. Yet, as Dan had said, he knew where to find anything in the dark. Slow of thought and motion as he was, it had become a habit with him not to move about any more than was necessary. With that end in view he had arranged behind the counter in the front part of the store those articles which were in constant demand, newspapers, cigars, stationery, candy and tobacco. They were all within his reach, and that was sufficient.

Two weeks had not passed after the arrival of Miss Hayward, however, before the aspect of the store underwent a change. To her orderly mind the stock was not arranged at all, being thrown about haphazard and without any attempt at attractive display.

Without asking permission, which she knew would not be granted, Bessie determined to put things in order in accordance with her own ideas. If her efforts met with Sheldon's approval, it would probably be a chance for her to secure more salary. On the other hand, if he should be enraged at her boldness, Bessie determined to retire as gracefully as possible. It was worth while making the trial.

One morning, after having stayed out a day to work in his garden, Dan entered the store to find it a changed place. No longer were the things of which he sold the most convenient to his touch. Different classes of goods had been segregated by themselves, and on the shelves were tacked small cards bearing neatly printed signs, "Magazines," "Newspapers," "School Accessories," "Candies," "Stationery."

Dan gasped, and looked around him in amazement. It was a full minute before he realized what had happened. Then Bessie came up laughing and smiling.

"Looks great, doesn't it?" she asked before Dan could speak. "I worked at it all day yesterday, and last night until ten o'clock. I wanted to surprise you; so I kept at it. Now we'll know just where to find everything; it was so mussy the other way."

"Fine," said Dan, as she was evidently waiting for him to speak; but his heart sank. Everything had been upset, according to his notions; and he was inclined to be angry. But Bessie was so pleased with her work that he had not the heart to find fault. He decided to try it for a week and see how it worked. Before the week was over Dan had to admit that the new arrangement was an improvement, and he even complimented Bessie upon it.

A month had not gone by since Bessie Hayward had come into the store before Dan Sheldon realized, much to his consternation, that he was in love with her. He reached the conclusion while he was walking home, and immediately prepared to act upon it. As he entered the living-room, he looked at the calendar. It was the 15th of May. They could be married in June. Girls, he knew, always prepared that month for their weddings. He vaguely wondered why. He would speak to Bessie the first thing in the morning, and arrange matters. Having definitely decided upon his course of action, Dan at once went to bed and to a dreamless sleep.

It was nearly eleven o'clock the next day before the rush of customers had subsided and Dan was alone with Bessie. She was the rear of the store, and he came out from behind the counter, and went toward her. "Miss Hayward," he said, "I—I've been thinking."

Bessie faced him smilingly. "Really? There was a note of incredulity in her voice, but Dan failed to notice it.

"I've been thinking that—you and I might get married."

Dan's face reddened, and he shifted his gaze to the floor. Bessie was gazing at him with wonder in her eyes.

"Say that again," she said slowly. "I don't think that I quite understood you."

Dan's heart leaped. She wanted to hear him say it again. He supposed all girls were that; it was what they wanted to hear. He took a step nearer.

"I want you to marry me," he said again slowly, with emphasis on each word. "I want you to marry me."

There was no mistaking him now, and Bessie's cheeks grew as red as his own. Still she did not answer; surprised by the suddenness of it all, Dan thought.

"I suppose it is rather sudden to you," he went on. "The fact is, I didn't know it myself until last night. I've got a good house on the road a piece, and the business is doing fine. I'll have the house all fixed over, you'll like it, I know. There's a great view from the back; trees, and a lake, and—"

Bessie suddenly came to life.

"You mean that you want me to marry you, Mr. Sheldon, and go and live in that house where your mother lived?"

Dan nodded. "Yes; I know you would like it fine if she were there. I was thinking last night that perhaps she might see, after what is going on; and, when I went into the room she used to have, it seemed as if she had given us her benediction."

Dan spoke reverently, and looked out of the window to hide his emotion; so he did not see the storm that was gathering in Bessie's eyes. "Me! Marry you?"

Her words cut the air sharply, and she turned quickly at the tone of her voice.

"Me! Marry you? Why, you're not fit to marry, but a wizened-up, kiln-dried—kiln-dried prune. When I marry, I want to marry a man."

Dan looked at her dully. It seemed impossible for him to understand.

"You mean that you—you won't marry me?"

"Marry you? Of course not, silly. For what?"

Bessie turned back to the counter, started to arrange some goods. Dan looked at her, and took heart. He had sprung her too suddenly, of course; that was the matter. He must give her time to think.

"I'm not going to take no for an answer," he said doggedly. "You think it over. There's no special hurry, though I thought we would be married in June; most girls pick a month, but I won't rush you if you feel of scary like."

Bessie made no answer, and just then a customer came in. When he had gone, she glanced furtively at Bessie across the store, but there was a look on her face that his heart sink. What if she should stick to her determination? He gulped, and put on his hat.

"I'm going to the bank. Be back after lunch."

"All right."

Bessie's tone was matter-of-fact, and Dan's heart sank again as he closed the door. It seemed that she had settled the question once for all.

That night, when Dan went home, he sat down and started to appraise himself. Bessie had called him a "kiln-dried prune." Dan smiled as he thought of the last appellation. A prune was a dried-up fruit. When Dan's mother was alive, she often had them for breakfast; but Dan had always hated them. He felt hurt that Bessie should have likened him to such a thing.

And she had said that he was "kiln-dried." Dan drew himself up proudly as he remembered it. She had meant it as a slur, but he knew it was not. To be kiln-dried was to have every bit of useless quality taken out, with nothing but the real article remaining.

A year before he had visited an areoplane factory. There he had seen the wood that was used in the planes. Every bit of it had been kiln-dried. All the sap had been dried out so thoroughly that not a particle of moisture could be absorbed. The kiln-dried wood could be absolutely depended upon to stand any strain that might be put upon it in all kinds of weather. Yes, he was that; unbending, ready to stand any strain, and not break or snap in an emergency. Some day he would show Bessie that her taunt was a compliment, and she would be glad that he was what she called him.

For two weeks everything went on as formerly, and Dan was beginning to fret under the strain. Then one day Bessie came to him with a letter.

"See," she said, taking out a check and holding it before his eyes, "what luck I've had. A relative has died and left me a thousand dollars. I never had so much money before; isn't it great?"

"Certainly is;" but there was a dubious note in Dan's voice. He wondered suddenly whether, now she had the money, she might go away. Then what chance would he have to win her?

"Certainly is," he repeated. "You won't be thinking of leaving us, now you're rich? Better stay on here and bank the money. In fact, I was just thinking you've done so well in the store I'd raise you to fifteen a week."

Bessie looked at him earnestly; and a little whimsical smile crept over her face. "Thanks very much, Mr. Sheldon. Of course I shall be delighted to get more money, but I don't know what I will do yet. I want to go to the bank, though, now, and get this cashed."

"Better leave it in the bank, or you may lose it," cautioned Dan.

"But I don't want to. I want to get the money all in big bills, and feel of it. I never had a chance before. I won't be out long."

When Bessie returned from the bank, she had ten one-hundred-dollar bills in her bag, which she spread on the counter, and showed to Dan.

"There, look at them! All yellow money. I like to feel them, they're so crisp and new, and, think of it, all mine;" and Bessie ran her fingers through the bills again. All day she kept the bag withing reach; and, as the clock struck five, she came to Dan with a worried look.

"I meant to have put the money in the bank again," she said; "but now it's too late. What will I do with it tonight? I'd be afraid to keep it in the house."

"Dan's glance shifted to the back of the store.

"You can put it in the safe if you want to," she said. "It's a good one, and there won't anybody know the money's there. I think that's the best thing to do."

"O, can I?" Bessie's voice was grateful. "I'll be awfully obliged. Then in the morning I'll bank the money. Can I put it in right away? I'm tired of carrying the bag around."

Dan went to the safe, followed by Bessie; and he showed her how the door opened. She watched him as he turned the knob on the dial and with a final click opened the door. He unlocked a compartment, and pulled out a drawer.

"You can put it in there."

Bessie took the money from her bag, counted it once more lovingly, and put it into the drawer. Dan shut and locked it, and gave the key to Bessie.

"You might as well take it," he said, "in case anything should happen to me. And don't forget the combination; two four to the right; six eight to the left, and then back to one."

"I won't forget; thanks awfully."

When Bessie came back from supper, Dan was standing by the door. She had a girl friend with her, and was telling of the wind-fall. "I've put the money in the store safe for the night," he heard her say. "Anybody would have to blow it up to get it out."

Somehow Dan wished she had not spoken of it in the street; some one might hear. He glanced around quickly. A woman was passing carrying a market-basket; a young man in a checkered suit intent on reading the sporting page of the evening paper; a boy ran by with a bundle of meat, followed by an excited dog. A little girl came in to buy candy. That was all. Dan breathed in relief; then the thought came that after all some one might learn of the money in the safe, and attempt to get it.

The thought was still heavy upon him as he entered the house and lighted a lamp. He hesitated a minute, then opened the door of a small room to the left of the living room, and went in. This room was Dan's holy of holies, the place where his mother used to sit and sew. He had left it just as it was on the day when she died. There was her little sewing chair with its split cane bottom, beside a low table on which her work basket still stood.

There was a machine in the corner which Dan had given her on her last birthday. A few faded prints on the walls; a spatterwork motto, "The Lord Will Provide;" a marble clock on the shelf, which had stopped at half-past three. Above the clock was a cheap crayon portrait of his mother, purchased from an agent who had called from door to door.

Dan stood looking at it silently for a minute; then he passed his hands over the arms of the rocking chair. He did this every time he entered the room. He loved to think that his hands had been where those of his mother had so often rested. Slowly and reverently he walked from the room and closed the door. If he ever did bring a wife to the cottage, that room should always be left inviolate; it should never be disturbed.

As he went upstairs and prepared for bed, Dan was more determined than ever that he would win Bessie Hayward; but just how he would do it he did not know. For a half-hour he lay tossing; then he got up and sat on the edge of the bed. There was a sense of impending calamity strong upon him; he wondered what it was. Then he thought of the safe, and Bessie's money in it; and he began to dress hurriedly. In the room over the store there was a bed where Dan slept on stormy nights. He would go down to the store and be on hand, should a burglar break in; he would defend Bessie's money at all costs.

In less than twenty minutes Dan had covered the mile between his house and the store. As he reached the village street and passed the white, clap-boarded church, the clock in the steeple slowly struck twelve. How bright the moon was, and how black and shadowy the buildings looked! And the silence! Dan never remembered walking down the street at that hour before; he wondered whether it was always so quiet at midnight.

He unlocked the store door, entered, and locked the door again; then he stumbled in the darkness to the back, where the stairs were, and went to the room above. Dan threw himself upon the bed without removing his clothes, and finally he dozed.

A half-hour later he was awakened by a noise in the store below. Softly he tiptoed to the stairs; then half-way down, where he could see the length of the room. Kneeling before the safe, with a flashlight trained on the combination disc, was a man. It was the man in the checkered suit who had passed when Bessie Hayward had told her friend that the money was in the safe. Dan recognized him at once.

Dan started to go down-stairs; then a sudden fear came over him, and he stopped. The man was probably armed; if Dan interfered, he would probably be shot. Dan was no fighter; it was the first time that he had ever been in physical danger, and he qualified.

Then he seemed to hear a voice, the voice of Bessie, so distinctly it seemed as if she must be by his side. "Kiln-dried." That was what she had called him. Now was the chance to show her what the term meant. Unyielding, ready for any emergency, to be depended upon, not afraid. "Kiln-dried"; Dan sprang down the stairs, and landed in the store.

At the noise the man who had been crouching before the safe sprang up and turned his flashlight on Dan. Above its glare Dan could see the glitter of an automatic revolver.

"Hands up!"

The man's voice was sharp, imperative. Under ordinary circumstances Dan would have stopped, but he kept on.

"Come a step nearer and I'll shoot."

With a cry Dan sprang forward. The impact of the two bodies knocked the gun from the man's hand, but not before he had pulled the trigger. There was a flash, a report, and Dan felt a streak of fire across his forehead; but he never wavered. Blow after blow he struck; and the man suddenly fell to the floor, and lay silent.

Dan steadied himself against the edge of the counter; then, as his strength failed, he slumped to his knees and began to crawl slowly toward the safe. He turned the flashlight on the door. It had not been opened—he had come in time; Bessie's money was still there.

He looked at the man on the floor, who was beginning to move; then Dan groped wearily for the pistol, found it, and began to fire. It was his only hope; perhaps some one would hear the noise and investigate before the man should recover consciousness.

Soon there was a sound of hurrying feet, and the only watchman that the town could boast came running up. For an instant Dan lifted himself on his elbow.

"The money's safe; he didn't get it. Tell Bessie I— Kiln-dried; that's why I saved it. 'Kiln-dri—'"

The next thing that Dan knew he was in bed in the doctor's house where he had been taken, and the doctor was standing by his side. Dan put his hand to his head in a bewildered manner, touched the bandage, and looked up into the doctor's face.

"What happened?" he asked feebly.

"A man was robbing you safe, and fired at you. Don't you remember?"

Dan closed his eyes again. Yes, he remembered it all now. A thrill went through him as he thought of the money that he had saved. And Bessie—

Dan heard a little sob, and a soft hand touched his. He opened his eyes, and looked up into two hazel ones that were wet with tears.

"Bessie!" Dan could hardly believe his senses. Perhaps he was dreaming again. No, it was Bessie. He would tell her. "The money's in the safe; he didn't get it; I saved it. I had to because—you said I was a—kiln-dried pr—"

Dan did not finish. Bessie's arms were around his neck, and her lips pressed close to his.

"You're an old darling, and I—I just love you."

At which Dan Sheldon smiled happily.

"AN UNEXCUSABLE FOOL."

Mr. Editor:—The M. P. Herald publishes an article attempting to justify the use of the above quotation. The poor man thinks he has hit me and rejoices in the fact, because he supposes I made an attack on him.

I think the editor of "The Word of Life" has a right to his views, and possibly is conscience-bound to express them. I made no attack on him, and I have no disposition to do it. I could use some unmerited words, fully as cutting as his article has; but I would be ashamed of it afterwards; and I assure him I have no desire to sting him. I don't care whether he is an evolutionist or a fundamentalist. I do not care whether he is descended from a monkey, or "ascended upwards" from anything; at so long as he uses such an expression about Jesus, whatever his hypothesis, I do not want to read it. I won't read it in his paper, and I hate to be subject to it in my own.

I feel confident that as many readers of the M. P. Herald know that S. R. H. means S. R. Harris of Henderson, N. C., as know what "The Word of Life" is, or who is its editor. So please excuse me, if I make no unmerited things.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER CONFERENCE.

This Conference is for Christian young people who desire to equip themselves better for service in the church. The Latin inscription, "Nil sine numine," which we find in the college seal, means "Nothing without divine guidance." A wonderful motto this is! What a glorious thing it would be if our every act were divinely guided.

Young people should certainly not attempt to settle upon the course of their life, whether giving themselves to this or that vocation, without divine guidance. One aim of these conferences is to give God's Spirit right of way with these young people through the influence and power of the Conference leaders.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

Knob Creek, Fallston Circuit.—Our pastor on the fourth Sunday at 11 o'clock preached a good memorial sermon. Mr. Morgan tried to leave the impression upon our minds of how we ought to appreciate our mothers. He brought sweet remembrances to the minds of those who have mothers gone on before. Sweet remembrance of a real mother will guide through life.

Rev. John Greene preached for us in the afternoon upon the subject of "The Second Coming of Christ." His message was so inspiring we hope to have Mr. Greene with us again.

Our Sunday school is moving along nicely with good attendance and much interest shown. Our Sunday school hour has been changed. We meet now at 9:30 o'clock instead of 10. Everybody is welcome to all our services. Come we are glad to have you.

Mr. and Mrs. Quiney Hartman are rejoicing over a fine baby boy. Mrs. Jane Richard is very sick. May the Lord comfort and help her and restore her to health.

Fannie Belle Norman, Reporter.

Reidsville.—Our pastor preached an excellent sermon yesterday on "The Victorious Life."

The C. E. prayer meeting was held at seven P. M. The subject was "Life Investments," and was led by Mrs. H. S. Dixon.

At eight o'clock a class of children from our Children's Home gave a program that was greatly enjoyed by all who heard it. They were accompanied by Mrs. J. A. Dixon, Miss McManus and Rev. E. G. Lowdermilk. We are interested in the Children's Home and are always glad of an opportunity to have them visit us.

Some of our members are sick. We hope they may soon be well.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Greensboro, N. C.

—The Pastors' Summer Conference and the Young People's Summer Conference are both in progress this week, the pastors quartered at the Children's Home and the young people at High Point College. Some of the sessions are joint sessions of these two bodies. On Friday of this week many of our people are expected to visit the college and hear Mr. Ira Landreth, the famous platform speaker.

—Another famous speaker for the conference is Rev. Mr. Baylis, of Illinois, of the Methodist Protestant Church. He once stood in a bread-line in New York City as a down and out as a result of strong drink. After his reform he entered the ministry. His lecture, "From the Bread-line to the Pulpit" is an account of his own experiences. Since he entered the ministry, he has attracted attention by the success of some of his pastorates. He was the leader of a community church enterprise that was so successful that it received nation-wide attention through articles in magazines.

—Yesterday morning's papers told of a train wreck in New Jersey caused by a landslide on the tracks. The train was loaded with emigrants who had come to this country, gained wealth, and were on their way to their own countries. Many of them were killed and others seriously injured. Thus are dashed many human hopes.

—Belgium will send a commission to this country in July, to make arrangements for settlement of that nation's war debt to the United States.

—A special treaty which, if adopted, will prohibit the use of poison gas in warfare, has been agreed upon by the Conference in Traffic in Arms, which is now in session at Geneva, Switzerland.

—Camille Flammarion, eighty-three, died June 4 while working in his laboratory near Paris, France. He was one of the most famous astronomers in the world. He did more than any other one man to make the study of astronomy popular. His many books on that subject, written in a simple and clear style, have been translated into many languages (including English) and are widely read in many —Rev. J. B. O'Briant's son who has been in the Aviation Service for several years has spent some time during the past few weeks with his father at Rosemary, N. C. He and his wife motored from San Antonio, Texas, to North Carolina. They left Monday, 15th, on their return trip, going by way of Cincinnati, Ohio, and Frankfort, Ky., to visit his wife's people.

TREASURER WILLS FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

We publish elsewhere the financial statement of the condition of High Point College. This statement is published at the request of the Annual Conference in its recent special session.

You will note we trust that the treasurer finds himself in pressing need of money to meet obligations. The statement is therefore an urgent appeal to any and all of our people who can spare any money to give it or lend it to relieve the present need of our college.

No one should be surprised that the need exists. The wonder really is that Brother Wills has been able to carry on so far without making this appeal. But he has disliked to do it, and has pledged his credit and given his money until he has reached a point when there is nothing else to do but to state the situation and appeal to all friends of the college and the church to help remove or at least help carry the incubus of debt.

It was impossible to get the buildings ready for use the past year without incurring debt. Without the buildings we could not have opened the college. We have now had the use of four costly and well-made buildings for one year. When once paid for they will not have to be paid for again. They are of fireproof construction and are kept insured.

Our people who have contributed over one hundred thousand dollars to the building fund have done a good and great deed, but it took over one hundred thousand dollars to erect the first building, Roberts Hall.

When we get over the present crisis and find ourselves out of debt, we will all rejoice that we built buildings of the type we have. It will prove to be a good investment in the long run. A college is discounted if its buildings are inferior, and our buildings will help to attract patronage. They have already done so, and will do so more and more.

The editor recently met a tourist in front of High Point College, and the tourist stopped and asked, "What buildings are these?" He was evidently favorably impressed.

Our debt, while great for an ordinary man, could be easily handled by us all together. While the Annual Conference was in special session, a brother remarked, "There they are worrying about $45,000; why, I owe that much myself."

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

Commencement has come and gone and we are now enjoying the Young People's Summer Conference. Altogether we have had a good year. Our attendance was good considering the fact that we were not ready to open when we advertised to. And we have had a good student body, some fine young people have been with us, and we believe that many of them will return.

Our commencement was a pleasant affair. A musical recital was given on Saturday afternoon, June the 6th, and that night was student night. It was a free for all entry much given to merriment, we were told; it was not the writer's privilege to attend it.

The main feature of our commencement was the sermon by Rev. Dr. R. L. Shipley, Salisbury, Md. It was an unusually strong presentation, ringing true on those issues which are so vital to the college and college life. The subject matter and tone of the sermon was such as to call attention to the problems of the college and to rally its friends about it. It was a real treat and great pleasure to have Doctor Shipley with us.

Now for the Student Campaign.

We must have a large student enrollment this fall. High Point College is the college for our own young people. It is better for them than any other college and the college needs them. Almost every other college in the state has an endowment for caring for the running expenses of the institution but High Point College does not have one. We have the equipment and the faculty for two hundred and fifty students and if we can fill our buildings we can greatly reduce our deficit. You owe it to the institution to stand by it in these days when it is seeking to get on its feet.

Cordially yours,
R. M. Andrews,
President.

THE UNSEEN LOVER.

When Dan Crawford, the missionary, went from America to Africa, he studied carefully his fellow-travelers on the ocean. He wrote back to a friend: "We have first-class passengers here whose life is one dismal yawn. They have no Christ and no 'hope of glory,' so the air is electric with irritation." In contrast, he wrote also of a lively girl who was a faithful follower of Jesus Christ, that she wore a locket about her neck, which bore not a portrait but the words: "Whom having not seen I love." It is when we have the consciousness of the Unseen Lover with us that life becomes diffused with the spirit of contentment.—Selected.

—Asheboro had the misfortune to lose its parsonage by fire recently. Pastor Fogleman, the occupant, was away at the time. Most of his belongings were saved by neighbors. Loss on building was partially covered by insurance.

TWO NOTABLE SERMONS.

How Each of Two Preachers Met a Special Opportunity.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

Some months ago The Christian Century of Chicago conducted a voting contest among Protestant ministers to determine the twenty-five outstanding preachers in this country. The pictures of the successful "Fourth O' Hundred" have been published, showing an interesting group of men.

Ballots were cast by 21,843 ministers, well distributed among the different denominations and the various schools of thought. Those voted for include a list of 1,146 names. Of the twenty-five winners there are seven Methodists, seven Presbyterians, six Congregationalists, four Baptists, and one Universalist. All shades of theology are represented, from "Bilby" Sunday at one extreme to Harry Emerson Fosdick at the other.

Beginning with the middle of last January the Christian Century has been printing in its columns a sermon each alternate week from one of these men. In the course of the year all the twenty-five will be heard. It is a rare opportunity these men have, for it is safe to say that their sermons will be more widely read than any others published during the twelve months.

All the sermons, so far, have been interesting—some of them quite distinctive in style and thought. Two, however, stand out from all the rest. They are of contrasting types, showing not only how the two preachers differ in fundamental Christian conceptions, but also how each reacts to the special opportunity with which he is confronted.

Mark Mathews.

The Rev. Mark Mathews is pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Seattle, Washington—the largest Presbyterian church in this country. He is an ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, and he is a decidedly militant Fundamentalist. Evidently he considered access to the columns of The Christian Century—a thorough-going Modernist publication—as an opportunity to reach its readers with something unequivocally Fundamentalist. So he chose for the subject of his sermon "The Virgin Birth of Jesus."

Here is the opening paragraph of his discourse: "The most important subject that could be discussed is the virgin birth of Jesus. It is the battleground of belief and within the confines of its discussion are to be found two contending forces—the enemies of God, and the children of God. The enemies of God are making an attack on the virgin birth; they are trying to discredit the records. It produces confusion in the minds of the people, and prevents them from accepting, believing in and being benefited by this great truth. The saints—God's children, the born again—know experimentally as well as historically, the truth of the doctrine."

What an atmosphere! What an array of words!—"battle ground," "contending forces," "enemies of God," "making an attack," "discredit the records," "confusion."

Lest the reader think this atmosphere and these words are not intentional—merely unfortunate—he should ponder this that soon follows: "I am glad the fight is on; that the battle is raging, because in the days gone by while we were asleep Satan sowed tares in Christendom, and there are those in the visible organization, known as the church militant, who are unsaved. They are, no doubt, rationalists, direct agents of Satan. If they want to fight God, and if this doctrine is the battleground, then, when we have finished with them, if they have any conscience at all, we hope they will leave the visible ecclesiastical organization and go out into the world into the synagogue of Satan and stay there, for they most assuredly have no place in the real church of Jesus Christ."

The preacher continues the same spirit and method to the end of his discourse. A few words from each of three men who have written concerning this sermon are suggestive as to the impressions it makes. With the first I heartily agree: "In the deepest and most earnest good faith I laid my listening heart open to the preacher's message, and I have to report that I caught nothing—not a single sentence—that even hinted at an authentic word of God. This was not because I have an opposing view on the virgin birth. I am not so sure that I hold an opposing view. And I am sure that I have read sermons and articles on the conservative side of this subject which I followed with great respect and to my spiritual as well as intellectual profit."

I trust no reader of The Herald will fail to blush because of the language used in the second quotation: "I like to hear the bulls of Bashan roar when their pedigree is read. Of course, Doctor Matthews expected these modern sadducees to rend their shirt tails when they read his sermon. When Christ asserted his deity the sadducees of another age tore theirs and also threw stones."

If the whole sermon could be reproduced here I imagine many readers of this paper might express themselves in the words of the third quotation: "I was reared in a conservative atmosphere, went through high school, college, and seminary, without having my faith in the virgin birth impaired. But I want to confess that in reading Dr. Mathews' sermon, my first serious doubt concerning this time-honored doctrine has arisen. I do not consider that the proofs offered prove anything."

It is only fair to hope that this sermon does not fully represent the spirit and methods of Dr. Mathews. One can only believe that a preacher who gathers and holds so large a group of people must ordinarily deliver a far more vital and attractive Christian message.

Charles E. Jefferson.

The other sermon is by the Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, for many years pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, one of the outstanding Congregational churches of greater New York. While Dr. Jefferson's mind is of the progressive type, he means to conserve fully all the good there is in the thinking of the past. A number of years ago—before the present Fundamentalist Modernist controversy was thought of—he published a volume under the title "Things Fundamental." This has helped to enlighten and to strengthen the faith of many a questioning Christian. It is still a good book to read.

Dr. Jefferson keeps away from the region of militant controversy. He brings a great message, suited to the needs of all sorts of people. His subject is, "A New Commandment." His text is the words of Jesus in John 13:34—"A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another."

"Everything conspires to make these words impressive," the preacher begins. "They are from the lips of the world's greatest religious teacher—the man whose name is above every name, and who speaks as no other man has ever spoken, and whose word will outlive the stars. He is speaking to his followers, the little company of men whom he has trained to carry on his work after he has gone. These men are to disciple the nations, teaching them to observe all the things which he had commanded. They are the nucleus of the church against which the gates of hades will never more prevail."

Surely this is a different atmosphere from that we were compelled to breathe in the other sermon. Let us read another paragraph:

"He is speaking on the last night of his earthly life. Death is looking on. The shadow of the cross lies athwart his face. The hour has arrived for him to go back to God. In the last hour, only the most important subject can be touched on. He will now speak the word which is cardinal and final—whisper the secret of power and victory."

This preacher has certainly captured our interest. We believe he has a message from God for each one of us. We are not in a mood to criticize: we want to know about this new commandment, the sort of love spoken of and the method of its manifestation. I wish there were space to reproduce the entire sermon—few paragraphs should be helpful:

"It is a special love for a limited set of people which our Lord has in mind. We are ultimately to love the whole world, but we must begin by loving our fellow Christian. We are to learn to love all humanity by loving the members of the Christian family. Loving is a fine art, the most difficult of all the arts, and we are to master the art in the school of Christ. The whole human race is to be made a brotherhood, and we are to begin the stupendous work by making the church a brotherhood. The followers of Jesus must first be brothers to one another if other men are to become brothers also."

"Never before had there been known a commandment like this. Never before had there been upon earth a society of men who made it their business it was to love one another because they were bound to Jesus Christ. Their bond to Jesus Christ created a new bond between them. They were knit together because they were knit first to him. A new standard of love was set up—loving after the manner of Jesus. What patience, forbearance, forgiveness, longsuffering, generosity, devotion and sacrifice this love involves! Love on the lips of Jesus is a greater word than the world had ever spoken. Christians are to love more than others. We are to love one another after the fashion of the Son of God. This is the only kind of love that will save the world. Loving one's neighbor after the fashion of the God Samaritan will not save it, nor will the love commanded in the golden rule. It is only the love prescribed in the new commandment which will make a dent in the hard heart of the world. It is this exalted and purified love practiced by Christians toward one another which is to bring a lost world to God."

"What folly to discuss definitions of love!"

June 18, 1925.

creeds when we are indifferent to the only article in the creed which is fundamental, 'Love one another after the fashion of Christ.' The discussions about orders and sacraments are bootless so long as we do not endeavor to keep the new commandment. How can we hope to convince the world that our religion comes from heaven if we refuse to obey the supreme law imposed upon us by our Master? The Savior of the world did not place the primary emphasis upon forms of worship, or upon sacraments, or upon clerical orders, or upon church government, or upon creeds. These are not the notes of the true church. There is only one note of the true church, and that is the love of Christians for one another after the fashion of Christ. It is not by celebrating the Lord's supper, or by the recitation of a creed, or by obedience to an ecclesiastical superior that we show we are disciples in the school of Christ. It is only by our love for one another that we give evidence that we belong to him. We are his friends only as we keep his commandments, and his greatest commandment to his followers is, 'Love one another as I have loved you.'"

"It is because of our neglect of the new commandment that we find ourselves face to face with problems which are insoluble, and with tasks which are beyond our strength. The world is full of idealism. We are dreaming everywhere of brotherhood and reunion and co-operation and peace, but up to the present hour all suggested schemes have broken down. All dreams have failed of fulfillment. We see what ought to be, but cannot bring it to pass. For instance, we cannot bring the nations together. We cannot induce them to lay down their arms. We cannot do this because we cannot bring the churches together. If all Christians were together, the time would be within sight when nations would learn war no more."

"We Roman Catholics and Greek Catholics and Protestants, Presbyterians and Methodists, Baptists and Lutherans, Episcopalians and Congregationalists, Unitarians and Quakers, and all the rest of us no matter what our name, must be friends, comrades, brothers, and fellow-workers. It is not necessary that we use the same form of worship, or the same forms of government, or the same forms of theological opinion, but it is indispensable that we be friends, comrades, brothers and fellow-workers. We must trust one another, and help one another, and sacrifice for one another. That much is certain."

"We need to take lessons from our Lord and Savior, and also from the apostle Paul, who knew the Master's mind as few have ever known it. To Paul the church is a temple. In the temple all the stones are fitted together and one stone supports another. To Paul the church is a body, the body of Christ. In that body every member is knit to every other member by vital bonds. Every joint—or as we would say, every social contact—contributes to the vital force by means of which the whole body is built up. To Paul the church is a family, and all the followers of Jesus are brothers and sisters, living their life under the law of love."

"'Love one another as I have loved you.' This is the passionate desire of our Lord. It was his dominant longing in the last hour of life life in the flesh, and it is his dominant longing still. He is the same yesterday, today and forever. His last word in the upper chamber was not an exhortation or command but a prayer. Before starting for the garden of Gethsemane he poured out his heart unto God. In this prayer there was one supreme and often repeated petition, 'That they all may be one even as we are one.' In this prayer as in his conversation, he was still dwelling on the conviction that the one and only way in which the world can be persuaded that God has indeed sent his Son, is the spectacle of his followers loving one another."

THE BETTER WAY.

Oh! the pain of sad remembrance
Of the things that might have been;
No tongue can tell the misery,
No poet the words can pen.

Thy heart is wrought with sadness.
Thou thinkest—Oh! had I but known!
What torture thy poor heart must suffer,
With many a sigh and moan.

The seeds of thy sin will flourish,
Thou must reap just what thou hast sown;
Thou must ever remember thy folly;
Remembrance will be the head stone.

Remember, to think before acting;
Think wisely and all will be right.
Sow not evil seeds, then thy harvest,
Thy remembrance, will be ever bright.

THAT MARKER.

Just outside of Gibsonville, and on the hard surface road leading to Reidsville, is an old brick church with a very large burying ground across the road in front of it. Ask the traveler, who is a stranger to that community, what church it is and he will immediately tell you, "Frieden's Evangelical Lutheran Church." How does he know? The attractive marker in front of the church tells him.

If that same church were a Methodist Protestant church would he know it?

Eventually these markers are going to be the usual thing for rural churches, and when everybody else gets to doing it, we of course will fall in line. But why not be leaders in this new thing instead of waiting for others to lead us. Some of our churches have set the pace for us—perhaps half a dozen in the entire conference now have markers. Let others follow, and let us keep this going until the traveler on our public highways knows what church it is when he passes a Methodist Protestant church.

It would be interesting to see reports in the Herald of all churches providing markers.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Among the Churches.

Sunday, June 7, was spent in High Point. At the morning hour we worshiped with our First Church people, and the High Point College people at the First Church. Rev. R. L. Shipley, D.D., of Salisbury, Md., preached the first commencement sermon for the High Point College. It was a very appropriate and forceful sermon. All of us rejoice that we have reached this our first commencement with so much credit to ourselves as a church. We confidently look forward to greater things during the 1925-26 college year.

Sunday evening was spent with Rev. T. E. Pierce and his people at Welch Memorial. It was a very hot Sunday evening and the people were not out in full force, but those who were there heard the word gladly. This church is doing splendid work for the Master.

Alamance.

Sunday, June 14, was spent on Alamance charge with Rev. G. W. Holmes and his people at Center and Bethel churches.

Brother Holmes is one of our strong men, a great preacher and a man who is deeply consecrated. His charge is in good condition. The two churches visited are composed of good substantial people who are pressing on with the Lord's work. This is a good strong field, and in probability two fields should be made of this one field, with each one paying just as much on pastor's salary as the one is now paying. So many of our country fields need to be cultivated more intensively. I am sorry I could not reach all four of the churches on this charge.

The Special Session of Conference.

By this time all who cared to know, know the why of the special session. If you have not found out then look up last week's Herald and read pages 4 and 5, and on to the 8th page and you will find out. We believe it was a great day in our Zion, and yet we realize that it will take some weeks for us to estimate the results of that day's work. If it leads to greater and more speedy responses to the building fund, and to the endowment fund, and to an increased student body then the day was well spent; but if not then what?

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES FOR SUNDAY, JUNE 28.

My Answer to the Missionary Challenge. Daily Readings.

Mon. The apostles' answer. Acts 1:6-14.
Tues. The people's answer. Acts 8:1-4;
11:19.
Wed. Paul's answer. Acts 9:1-22.
Thurs. Peter's answer. Acts 10:34-48.
Fri. Man's call. Acts 16:6-15.
Sat. The church's answer. Acts 13:1-5.
Sunday. Topic. Isa. 6:8, 9; 1 Thess. 2:8.

Some Bible Hints.

We hear the voice of the Lord in the heart only when we commune with Him (v.8).

God does His work in the world through men, lifting them to fellowship with Him in His tasks, and so training them for higher things (v. 8).

We must make some answer when God calls, either in words, or by act (v. 8).

Our answer must be the response of love, or it is worthless. The missionary gives his very soul (1 Thess. 2:8).

Suggestive Thoughts.

Christian Endeavor has led many hundreds to answer "Yes" to God's missionary challenge. What else can a heart pledged to do the will of Jesus say?

Many answer the missionary challenge with the widow's or the widower's mite. That is surely a mean answer to God.

Our answer to God need not be that we will go to the mission field. It may mean the dedication of time to work at home for missions, to "hold the ropes."

We can answer God's challenge by resolving to know more about missions than we do, and then spread our knowledge. We can make a study of missions.—C. E. Daily Companion.

Do You Know?

Did you know that there are more non-Christians than Christians in the world? Every non-Christian is a challenge to you. Will you meet the challenge?

A Haystack Meeting.

Open the meeting with the story of the famous "Haystack Prayer-Meeting" at Williams College, which was the birthplace of American missions. Have a miniature haystack in the center of the room or on the platform. Let the ideals of the original "Haystack Meeting" pervade this one. See "The Closing Minutes" for an appropriate conclusion of the meeting.

The Leader's Talk.

"Go ye into all the world and make disciples of every creature" means me. Jesus made no other plans for the evangelization of the world, except to send His disciples to go and to make disciples of others. And I must feel myself included in this divine command. If I do not sense my obligation to my Master and to my fellow-man, there is something wrong with me and with my Christianity.

This topic is as personal as possible, and as pertinent as possible. It takes for granted that every young Christian understands the Master's program to save the world, as God's Word reveals it to us, and also that every one is seeking to put his life where it will help bring this about most effectively. There is no more thrilling appeal than the missionary challenge. There is no field which offers greater opportunities for service. And there is no greater incentive than to allow the Spirit to direct one's life to world redemption.

Christian Endeavor has always encouraged world missions. Christian Endeavorers have gone out to the uttermost parts of the world to carry the gospel message. What am I going to do as my personal contribution to this cause? What are you going to do as your personal contribution? This society and this church should respond largely to the call.

Points for Purposeful Prayers.

Thank God (1) for the splendid opportunities offered by the mission field; (2) for the awakening conscience of the church towards the missionary enterprise; (3) for the many splendid examples before you to help you to consecrate your life to the world cause.

Ask God (1) to help you to give the Master a fair and square answer to His missionary challenge; (2) to bless your church and society in calling out missionaries from their ranks; (3) to use this meeting to inspire young folks to say "Yes" to the missionary call.

At the Point of a Question.

1. Can every Christian be a missionary? How?

2. Can every Christian be a foreign missionary?

3. Why does the foreign mission field make such a strong appeal to the young Christian?

4. Are there still plenty of opportunities for home mission work in our own country? Where?

5. What missionary makes the strongest impression upon you personally today?

6. What excuses do young Christians give for not becoming missionaries?

Hearing the Call.

Nobody ever hears the challenge of Christ unless he really wants to hear it. There are plenty of capable young Christians who are having privileges of training which would prepare them well for this work, who never hear the call because their ears are dull.

Many young folks give the answer of indifference to the missionary challenge. Nothing could give the heart of the Master a greater chill than plain indifference to His cause. Whatever your answer must be, young person, please give the Master's cause reasonable consideration. Don't turn Him down merely because of your indifference.

Can I Be a Missionary?

Anybody who wants to become a missionary strongly enough can become one, if he has good health and nobody dependent upon him. Many of our best missionaries today worked their way through college in every conceivable way. Many of them did the most menial sort of work there, that they might thus prepare themselves for the highest task the world affords. And all honor to these heroes of the cross!

Successful Missionaries.

The most successful missionaries are those who have said they were going to go, God willing, and then set about getting ready. Of course it was hard to give up home companionships and comforts; nobody suggests that it was to be an easy road; but the compensations of helping personally to bring the needy world beyond the seas to the feet of the Master were sufficient to offset all these things.

The missionary can not fail if he does his utmost. He faces hard tasks, he comes up against almost insurmountable obstacles, he runs against all sorts of enemies, seen and unseen, but he knows he has the presence of Christ with him, and that He will see him through. To invest one's life in an enterprise which can not fail is no mistaken idea.—C. E. Quarterly.

Are you waiting for God's call, or is God really waiting for your answer?—Selected.

And what of man? Is he audacious? Does adventure suit man? Will man go? Yes. Man is profoundly audacious; daring, exploring, defying dangers and death, and going on and on. Civilization has been accomplished, history written by the men whose own souls pronounced an imperious "Go." Man has sailed into the teeth of every wind. He has defied. He still dares. Man does not accept defeat. He is born for other climates. The "Go" of Christ resounds like the shout of our own souls. Adventure for the adventurous. Christianity suits man.—Harry Trumbull Sutton.

Winston-Salem.—Sunday, June the 7th, was a great day in the history of the Methodist Protestant church.

At nine o'clock a number of the members of the church met with the pastor and organized a Workers' Council. Mr. R. N. Hauser, superintendent of the Sunday school, was elected president and Mr. F. D. Voss, secretary-treasurer. The aim of this organization is to increase the Sunday school enrollment, and to make a special effort to reach and win souls for Christ. The Workers' Council will meet every Sunday morning at nine o'clock, 45 minutes before the time for Sunday school.

The subject of the morning sermon was, "Running the Race." Mr. Hunter's discourse was addressed particularly to the ones just beginning the Christian life. Following the sermon, upon invitation of the pastor, a large number of the members went forward, reconsecrating themselves to Christ and pledging anew their loyal support to Mr. Hunter as their leader in all of the work of the church. At the close of the reconsecration service, the doors of the church were opened and thirteen were received into the church. The doors of the church will be opened again next Sunday for the reception of members.

The prayer service last Wednesday evening was an inspiration to all who attended. Mr. Hunter departed from the regular order of service and conducted a testimonial meeting. Brief prayers and testimonies were given by almost every one present. The members of the church have been greatly blessed in the Billy Sunday revival campaign, and they want their lives to mean more for Christ and the church than ever before.

Rev. Mr. Hunter and Misses Ruby Sapp and Margaret Hanner are attending the Young People's Conference in High Point.

State Street, Lexington.—We are all living and "coming along" although we have not been making much noise through the Herald lately. The hot Sundays have not brought down the Sunlay school attendance as some of us feared they might. New scholars are being added and visitors come often.

The Christian Endeavor society, too, is growing and becoming more interesting and helpful all the time. The faithful and efficient president, Mr. Loyd Leonard, is present at every meeting and all the young people are willing to do anything at any time to make the society better. All who attend are helped.

Mr. Bethea has been giving a series of talks Sunday nights on Christian Leadership. He is well qualified ably to discuss this subject as he is such a strong Christian leader himself.

Miss Clement of Halifax county has been the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Bethea for the past week. We have been very glad to have her worship with us. She and Mr. Bethea sang a duet Sunday night which delighted all present.

Many of our people are planning to attend the Young People's Conference at the High Point College. Reporter.

The special session of the North Carolina Conference, held in High Point on Tuesday, June 9, directed me to prepare a concise statement showing the condition of the college, as to its assets and liabilities.

The following statement shows all assets except a small amount of cash on hand. The available cash balance today is less than $1,000. A final statement has not yet been received from the contractors for dormitories and boiler house so the exact amount due them cannot be determined. Other than that the statement is accurate.

The members of the Conference provided a note for $45,000, payable to the contractors, which I hope to be able to use. This note will be due November 1, and it will be absolutely necessary that we raise the money to pay it by that time. $5,000 was promised by friends, and I am hoping that the balance can be provided by High Point contributors, though I have yet no definite assurance regarding what may be expected from that source.

It should, however, be made clear that there is a pressing need of money, and all who can make payments on their pledges, even though the amount may not be due, will greatly aid the institution by so doing. We have no other source to which we can look for money with which to meet the pressing requirements, except our own people.

Very respectfully, J. Norman Wills,
 Treasurer.

UNSOUGHT HAPPINESS.

Try to breathe in the fragrance of the blossoming grape, or to smell it, as the saying goes, and it is next to impossible to detect the delicate perfume. So it is with the trailing arbutus; its faint, elusive odor escapes the vigorous and determined effort to enjoy it. But in another moment, perhaps, the sense is taken unaware, and perceives the exquisite fragrance that makes one say, "O-o-o!" with that long breath of satisfaction that cannot be mistaken.

Thus it is with happiness many and many a time. It eludes the too eager and premeditated search. The very pursuit seems to prevent the realization. But sometimes when one goes upon a sterner errand, with no thought of finding pleasure, but simply of doing duty, suddenly the unsought joy may meet him on the way, with a breath as sweet as the strange, delicious odor of the unobtrusive bloom upon the vine, or of the shy Mayflower that trails along the sheltered places in the spring.—Selected.

WHAT IT MUST BE.

Some one asked Mr. Moody, the great evangelist, what kind of a place he thought heaven to be. His reply was characteristic.

"I can't form any adequate conception of it from the Bible's description," he replied. "Its language is too figurative and picturesque. But I always think of it as a home that God has prepared for those whom he loves. Just what it is like I do not know, but I know that if I were building a home for my children there would be just three things that would limit its beauty and comfort. My knowledge of what would minister to their happiness; my power or capacity to provide these things; and lastly the quality and degree of my love for them."

Judged by such standards, what a wonderful place heaven must be! For infinite love and knowledge know no limitations nor does infinite power yield to any restrictions.—Exchange.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

Missions in America, or home missions, is contemporaneous with the beginnings of Colonial history, though the date of organized home missionary effort begins at a much later period. Home missions began as an expansion of the church so as to include the frontier of settlements. In the beginning the home missionary himself was a colonist. As the country became settled, and the lines of colonial activity lengthened, various agencies were organized for the establishment of the church in the newer sections of the country. Now millions of dollars are being spent each year, and thousands of workers are employed in an attempt to put the church into every community where people have established their homes and are rearing their families.

The character of the frontier has greatly changed with the twentieth century, but the old time frontier has not disappeared. The rush to the Pacific Coast left vast stretches of land untouched, and today new settlers are crowding into this unoccupied country. In 1917, 43,000 homestead patents were issued in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, North Dakota, Wyoming, Utah, and Washington. There are vast sections in Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas where frontier work must be done. The Methodist Protestant Church has one of her finest opportunities in the last four states named, and has the beginning of a good work in Washington. Our only lack in all of these states is the means and the workers to make the work successful. Great things can be accomplished with a comparatively small amount of money. But the expense of developing this territory is increasing with every passing year.

Irrigation is producing a new frontier, under greatly changed conditions, and dry farming methods are extending the range of agriculture far beyond that believed possible in the earlier history of the great West. In those sections communities grow with great rapidity and have all the earmarks of prosperity from the very beginning. The intensive farming made possible through irrigation brings a densely populated community in a surprisingly short time, and they come with all the ideas of co-operation which belong to thickly settled and well established communities.

There are hundreds of such communities where the church has not yet begun to function. Life here is in the making. The comforts and restraints of long established communities are lacking. Adventurous souls have staked all upon a new start. They did not "go west" to become religious but to make money, and find adventure. It is a far cry from "Plymouth Rock" to the "Imperial Valley." In the struggle spiritual influences are too often neglected. Friends "back east" must help them build their churches, and support their ministers, while these new settlers build their towns, their homes, their schools, their court houses, and everything else which must be provided at once in the new community.

The "circuit rider" may use all sorts of make-shift places for worship, but if the church is to take its rightful place in the new community and in the lives of its people, the church must compare favorably with the other public buildings, and the minister must be a man who can hold the confidence and command the respect of the people. If the mountains and the valleys and plains of the "Great West" are to be kept for Jehovah, the gospel of "Plymouth Rock" must be lodged in the hearts of all the people.

Charles H. Beck.

VERY GRATIFYING.

The way the orders for the Children's Day supplies are still reaching this office is indeed very encouraging, for the number is in excess of any previous year, just as it should be.

But every Sunday school in our denomination ought to hold a service, but if for good and sufficient reasons that cannot be done in some places then at least the supplies ought to be sent for, and the music pamphlets distributed, the envelopes put in the hands of the scholars for an offering to be secured, and the two illustrated posters ought to be hung up in some prominent place that our people may see the pictures of all of our church's missionaries, and the other striking pictures which explain the work being done in three countries.

It is not too late to send for the supplies, for you can hold the service when it best suits your local conditions provided you do not wait too long and interfere with the special service of the Board of Education. We must not build up one interest of the church to the injury of any other.

One feature of the Children's Day program is the pageant entitled "The Call," and from the numerous requests for extra copies we conclude it is destined to be the most popular of all the pageants we have published. It is not difficult to arrange, the words and music are provided, and the time for its presentation will not interfere with the full program of which it is only a part.

In Appreciation.

We have on hand a number of sets of beautiful pictures 10x14 inches, eight in the set, "The Call of the World," and six in the set on "India." These would be attractive in frames, or even hung on the wall.

While they last we will send a set to each Sunday school that sends not less than $50 in the Children's Day offering.

This offering must go to the treasurer of your annual conference, and it must be plainly stated it is the Children's Day offering for foreign missions, or it may not be received by the Union Board, so be particular about saying it is for foreign missions.

For many years we have offered two beautifully embroidered banners made in Japan, one for the Sunday school sending in the largest amount, and the other to the Sunday school sending in the largest amount in proportion to its membership.

It was further stipulated that the Sunday school which secured either one of the banners for three years in succession should become the owner of it, and we have had to duplicate orders for banners.

We are ordering two special banners to be made in Japan, to be finely embroidered, and in large Japanese characters to indicate the fortieth anniversary of the Children's Day service, besides other information.

One will be given to the Sunday school sending in this year the largest amount for foreign missions, and the other contributing the largest amount in proportion to members.

It will be necessary for the membership to be indicated to your conference treasurer when you send him the Children's Day offering, and do not forget this, please. We cannot properly award one of the banners unless we have the information called for.

Now all together for the very best Children's Day service, and the largest offering ever secured in the history of our church.

Some schools have already held their service in May, one in Maryland in small town reports offering $200. A good start.

THE TRAVELING PRESIDENT, SERVING THE LOCAL CHURCHES.

By Rev. G. O. McMillan, President of the Fort Smith-Oklahoma Conference.

As an Organizer.

An unorganized group of men, shouldering guns and going out to fight, become a rioting mob, instead of a fighting army. Men, to become good and effective soldiers, must first be organized, then taught in the methods of warfare, then led into the affray.

The crying need of most local churches is organization, teaching or instructing, and leadership. As all pastors have not attended the same school, or been instructed in the same methods of church work, and have used various methods it is therefore a fact that all churches have not the same method of procedure, and many of them are trying to do things in the same way that their fathers did, a hundred years ago. These methods were good in their day, but they mean defeat to the church that depends upon them today.

The president, therefore, becomes an organizer. That is, he should have a program, or organization, that will reach from the one individual to the entire constituency. In other words, his aim should be to have all the church people doing the same thing, at the same time, for the same purpose. To do this, he must know the weaknesses, and the strong points, in each congregation. He must know what people need. He must organize all forces, for the most efficient service.

As many of our churches are rural, and have neglected to properly organize the machinery into a real working force, and have no systematic plan for financing, or carrying on the work of the local church, the president does a great service to that church by seeing that each office is filled with a competent officer, that a system of financing is adopted, that modern, or useful methods of church work are carried out, that all the auxiliaries of the church are harmoniously working for the successful progress of the church.

Many pastors are good preachers, but they fail as organizers. If the machinery doesn't run itself, he seems to be unable to fix it so that it will run. He is willing for it to run; he wants it to run; but he can not find the broken parts, and, therefore, goes ahead with a crippled machine, and wonders why he can not be as successful as his brother pastor, who can not preach as well as he can. The trouble is not with his preaching, or his Christian experience. The trouble is with the machine that he is running. If it has a broken wheel, let it be ever so small, he can never get quantity production out of that machine until it is fixed. He, as pastor, may be unable to locate the break, or even fix it, if it were found, so the master mechanic that he calls is the president of the conference.

As a Teacher.

Aside from being a gospel preacher, as is the usual case, the president is, or should be, more. As the Apostle Paul said: "I am all things to all men, that I might by all means win some." The president should by all means be a teacher. No one has ever learned anything without a teacher. It may have been a blooming flower or a falling star, or a crying baby, or a rolling stone, or a ray of sunshine, or anything else, but it was a teacher.

Some one has said that, "a specialist is an ordinary fellow away from home." Some one else has said that when a minister fails as a preacher, or pastor, he is elected then as a superintendent. I am not willing to let this pass unanswered. I am not willing to take an unsuccessful pastor and make him president. If he can not control his own household, who is going to give him charge of many homes?

In his great commission, Christ admonished us to teach the people to observe all things. As a teacher, the president has many responsibilities. The people are to be taught how to do effective church work. How to manage their financial affairs, how to make the every-member canvass, how to get up their reports in good form to business meetings. They are to be taught their obligations to the pastor, and the local affairs of the church, and their obligations to the entire denominational program for the work of the denomination in every part of the earth. The people should be taught the necessity of adequate church buildings, for caring for the work. They should be taught denominational loyalty. It is often the case, that a large part of the church membership are not loyal to the denomination. They are willing to listen to any wind of doctrine that may come along, to the detriment of their own cause.

In the Southwest, in the rural districts, we are often confronted with four or five denominations worshipping in the same school building. These places are the rendezvous for every "ism" that may be thought of under the sun, such as "Tongues," "Holy Rollers," "deep-water-ites," and other such things. There is no way of keeping Methodist Protestant people from hearing all these isms. Often some "come-outer" will scorn the idea of a paid ministry, or an organized church, or a Sunday school literature, or effusion for baptism, or a Methodist altar, or anything else that we might teach. Such things confuse the minds of the people, or many of them, and often the pastor is unable to reach the point in these matters, in a way that will bring results. The president can say things, that will be heard and observed, that will bring forth fruit, for because of his position, he can say and do many things that the pastor can not say and do.

As a Leader.

Leadership involves qualifications, methods of procedure, and purpose.

Not all leaders are born leaders. As before suggested, the president should be a representative person—one who is qualified to lead. If he has no qualifications as a leader, he will never accomplish very much as a president. His qualifications have been suggested before in this paper, as being an able preacher, teacher and organizer. If he is to serve the local church as a leader he must have the qualification.

A doctor can not intelligently prescribe for any patient until he has been able to properly diagnose the case, find the cause, its stage of development, and the temperament of the patient. So, with the president of a conference. If he is to succeed he must be able to properly diagnose the problems of each local church. To do this, he must find out their needs, their local leadership, their likes and dislikes, their weak as well as their strong points as a church.

When he has properly diagnosed the case, his method of procedure should be to get the remedy applied that will accomplish best results in the shortest time. To do this, he will probably have to do one thing at that time. Paul said, "This one thing I do." Too much program is worse than no program at all, unless you are blessed with a strong leadership in the local church. If old ways are to be abandoned, new plans that are agreeable must be substituted in their place. Then a few general plans, or program of simplicity, that will work for a better church life may be arranged for, and, step by step, church by church, the program may be carried out.

Too much can not be said about "purpose." Too many pastors and churches have had no purpose in the past. That is the tragedy of it all. "Where there is no vision, the people perish." The president who has no vision or program will fail. The vision of the church is often clouded by selfishness. They look upon the pastor as an individual on trial until they learn him. If he does not come up to their desires as a pastor, they begin to break away from the church. Or they may desire a circuit divided and another pastor secured for their special benefit, to satisfy a whim of their own. To lead a people like this into a conference program, takes the wisdom of a strong leader. A pastor feels superior.

The purpose of leading a people should be primarily, a greater church, a closer fellowship, better support for the pastors, an adequate support for the executive work, increased benevolences, harmony with all local, state and national programs of the church, that the entire denomination may be more effective in its work for the Master.

Burlington has long stood first on the A. C. B. column but this morning she goes over the top into the "Paid in Full" column. Fine, Burlington! And Burlington, with a spirit that is unafraid, has increased her membership over 100, which is a finer piece of work even than the fine work of going over the top on the budget. Thank God for Burlington.

Hurrah for Burlington, they sent in $100 and went over the top in great shape. They had held the top of the list so long, now Mt. Pleasant is there. But, Mt. Pleasant, you would have so little to send in to go over too that we are expecting you to go over and next week see some other charge at the top of the list. Lincolnton did fine going from 28 to 16, Bess Chapel from 16 to 11, Richland from 34 to 23, Orange from 8 to 6, Cornelius from 46 to 40. Stanly sent in a contribution which enabled them to hold their own. Saxapahaw too sent in a contribution and held their own.

On the G. C. B. Davidson went from 15 to 8, Orange from 17 to 12, and Concord sent in a good contribution.

Who will honor God and the church by going over the top next week? A. G. Dixon.

JUST AS THOU WILT, AND WHEN AND WHERE...

By Frances R. Havergal.

Lord, speak to me, that I may speak
In living echoes of Thy tone;
As Thou hast sought, so let me seek,
Thy erring children lost and lone.

Oh, lead me, Lord, that I may lead
The wandering and the wavering feet;
Oh, feed me, Lord, that I may feed
Thy hungering ones with manna sweet.

Oh, strengthen me, that while I stand
Firm on the rock, and strong in Thee,
I may stretch out a loving hand
To wrestlers with the troubled sea.

Oh, teach me, Lord, that I may teach
The precious things Thou dost impart;
And wing my words, that they may reach
The hidden depths of many a heart.

Oh, fill me with Thy fullness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflow
In kindling thought and glowing word,
Thy love to tell, Thy praise to show.

Oh, use me, Lord, use even me
Just as Thou wilt, and when and where;
Until Thy blessed face I see,
Thy rest, Thy joy, Thy glory share.

"THE MISTAKES OF MOSES."

Some forty years ago Robert Ingersoll delivered a lecture all over this country with the above title. Thousands paid good money to hear this noted unbeliever make eloquent but diabolical assaults upon the Holy Scriptures. One loyal believer in the Word of God made this remark in that day: "I wouldn't give five cents to hear Ingersoll speak on 'The Mistakes of Moses,' but I would give a goodly sum to hear Moses discourse on The Mistakes of Ingersoll."

The cudgels that Ingersoll laid down at the touch of the grim reaper have been taken up in our day by quite a number of people styling themselves modernists, many of whom parade before the world as ministers of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

They deny the many miraculous incidents recorded in the Pentateuch. The plagues of Egypt, the crossing of the Red Sea, the bringing water out of the rock, the raining of manna are from their viewpoint hoary legends, idle tales, and make-believe stories to amuse children and fools.

One of these so-called modernists told this writer that God did not command Abraham to offer up Isaac, that Abraham just thought He did, and that Moses made the mistake of recording the transaction as emanating from the command of God. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says that Abraham offered up Isaac in obedience to a testing command from God. Was he mistaken too?

Another modernist remarked that he did not believe that God commanded Abraham to send away Hagar and Ishmael, that he just thought God so commanded him. Paul in the epistle to the Galatians speaks of the casting out of this bondwoman and her son as the will of God and entirely proper. Was he also mistaken? Abraham was at least consistent. He sent away six other sons by his last marriage.

Another modernist told this editor that God did not rain down fire and brimstone and destroy Sodom and Gomorrah, but that their destruction was caused by the eruption of one or more volcanoes, whereas neither geography nor history reveals any volcano within a radius of a hundred miles from these cities.

All the modernists, with profound gusto, unite in declaring that Moses was mistaken in recording that God created the universe in six days. God Himself says in the fourth commandment, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day." God wrote this with His own finger upon a tablet of stone. Was He also mistaken?

How long will it be before these emissaries of Satan will repudiate even the ten commandments, deny that God ever wrote them at all and assert that Moses invented them somehow, or found them somewhere, and paraded them before the world as God's commandments?

Moses was not the author of the five books that go by his name. He wrote or arranged what God gave or inspired him to write or arrange. The eternal Word is the real Author of the Holy Scriptures. The Holy Spirit was the agent of inspiration. "All scripture is given by inspiration of God." 2 Tim. 3:16. To inspire means to breathe into. God breathed into good and truthful men His word, His will, and His thought. And these men wrote out this inbreathed message of God. "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." 2 Pet. 1:20, 21. This passage means that the scriptures are not the private or individual thought of men, that they are not the product of their will or wisdom, but that what they wrote was the suggestion of the Holy Spirit.

"But those things, which God before hath shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled." Acts 3:18. This text means that the holy men who spoke and wrote the scriptures were the mouthpieces or amanuenses of the Most High, and that they spoke and wrote only what "God before hath shewed" them.

"Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake." Acts 1:16. This verse means that the writers of the Bible were willing instruments in the hands of the Holy Spirit, and wrote what He inspired or suggested.

Can an inspired man make a mistake? Does not the inspiration of the Holy Spirit furnish an allsufficient guarantee against mistakes? In John 14:26 Jesus sets forth the nature, the method, and the guarantee of inspiration: "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." Holy men cannot make mistakes under the control and direction of the omniscient Holy Spirit. If Moses made mistakes, God Himself must have made them. And this is supremely and unutterably absurd. "Let God be true, but every man a liar."

Unsanctified learning has become the menace of the Christian religion. So many in these days presume to be wise above that which is written. "Professing themselves to be wise, they become fools." The devil has enlisted many of the educational institutions of our land to undermine Christianity. And this devilish propaganda has reached a fearful momentum. "But thou, O Lord, how long?" If it should be thought that Robert Ingersoll, an avowed infidel, would be entitled to an uncomfortable berth in the next world, how much more uncomfortable should be the lot of these modernistic wolves in sheep's clothing, parading as ministers of Christ, who are doing so much more than Ingersoll ever did to discredit, to emasculate, and to undermine the faith of men in the Holy Scriptures?—The Word of Life.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Kennedy.—Mrs. Lelia Neville Kennedy, the wife of J. B. Kennedy, was born December 31, 1879, and on Sunday evening, May the 31st, 1925, she quietly passed into the world of spirits.

Mrs. Kennedy had been in declining health for some time. She was confined to her bed about two months. She had the very best of attention, but she continued to grow worse until the end came. Her death was not really unexpected, even to her, for she seemed to realize that the end was near, and spoke of having to leave her family, and especially the two little girls 10 and 12 years old. She also spoke of heaven and her preparation for heaven.

She accepted Christ and united with the Methodist Protestant church at Ringwood about the year 1901, where she remained a consistent member to the end.

She has been spoken of many times as being one of the best women in the community in which she lived. Indeed a good woman has gone from us. She will be greatly missed in the church, in the home, and in the community in which she lived. But she has entered into that rest that awaits the people of God who have labored faithfully unto the end.

She is survived by her husband, J. B. Kennedy, and four children, two boys and two girls, and two brothers: Wesley W. Neville, Sharpsburg, N. C.; and E. V. Neville of Ringwood, N. C.; and one sister, Mrs. Lalia Clay, of Whitakers, N. C.

Funeral services were conducted in the home by the writer, attended by a large congregation of friends and relatives, after which the body was laid to rest in the family cemetery near the home.

A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled,
A place is vacant in our home,
Which never can be filled.

C. L. Spencer.

Resolutions of Respect.

Whereas it has pleased our Heavenly Father to remove from our midst the dear friend, Sister B. Vassar, who with gentle ways and deep interest in those with whom she was associated, won the love and esteem of all who knew her, resolved—

First, That in the death of Sister Vassar we, the Ladies' Aid society of Pleasant Hill Methodist Protestant church, have sustained the loss of a friend whose companionship it was a pleasure to have.

Second, we bear willing testimony to her beautiful life among us, then while deploring our mutual loss we offer to her bereaved family and mourning friends our heart sympathy and pray that they may find relief to their hardened hearts and be inspired with the consolation that hope in futurity and faith in God give even in the shadow of the tomb.

Fourth, In every relationship of life she was faithful and true. She loved the church and was loyal to its every interest, striving by precept and example to bring her children to love and serve him who was supreme in her own life. Her doors were ever open to hospitality and her home was the preacher's home.

Fifth, That we rejoice in the hope that it is well with her soul and that she can enjoy the heavenly anthems and can behold the King in all his beauty.

Mrs. J. W. Magee,
Mrs. J. M. Dunham.

June 8, Pleasant Hill, N. C.

Mrs. Cashatt.—On June the 19th the body of Mrs. Rosa Cashatt of Mt. Pleasant M. P. church in Randolph county was laid to rest. Mrs. Cashatt had been in declining health for several months, gradually growing worse until the end came the ninth. Mrs. Cashatt was a model wife, a loving mother, a good neighbor, and a loyal supporter of the church. A vacancy that will be hard to fill has been made by her going.

The deceased is survived by her companion, Brother Frank Cashatt, who feels most keenly the loss, three sons and several grandchildren. The rich profusion of flowers, and the large attendance present, expressed the esteem in which we was held. Wm. H. Neese.

FIFTY-FIFTH ANNUAL COMMENCEMENT WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE.

What a sad old world this would be if by any mishap of convention, or educational oversight, these never-ending commencements should cease to be! To be sure, new-fangled notions invade every sphere, and one cannot safely predict what new turn events might take; but general principles stay pretty well fixed, and we have little fear that our children's children and their children to the nth generation will not be carrying on in somewhat the same good old-fashioned commencement way.

So Western Maryland College, true to form and happy tradition, has just had its fifty-fifth annual commencement. A few tears were shed, of course, for commencement means the ending of a very happy period in the lives of a goodly number of young people; but the friendships formed will carry over into after life. Besides the accumulated wisdom and stored-up energy will find expression in new fields of endeavor, and the lure of the yet-unachieved points to a happy future for the members of the largest class that W. M. C. has yet given to the world.

President and Mrs. Ward's Reception.

After the recital Saturday evening the many guests were received at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ward, where they lived over college days, spent a pleasant hour and enjoyed an ice and cake together.

President Ward's Baccalaureate Sermon.

President Ward took as his text the words of Isaiah 50:4—"The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned that I might know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary."

The sermon was great in its simplicity, profound because it dealt with great principles, impressive because it was the fiery and fervid utterance of prophetic vision. "The Bible," said the preacher, "is not the most difficult, but the easiest book to comprehend that has ever been written." It made life's program so plain that a "wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein." Then he proceeded to show how it revealed the depths of meaning and the heights of possibility of life to the seeking human soul. How to live is our problem. The text brings us into the presence of God first of all. He is revealed as the Author of all life, the Giver of every good, the Revealer of all truth, the Dispenser of all law, The Supreme Person with whom we have to do. This world is His world, and its control is in His hands. He is not mocked. Man is a success or a failure as he obeys or disobeys those truths made manifest to his growing intelligence. The text also reveals God as imparting blessings to man. God gives. All we have is from Him. All the blessings of the universe, the beauty of the world, the joys that follow right living, the comfort that follows all obedience to laws, mental, physical, spiritual, all are gifts of God. Even wisdom comes from God. The Lord has given us the tongue of the learned that we should know. It is incumbent on us all to know, to understand the world, to understand life. But thirdly, we are made to know that our gifts, whether of knowledge, or eloquence, or social position, or power, or wealth of material possessions are to be used for the blessing of others. Knowledge must be passed on. Comforts must be shared. Strength must be inspired in others. "That I might know how to speak a word in season to the weary." To those who do not know. Here is the obligation of the enlightened. You are to use your knowledge, your gifts, your wealth, your influence, for the relief and edification of others less fortunate. Learning selfishly used may be a curse to others and to the one who possesses it. So wealth, money, hoarded and not used for the blessing and uplift of others may work ill to him who has it. "To this sort of service I invite you, and along the path of this sort of 'higher education' I would like to send you forth, to use your gifts of mind and heart for the healing of the world's distresses and the setting up of the Kingdom of God in the earth; and that you regard the giving a word to the weary or ignorant, or discouraged, as an attribute of the good life, and preparedness and willingness to serve others the distinctive mark of true culture and education. Fail here and you fail at the most vital point of human experience. The time will come when you will know, if you do not know it now, that the only wealth you will have will be what you have given away; that the only real and abiding possessions, whether of mind or heart, whether of gold or silver, or houses or lands, will be those you have used in the service of others; in what you have done to make the world better for those who are to follow after you; in the words of cheer and comfort and inspiration you have spoken to those who, looking at you while you have lived and wrought, have heard what you have had to say in the ears of the needy and the overborne in the heat and struggle of the day."

After this great sermon with its challenge to achievement and service, the college choir sang George Martin's "Whoso Dwelleth," a magnificent anthem with orchestra accompaniment again, after which President H. L. Elderdice, D.D., LL.D., of the Seminary, voiced the aspirations and worship of the assembly in reverent prayer, closing with the benediction.

Christian Association Service.

Again, for the evening service, the two Methodist churches, the Reformed, and the Lutheran congregations of the city united with the College Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. in one service addressed by the chancellor of the American University, of Washington, D. C. The choirs of these churches united with the college choir in rendering Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" from the "Messiah," and Mozart's "Gloria From Twelfth Mass." Under the efficient leadership of Miss Dorst, director, this united chorus had been brought to a high standard of perfection in interpretation of these masterpieces, and the audience was thrilled with the music. Rev. R. N. Edwards presided, Rev. J. N. Garner led in prayer, Rev. J. P. Ruple read the Scriptures, and Dr. Lucius C. Clark, chancellor, preached a very helpful and inspiring sermon on the text, "Sirs, we would see Jesus." From a large experience with the world, a deep knowledge of men, and a deep spiritual understanding of the scriptures, Chancellor Clark drew impressive lessons on the meaning of life, and pointed out how it could be profoundly enriched by the knowledge of Jesus and His teachings and the acceptance of His leadership. Fellowship with Jesus means a deepening insight into values of all kinds. Even the physical world is better understood when viewed as the Father's world, and a finer sense of the worth of man as living personality with an infinite future is made possible when one begins to put first things first as Jesus teaches men how to do. Fine, high service for others was here again the secret of the constant enrichment of life. The trying heat of the evening kept many away from the service, no doubt, but those present were greatly pleased and inspired with the chancellor's earnest message. Rev. Mr. Nichols pronounced the benediction.

Inter-Society Oratorical Contest.

Here it was Greek against Greek. Or, in other words, Browning against Phœmathean, and Irving against Webster. Again the Girls' Glee Club furnished the music, singing "O! Skylark for Thy Wings," by Smart, and "Estudiantina," by Lacombe. The Philos were represented by Miss Pauline Chambers, of Centerville, Md., who spoke on "The Outer Covering," and by Miss Virginia G. Pritchard, of Cumberland, who made "Untraveled" her topic. Browning put forward Misses Lillian Baker, of New Windsor, and Florence G. Massey, of Baltimore, they speaking respectively on "Music in Every Day Life," and on "A Nation of Babbitts." The Irvings were represented by Willard L. Hawkins, of Westminster, with an oration on "America's Eternal Heritage," and by Gaither McD. Garrett, of Rockville, Md., whose subject was "In Bondage," a plea against Child Labor. Messrs. Charles A. Stewart, of Crisfield, Md., and Willard B. Ward, of Baltimore, maintained the cause of the Websters with orations on "The Unarmed Invasion," and "The Interdependence of Nations." The speakers without exception handled their subjects well and brought new honor to their respective societies. In the opinion of the judges, however, the scales tipped a little bit in favor of the Irvings and Brownings. The Websters nevertheless, were good losers.

Fifty-fifth Commencement.

This fifty-fifth commencement was unique in several particulars. It marked the graduation of the largest class ever sent out from the college; it came almost at the peak of the greatest financial campaign ever undertaken by the institution; it turned over to the State an unusually large number of trained teachers for the public schools; and the commencement address was by the president emeritus of the college on the fiftieth anniversary of his graduation from the same institution over which he had presided most of that time. Had it not been that his subject, "De Senectute," raised a slight doubt as to the fact, the audience might well have adjudged from the vigor and sprightliness of the speaker, that the calendar had been set back fifty years and the vitality of youth had scarce abated, for the sword of intellectual criticism had not lost its edge. On the other hand, the profoundness of the philosophy set forth, and the maturity of appreciative judgments, of eternal values convinced all that they were listening not to youth but to the wisdom that comes only with advanced years.

The service was preceded by the usual professional in caps and gowns, of graduates, faculty, and trustees. Rev. G. I. Humphreys, D. D., president of the Maryland Annual Conference, led in prayer. The orchestra again furnished excellent music for the day.

Rev. Thomas Hamilton Lewis, D.D., LL.D., of the class of 1875, president emeritus, then gave the address of the day. We wish we had space to print it here in full. But we are informed it will soon be printed. Only a brief indication of its argument, then, need be given now.

Dr. Lewis discussed life in its larger unity. In particular he spoke of youth and old age, as necessary and complementary forces in the interpretation and expression of life in richness and fullness of meaning. Life is not just an expanse of years. Methuselah's biography, "He was begotten, he begat, he died," is not exceedingly inspiring. Life as a frame of years, or as an empty casket, no matter how costly, and beautiful, is a ghastly joke. Life, to be of real value to one's self or to the world, must have something in it. The struggle for subsistence necessarily occupies much of our energy. But life is more than meat and raiment. The body must be clothed upon, but there is a spiritual furnishing, an intellectual adorning, a personal life content, an evolutionary growth of character, without which life is worthless, and but an empty frame. Life must be lived not for the present only. It should be so lived as to get an increasing appreciation of eternal values. Education should be such as fits one not only for the activities of youth, but for that larger and more important period for which youth is but the preparation. True educational philosophy is not worth the name that does not embrace the whole of life. "It is unintelligent and cruel to show youth the way—by effort and strategy and sacrifice—to get things, and still more things; to discover when he comes to the time when he can do nothing, that he is nothing; that all he has done with his youth has been to accumulate, that that all he has accumulated has value only for the youth he has lost." "Wisdom is knowledge ripened by experience, and experience is impossible without time. Time means age. The place of wisdom in the social structure is undisputed. It is better than rubies. "Since there is certainly no surplus of wisdom in the world, and certainly no hope of progress without it, it would seem the part of economic forethought to encourage all men to become as wise as they can, and to live as long as they are wise. Another "idiosyncrasy" of old age was beautifully dwelt on by the speaker, namely, its deepening vision of the meaning and value of a future life—immortality. "Grow old along with me, the best is yet to be, the last for which the first was made. Youth sees but half—see all—nor be afraid!"

THE CONTRACT HAS BEEN LET.
A letter received a day or two ago from Rev. Fred. C. Klein, the secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, informs me that the contract has been let for the church for Nagoya College. He tells me building costs have gone up so that it was not possible to let the contract within the amount asked for at the General Conference last May—$12,500—indeed the building will cost several thousand dollars more than that amount.
So even though all the money is paid in that was pledged, we must still provide the balance from some source. If you have hesitated to give a bit for this enterprise, thinking that perhaps it would not be needed, you need not hesitate any longer. We must raise the full $500 to keep faith with the promise made at the last General Conference. We must go beyond that to help take care of the extra cost.
I do not wish to prolong this campaign. I shall not have to if each one will do his part without waiting. "Eventually—why not now?" I was delighted to get a money order for $5 from the Mt. Zion Sunday school, Pinnaele circuit, this week. These folks have responded to every appeal I have made. They have set a fine example for the other Sunday schools in the conference. Go, and do thou likewise!
The fund amounts at this writing to $165.50. I lack of $334.50 of having the $500. Come on, folks, let's give the rest of it and have the thing over. Send your check to Rev. C. W. Bates, 165 Hillside Street, Asheville, N. C.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JUNE 21.

Peter Delivered from Prison.

Lesson Text: Acts 12:5-17.
Golden Text: Ps. 34:7.

The Central Truth "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord." "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

Scriptural Points.

1. This Herod who killed James the brother of John with the sword and put Peter in prison was Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod the great who murdered the babes of Bethlehem, nephew of Herod Antipas who beheaded John the Baptist, and father of Herod Agrippa II who said to Paul, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian."

2. Herod killed James and imprisoned Peter in order to please the Jews, and the devil. He craved to be popular, even at the expense of truth, righteousness, and the rights of others. This inordinate craving for popularity brought on his early tragic death. When the plaudits of the populace reached that dizzy height wherein he was ascribed the honors that belonged to God alone, it is recorded: "And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory: he was eaten of worms and gave up the ghost."

3. "Peter therefore was kept in prison," because it was contrary to the Jew's sentiments of propriety to have a public execution during the feast of the Passover. Herod intended to put Peter also to death as soon as this feast was over.

4. "But prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him." There was no meeting of the whole church to pray for Peter's deliverance, but small groups of members gathered in private homes to wrestle with God in prayer. There may have been a hundred of these prayer meetings at the same time. It was a praying church.

5. It was a fourfold miracle of deliverance.

1. "The angel of the Lord came upon him." A messenger was sent from heaven to deliver Peter. 2. "And a light shined in the prison." It was a supernatural light. 3. "The chains fell off his hands," unfastened or broken by the exercise of supernatural power. 4. "Which opened to them of his own accord." The gate, or door, was unlocked and swung upon through the power of God.

6. "But thought he saw a vision." Peter was sleeping so peacefully and so soundly that he did not become thoroughly awakened till the angel left him. It is likely that it was all done within five minutes.

7. "When Peter was come to himself," that it, completely awakened, he understood that God had wrought his deliverance by the ministry of an angel.

8. He proceeded to the home of Mary the mother of John Mark, with the evident purpose of spending the remainder of the night. Finding a prayer-meeting going on, he "went into another place" to get lodging and secrete himself from the wrath of Herod and the Jews.

9. The praying company were not expecting Peter's deliverance, at least, in this way. They accused the girl of being crazy, who told of Peter's presence at the door. Being convinced that some one had arrived, they said, "It is his angel," his guardian angel. It was most likely that this guardian angel was entrusted with this mission of deliverance.

Practical Points.

1. The devil's most foolish and ineffective method of attack upon Christianity is the physical,—the threat and exercise of physical privations, torture, and death. Persecutions instead of hurting the Christian religion tend to spread and strengthen it. The fight against God and His program for the world will always be a losing battle.

2. It will never do for Christians to lose heart in the face of the most trying situation, difficulty, or opposition. There is nothing too hard for the Lord. The present modernistic array against the supernatural religion outlined in the Holy Scriptures is quite imposing and powerful. The Author of creation, the scriptures, Christianity, and the church has declared with the authority the omnipotent Sovereign: "Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." All glory be to His holy name.

3. Angels are the Christian's reinforcements from the skies. They inform, guard, guide, strengthen, deliver, and comfort the children of God. "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation?"

4. Prayer is man's most precious privilege and the mightiest power that he can wield this side of heaven. It is "the power that moves the hand that made the world, to bring salvation down." It is the most powerful weapon of defense and offence in the warfare against the powers of darkness. "Pray without ceasing."—The Word of Life.

SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.

Greatness in the Sight of the Lord.

Text: "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord." Luke 1:15.

To be really great is a most worthy ambition. But so many come short of the greatness that is unselfish and enduring. Greatness in one's own sight, or egotism, is worse than no greatness at all. Greatness in the eyes of others, which is popularity, is likewise deceitful and dangerous. We are warned against all such estimations of greatness. "Seekest thou great things for thyself? seek them not."

There are three degrees of greatness in the sight of the Lord, the greatness of goodness, the greatness of relationship, and the greatness of glory. We will take note first of

The Greatness of Goodness.

This is conferred greatness, bestowed upon all who will meet the conditions. It is the greatness of being saved, of being pure in heart and life, of being like God. The Psalmist said, "Thy gentleness hath made me great." God's gentle dealings with all penitent believers in change of heart, in uprightness of life, and transformation of character, enable them to sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and they become truly great. The prophet wrote, "Great shall be the peace of thy children." It is "the peace that passeth all understanding." And this imparts "the joy unspeakable and full of glory." Peace with conscience, peace with man, and peace with God is the peace that makes men great in the sight of the Lord.

And obedience to the will of God confers real greatness. Jesus said "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

The greatness of the Christian experience has been compared by Jesus to a treasure hid in a field, which when a man has found, he sells all that he has and buys that field. Religion is the pearl of great price, for which one can well afford to give up every other pearl of life in order to obtain. "For what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

Let us consider in the second place

The Greatness of Relationship.

It is a great honor to be servants of the King of kings and Lord of lords. "If any man serve me, him shall my Father honor." To serve fallen, needy mankind is to serve the Lord Jesus Christ. For He will say in the last day, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

It is great to be sons and daughters of the everlasting Father. "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

All believers are brothers and sisters to the Lord Jesus Christ. For He has said, "Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother." What greatness is this to be a brother or sister of the adorable Christ!

And then Jesus lifts His followers still higher and calls them His friends: "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." What a joy to be a friend to the "Friend that sticketh closer than a brother!"

And the blessed relationship of kings and priests unto God has also been established. "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen."

But the greatest and most honorable relationship of all is that of bridehood with Christ. The church is God's chosen people, called out from the world and set apart as the everlasting bride of Jesus Christ. By the mouth of Jeremiah God makes this appeal to His church, "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am married unto you."

And again let us consider

The Greatness of Glory.

The great in goodness and relationship will share in a great home. For Jesus said, "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." It will be a home in a beautiful, magnificent city, a city of gold, pearls, and glittering gems, a city without clinics, hospitals, or cemeteries, a city of clean streets, pure water, holy people, and delightful associations, "a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

In that beautiful city awaits "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed at the last time." It will be a most extensive inheritance. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things." We will all be millionaires in the better world. "For all things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours, and ye are Christ's and Christ is God's."

And a great crown of rejoicing will be given all the saints of God. Paul calls it a crown of righteousness: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me at that day. And not to me only, but unto all them also who love his appearing." James speaks of this crown as the crown of life: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." Peter says this crown is a crown of glory: "And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

And it will be an honor beyond description to have a share in the eternal sovereignty of Jesus Christ. "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him." Jesus makes this promise to all His followers. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

Faith in God is the primary condition of this threefold greatness. "According to your faith, so be it unto you."

Consecration is the fundamental condition of all greatness in God's sight. All the treasures of wisdom and destiny are yielded to all who yield themselves to God. "Consecrate yourselves today to the Lord, even every man upon his son, and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day."

Magnifying God and minifying self is another condition of true and abiding greatness. "Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord," and she became one of the great saints of all time. Humility is the springboard of God-given greatness. The less we become in our own sight, the greater we become in God's sight. "Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up."—The Word of Life.

—The attendant in a dentist's office said to the man with the swollen jaw who had just entered, "Do you want to have a tooth extracted?"

"Want to?" he snorted. "What do you think I am, a lunatic? I've got to."—Selected.

When pestilence at noonday wastes,
And death in triumph onward hastes,
O Savior Christ, remember Nain,
And give us our beloved again.
In every ward of sickness tread,
And lay thine hand upon each head.

O Friend and Comforter divine,
Who makest light at midnight shine,
Give consolation to the sad
Who in the days of peace were glad,
And in the hour of sorrow spread
Thy wings above each drooping head. Amen.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.Announcement—Mt. Zion.

On Sunday, June 21, at 11 o'clock, Memorial Service will be held at Mt. Zion church.

Those of you who have friends and relatives buried at Mt. Zion are requested to be present at this service. And don't forget the flowers.

Let us show our respect for those who are passed out and gone on by being present at this service.

Gravelly Hill Union Sunday School.—Wonder if you would let this Sunday school slip in a short report, so you may know the good it is doing.

The Sunday school here was reorganized April 12, Easter Sunday afternoon, with 57 present, and we keep crawling up—at present there are over one hundred on roll.

We selected for our superintendent Mr. Lytle McAdams, assistant superintendent, Mr. A. W. Lloyd, secretary and treasurer, Mr. Hall McAdams, assistant, Miss Lacy McAdams, teachers, Mrs. W. A. Bingham, Mrs. A. W. Lloyd, and Mrs. C. E. Squires. Miss Nannie McAdams is pianist, Mrs. C. M. Jones is superintendent of the Cradle Roll, which we have just organized.

We wish to thank Mr. Kenion of Mebane, N. C., Holiness church and Mr. Fred Cochran of the Baptist church for their splendid sermons which they have given to this Sunday school. I am sure everyone that heard them enjoyed their sermons and we will be glad to have them to come again.

This is a union Sunday school and we would be glad for anyone to preach for us.

We are using The Masters Quarterly this year, which everyone seems to like very much. I am asking everyone to pray for this little band of workers that we may have a good Sunday school here this year. This is the best year with us yet. I will close for this time. Will let you hear from us again. With best wishes to the Herald and readers, Annie C. Squires.

Henderson.—Several of our people attended the special session of the Annual Conference held in High Point last week. Those attending were Rev. J. E. Pritchard, Messrs. S. R. Harris, Sr., G. B. Harris, E. C. Kittrell and J. J. Evans.

Professor Lindsey's music pupils gave a recital in our church last Thursday night which was greatly enjoyed.

Our pastor, Rev. J. E. Pritchard, will attend the Pastors' Summer Conference this week in High Point. He will have next Sunday's services as usual, but there will not be any mid-week prayer meeting.

Mr. Pritchard has announced that he will put the matter of collections for the High Point College before us next Sunday.

Misses Helen Hight, Eleanor Young and Mrs. J. E. Pritchard will attend the Young People's Conference in session at High Point this week.

Corinth, Littleton Circuit.—Last Sunday was a good day for our little folks—Children's Day. They always enjoy the all-day service. Church was crowded. The children did very well considering the pullbacks country people have—farmers so busy! Our organist, Mrs. Bernace Carter, worked hard on the music. We used all the board furnished but one. Much credit is due her for her faithful service. Mrs. Walter Carter and Mrs. Bernard Morris did all they could to help make this service a success.

After noon Brother O'Briant directed his discourse to the old people. He always has something worth while to tell us. An offering was taken.

A few days before our service Mrs. Jessie Carter's little granddaughter, Mary Crickmore, was taken to Roanoke Rapids hospital for an operation (appendicitis). She underwent the operation nicely, is doing well.

Sunday afternoon of the Children's Day service, a grandson of hers, Herman Jenkins, was turned over in car in which he and three other youths were driving; they ran into a sandbar as some one passed them, lost control, over went he car. The other boys were not hurt much. Herman had to be taken to a hospital.

Mr. and Mrs. Conrad L. O'Briant of San Antonio, Texas, who have been out here some time visiting his father, Rev. J. B. O'Briant, worshiped with us last Sunday. Glad to have them with us.

Before this is printed wedding bells will ring merrily for some of our good folks.

Greenville Circuit.—The Triplet community has been greatly saddened. Brother Joseph Chambliss, when returning from shop at about six o'clock P. M., Thursday, June 11, near and in sight of his home, dropped dead. Heart failure. He had been in failing health for some time; one of the oldest citizens and a member of Philadelphia M. P. church.

There seems to be much sickness in this part. Mrs. Algie Phillips has been very sick, is some better. Several down at Mr. Ben Weaver's and in a very serious condition. Mrs. Abert Taylor very sick, Brother T. J. Pearson has suffered some very hard attacks during the past two weeks. Mrs. Bettie Clark does not improve. The pastor of Greenville circuit, H. L. Powell, has been shut in for more than three weeks. Carbuncle on back of neck and head, the doctor says the worst one he ever saw. The suffering has been severe almost to the limit of human endurance. The doctor says it will be more than a month yet before he can wear clothes about the neck.

May the readers of the Herald join in prayer for us.

H. L. Powell.

Canaan, Denton Charge.—Yesterday our pastor preached one of his soul-stirring sermons. It always seems that Brother Loy's last sermon is the best one. We have preaching at Canaan twice a month and prayer meeting twice a month and Sunday school every Sunday, so you see we are kept pretty busy. We are having one of the best Sunday schools in the history of our church. The attendance is near one hundred most Sundays. We are planning for an all-day Children's Day service at this place the fourth Sunday in this month. All are invited to come. All pray for our special meeting which will begin the third Sunday in August.

BIRDS, AND THE HUMANE.

The books and the papers are of vast importance, and they are needed in connection with the regular teaching and preaching—and schooling, etc. The school room is one of the foremost places for moral teaching. The books could be very much improved—and should be. Books treating on the humane are very much needed in the schools. There is but very little said about taking care of the birds.

Of course, one way of telling it is to say that if we will let the "poor birds" alone they will take care of themselves. But the birds are not being let alone but are being killed every day these days. Lots of small boys (and others) have bird guns and they use their guns. If the birds are killed out the insects may ruin the country. However, the birds ought to live. Besides letting the birds live, we can help them to live.

A great way to help them to live is to plant cherry trees, and to plant lots of trees. Many kill the poor birds because they eat cherries, but we ought to be glad to provide provision for the birds. Birds are God's creatures, and they deserve a living. They are musicians provided for the human family, and are the cheapest and finest musicians in the world.

Men and women of influence ought to send up a cry against the destruction of the birds. It is a common thing to see beautiful little birds hopping around that have been crippled. Who will come out and help to urge for the protection of the innocent birds?

Matches in the hands of little boys have served to destroy much property by fire. Our of the most unreasonable things is to put guns in the hands of small boys. A common thing that is very unreasonable and ugly is to see boys pointing guns at people—and in all such cases they think that they are "smart."

I have been forced to see, of late, some very troublesome cases by the class of small boys who are encouraged to handle guns and kill the birds. A very strange thing is that grown people try to encourage these horrible troubles. The course favoring the humane is being scorned by some of the young and by some who pretend to teach. The abuse of the innocent, in anything, is very hurtful to the morals of old and young. It is a great thing to educate on the literary side of life—but the moral in the sight of God is of greater importance. Colleges built up and kept up inside of God's moral vineyard are of great worth—but the moral in the sight of God is the great thing needed all over the world.

The actual humane acted out is a good thing for the morals. Let us do our best to respect the men and women who are tender hearted and true.
W. F. Grabs.

Shiloh, Connelly Springs Charge.—We are glad to report that we are still carrying on our church work and having very good success.

Brother Gurtner preached for us last Sunday (June 14). He preached a good sermon and we like him better every time we hear him. Sunday school report: scholars present, 46; collection, $1.29; chapters read, 757.

—General Grant's father-in-law presented Grant and his wife with a Negro boy slave for a wedding present.

High Point.—A most interesting service was held in the First Church last Sunday morning and a noteworthy one as well, it being the occasion of the first commencement sermon of High Point College. It was delivered by Dr. R. L. Shipley of Salisbury, Md., and proved to be a masterful effort. It was greatly enjoyed by a large congregation, the college students having reserved seats in the middle tier of pews. The sermon was a gem of diction, was beautifully delivered, and abounded in good, practical advice to the young students. We people of High Point must confess that Dr. Shipley is a new discovery to us, for we were unaware of the possession of this treasure, and were agreeably surprised to hear this graceful fluent orator. We hope that he will come south again and often. The latchstring hangs out to him in High Point every time he comes our way.

Dr. Andrews announced that the College has just closed a satisfactory and successful year even beyond their fondest hopes and dreams. There have been 134 students in the different departments, who have on the whole done good work. A large number of new students have enrolled for next year, and four new members have been added to the faculty. No commencement exercises were held this year because there was no class to graduate; the first one will be that of 1927. There is a need for such a College, and we feel sure it is going to measure up to the standard.

At the Sunday morning service the music was beautiful. The choir rendered two anthems, "Send Out Thy Light" and "Fierce Were the Wild Billows," which were lovely. Miss Myrtle Perry sang a delightful solo, "Consider the Lilies," which was greatly enjoyed. The congregation is greatly indebted to Miss Novella McIntyre of the music department of the College for her invaluable service in playing the pipe organ, and to Mrs. R. M. Andrews for directing the choir for the past several weeks.

On Sunday afternoon at 2:45 o'clock, before an audience which completely filled the auditorium, the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, the Patriotic Order of Sons of America, and the Laughters of Liberty united in an interesting service at the College. A copy of the Bible was presented by Rev. Geo. H. Crowell, first superintendent of schools of High Point, and Dr. Andrews made the speech of acceptance. The flag was presented by Dr. J. T. Burrus, and accepted by Prof. P. E. Lindley. Besides these addresses, Mr. R. M. Gant, State Councilor, made an interesting talk on "Juniorism," and Rev. Odell Leonard of Lexington defined the principles of P. O. of S. of A. A band from Lexington rendered several selections of music. The beautiful American flag now floats over the campus in front of Roberts Hall.

The Board of Stewards will meet Tuesday evening. The Young People's Missionary Society will also meet Tuesday at eight P. M. at the home of Misses Margaret and Lois Snipes on Steele Street.

Circle No. 4 of the Foreign Missionary Society will meet Thursday evening with Misses Lucy and Carmen Oakes on Euniss St.

At the Blue and White Luncheon at the N. C. C. W. Commencement last Saturday, Mrs. S. S. Coe spoke for her class of 1913, and the members of the class, who were present for the reunion, came to High Point, and were guests of Mrs. Coe at a delightful luncheon at her beautiful new home in Emerywood on Monday at six P. M.

The N. C. Conference is holding a special session today at High Point College, and matters of much importance are to be discussed. The call for this meeting was issued by President Dixon the middle of May. It is thought that the session will close tonight.

Mrs. R. T. Pickens will go to Chapel Hill tomorrow to attend the University commencement, when her younger son, Rupert T. Pickens, Jr., will receive the A. B. degree. He was elected to Phi Beta Kappa, National Scholarship Fraternity, having made high marks for three years. His average was 94.1.

Miss Elizabeth Welch, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Welch, was a popular member of the senior class, which graduated from High Point high school last Friday.

Mrs. George R. Brown has returned from a visit to her daughter, Mrs. Geo. Armacost, of Westminster, Md.

June 9.

Bess Chapel.—Second Sunday evening at eight o'clock the Bess Chapel congregation was delighted to have the Wright Quartet from Fallston to sing. They sang eleven songs. Our Bess Chapel church has a large seating capacity for a country church and it did not hold the congregation. All were delighted and benefited by their fine quartet singing. We hope they will come and sing again for us.

Bess Chapel has put announcement boards up for the church, one in front of the church and two on the public road near the church. They read as follows:

BESS' CHAPEL

Methodist Protestant Church.

Sunday School 10 A. M.
Preaching first and third Sundays, 8:00 P. M.
Preaching second and fourth Sundays, 11 A. M.
All Are Welcome.

Credit and appreciation are due Mr. A. A. Beam for the lumber, and Mr. Houser for the making and painting of the boards. Also Miss Nora Beam who did the lettering with great care. We have good congregations at all the services. It is our prayer that much good may be accomplished at this place.

E. A. Bingham, Pastor.

Bessemer City.—The fourth Sunday evening in July at eight P. M. we are expecting some special quartet singing by a community quartet from Bess Chapel and nearby community. The quartet is made up of the following singers: Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Jinks, Mr. Coman R. Upton, Mr. F. A. Boyles, and Walter F. Boyles. We invite every one to worship with us and enjoy the special music. The Bessemer people were pleased to have Rev. N. L. Rabb, one of their own boys who now lives at Cramerton, N. C., preach for them fifth Sunday morning at 11 o'clock. We are sorry to report that our organist, Miss Lucy Blanton, has been sick for several weeks. We desire the prayers of Christian people for her recovery. Good interest is being shown in the Christian Endeavor society at this time. The Sunday school and church services have increased in attendance for the last few Sundays. Last Sunday we had ninety-six present at Sunday school. It is our prayer that new interest and great progress for the kingdom may be accomplished at Bessemer.

E. A. Bingham.

Asheville.—Having an article concerning another matter to write to the Herald, I am taking advantage of the opportunity to say a word about the work here.

While nothing startling has been done since the last report, we are making progress. Last Sunday three new members—Brother R. H. Ray, his wife and his mother—were received. We know of others who will come in shortly.

Last Wednesday night we had the largest attendance at prayer meeting so far this year. The pastor is giving some studies of Bible characters. These seem to be helpful and interesting to those who attend the services.

Our congregations at the morning service are especially good. So many of our people live at a distance from the church that they can hardly be expected to make both services. Visitors are frequent at both services. (If you who read this plan to come up this summer do not fail to drop in for a service if you are here over Sunday.)

We are planning for an all-day Children's Day next Sunday. The primary department will have charge in the morning. At night the young ladies will give a missionary pageant.

The Philathea class recently held its monthly business meeting with an outing at Mr. and Mrs. Ward Mitchell's. A very enjoyable occasion.

Last Thursday night the Christian Endeavor society combined business with pleasure, having a wiener roast and business meeting at an old quarry near Haw Creek. New officers were elected, as follows: President, Richard Hanner; vice president, Miss Gladys Bollinger; secretary, Miss Mildred Younginer; treasurer, Miss Vonnice Roberts. C. W. Bates, Pastor.

Kistlers' Cleveland Circuit.—Memorial services were observed the first Sunday in June had a good service. Our pastor exchanged piths with Brother Morgan of Fallston. We were glad to have the pleasure of hearing Brother Morgan preach. His message was a good one; his subject was the unbroken family in heaven. Or will the family ties be severed in heaven? Everybody enjoyed the service. Come again and do likewise. The song service was good. The Lawndale and the Oak Grove people were there to sing for us; glad to have them with us in the service; also the Pleasant Hill people. Glad to have the pleasure to worship together. Come again. Praying the blessings of our heavenly Father on the work of all that are striving to attain a higher life and a crown at last, goodbye till we meet again.

Hickory Grove, Guilford Circuit.—Although you have not heard anything from us in a great while, we are still pressing forward. Attendance has been splendid regardless of weather. Nevertheless no matter how many the number increases, and that is just what we want, there will be plenty work waiting for us all. The more we do the more there is to be done, while as we work together in the self-same way bringing others to Jesus, the more blessed it will be in the outcome. On May the 24th at 11 o'clock Brother Whitaker preached for us and our attendance was good. The following Sunday we held our Children's Day.

In the morning the children rendered their exercises just splendidly, after which Mrs. Dixon, from Greensboro, a returned missionary, gave us some useful and helpful hints from her own experience on foreign missions. We feel ourselves highly honored to have with us such a wonderful missionary worker.

In the afternoon, after helping ourselves to all the good eatables, it seemed a little bit hard to go back into the church, but after remembering that Mrs. Dixon had promised us in the forenoon to speak to us again after lunch, everybody was ready to come back. Her text was: God's Great Love. Isn't it wonderful how God loves His children and how He has shown it with all the flowers, bees, and the birds to sing and how He endured the temptation, being spit upon, dying on the cross. What was this all for? To show His great love that he has for us. Oh! that we would love and trust Him more! I am sure each and all enjoyed it very much, and wish Mrs. Dixon great success and hope she will come again.

Next thing on program was the collection, amounting to $31, in which we hope every one took a part. This was good and hope it will be better next time.

At three o'clock Brother Gerringer from Greensboro also delivered to us a wonderful address on Missions and Young People's Work. Although Brother Gerringer had two subjects, he could not have rendered on any better than he did the two. It was fine. How he impressed upon us the art of giving more to the heathen and not so much for pleasure and upon the young as well as the old, to push forward every effort to help send the Gospel across the seas. And also not forget the Summer Conference to be held at the High Point College June 15-25. We also wish Brother Gerringer much success and hope he will not put off coming again as long as he did heretofore.

On the fourth Sunday in August we are looking forward to our revival meeting. We hope each and all will pray for a great revival in our community. Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

West Thomasville Circuit.—The earth is not being turned upside down on West Thomasville circuit, however, there are some indications of progress. The pastor is out of school again for a few months and it is hoped that we may be able to accomplish much during this short time. I feel that a great amount of good could be done here if the pastor were able to give his entire time and attention to the work. We feel that some has been done regardless of this fact.

After many months of anxious waiting we were at last privileged to worship in our new church in Thomasville last Sunday evening. While our attendance was not very large, due to the fact that several special meetings were in progress in town, yet all seemed to enjoy the service and are very enthusiastic. The auditorium is complete but we have some work to do on the Sunday school rooms before we will be able to use them.

Our people at Spring Hill are getting in the notion or have come to the conclusion that our present building, which has been in use for over fifty years, is inadequate for the work we wish to do and out of keeping with the progress of the community. We have made no definite plans as yet but it seems that a new church is at least a probability. A number of the members and others interested people of the community have stated that they would donate from one to five hundred dollars for this purpose. A new building is greatly needed as there are great possibilities for good, due to the fact that there are so many young people round about that need better facilities for their development.

As stated above, I am out of school again. I have been a student at our own High Point College. We have completed a very successful term. It seems to me that those of our denomination who have attended other institutions of like nature have missed a great deal. I am sure that there is not another college anywhere that is doing better work, including larger institutions. To come out plain, I do not see how people who claim to be Methodist Protestants can be so disloyal. They are Israelites only in name. If they are Israelites, they are certainly of Judas' type. Some say, "I can make or save a few dollars by going elsewhere." That is in substance what Judas said when he betrayed his Lord. The rates here are in keeping with other institutions, and further, I believe that some inducements are being offered here that are not offered at other places. I am sure that my opportunities have been greater and my expenses smaller.

There has been a great display of green paint and 28's around the college recently. I do not know why the freshmen use paint of this color in their works of art.

Shiloh.—Sunday school report for June 7: Attendance: officers and teachers, 6; departments—adults 7, senior 9, junior 9, beginners 12; visitors 5; total attendance, 47. Collection, $1.26. Chapters reported read the past week, 504. Chapters read the past month, 2,099.

The Seniors or the Royal Champion Winners' class held their annual class meeting at the home of Rev. and Mrs. W. P. Martin with their daughter, one of the members, Miss Pauline. The meeting was opened with singing, then reports were read by the officers. Class questions were read by Miss Pauline Martin. Those answering the most questions and receiving the prizes were Miss Mary J. Martin and Mr. Royal S. Setzer. One new member, Mr. Norman Austin, was added to the class which now has 12 members. After the meeting was closed Mrs. W. P. Martin served lemonade.

Lebanon Church, High Point.—Since the last report from Lebanon the work has been moving along nicely. Our church has just been painted outside (roof and woodwork) which adds greatly to the appearance. Recently the Christian Endeavorers held a sunshine meeting at the Guilford Tubercular Sanatorium.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society

held its regular monthly meeting on Wednesday evening, May 27. The society has decided to support a native worker in India.

Notwithstanding the fact that the weather has been extremely warm and the community has been visited by the mumps, the attendance has been good at both Sunday school and church services.

Shelby.—Our Sunday school continues to grow. We had a slight increase in attendance last Sunday. One man came who said he had never attended our Sunday school before. Some of our young men who have not been attending were present.

The morning church service was attended by a larger congregation than usual. We have had encouraging attendance at all of our services for the past two Sundays.

On Wednesday night of last week we held a short business meeting of the church in connection with the prayer service. The purpose of the business meeting was to decide whether the Shelby church would respond to the appeal of the budget council for a payment on the annual conference budget. The matter was presented by the pastor and after some discussion it was decided to put on a canvass to raise some of the A. C. B. A committee was selected, composed of Mrs. J. T. Ramsey and Mrs. C. B. Way, to solicit donations. The committee made a splendid start in their canvass. Mrs. Ramsey was not present last Sunday to report the results of her canvass, but Mrs. Way reported $30 already collected. This amount is being sent to the conference treasurer and the committee will continue their canvass during the remainder of this month in an effort to secure the entire amount of our apportionment of the A. C. B. Of the $30 secured by Mrs. Way only about $8 was contributed by members of our church.

In the business meeting last week it was stated that the finances of our church were considerably behind, especially on the pastor's salary. The stewards were called upon to bestir themselves in bringing the finances more nearly up to date.

The children of the Sunday school are meeting regularly for the practice of the Children's Day service which will be held on the fourth Sunday night. Those in charge of training the children for the service have thought best to postpone the service for one week. The original plan was to have the service the third Sunday night. Mrs. Thomas McFarland has been training the children for the service.

This pastor regrets very much his inability to attend the sessions of the Pastors' Summer Conference and the Young People's Summer Conference at the High Point College which began this week. It is the first time in a number of years that we have not met with the brethren in the Pastors' Summer Conference. We could not make the trip to High Point because of the lack of funds, the church here being more than two months behind with the salary. We greatly desired to attend the sessions of both conferences, and while absent in body we have a sincere interest and concern for the success of the conference and our prayers are with those who have attended and are now attending the conference. This pastor is convinced that he has been deprived of many blessings of fellowship, recreation and valuable instruction gained in the summer conferences, but we are compelled to submit to the unfavorable circumstances (financially) which surround us at this time.

The congregation at the night service last Sunday was about as large as usual. We had some visitors in the service. The absence of several members of the Christian Endeavor society reduced the size of the congregation. These Christian Endeavorers attended the Christian Endeavor meeting at the M. P. church in Lincolnton.

Next Sunday will be regular. The pastor has announced a special subject for the night service. He will speak on "The Call to Higher Service." This will be the sermon on the call to the ministry which each pastor is required to preach during the year.

C. B. Way, Pastor.

Tabernacle Church.—Rev. T. P. McCulloch preached Sunday at Tabernacle church from the thirteenth chapter of Acts. He preaches every second Sunday. We wish to thank Brother McCulloch for giving so much of his thought and time to us.

We will hold our Children's Day services the first Sunday in July.

We wish to extend our thanks and appreciation to Mrs. J. Henry Coble and family for the beautiful vase with the inscription: "To hold flowers for the Master," which was presented Tabernacle church in memory of Mr. J. Henry Coble.

The Christian Endeavor prayer meeting was held at four P. M. Sunday. The subject was "Leadership: Its Price and Its Rewards," and was led by Miss Mary Barrow. The subject for June 21 is "A Hurdle Race," the leader will be Mrs. E. T. Coble.

We are expecting to hear the wedding bells ringing out soon.

Mrs. E. T. Coble,
Reporter for C. E. Society.

Henderson.—Not much out of the ordinary has taken place in our services for the past few Sundays. Our young people have been very busy with their school work and with commencement exercises. And we are glad to say that we are still developing orators down this way. Our young brother Lawrence Harris, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Harris, and T. J. Garrett, Jr., both won declaimers' medals in the commencement exercises. Miss Doris Ellis and Miss Thelma Finch graduated from the high school this year. Misses Catherine and Margaret Hight graduated from the N. C. C. W. in Greensboro, while Henry Fox graduated from N. C. State in Raleigh. We rejoice with all these young people in the completion of their work and wish for them much success in life.

Misses Helen Hight and Eleanor Young and Mrs. Pritchard will attend the Young People's Conference this week, while the writer will attend the Pastors' Conference.

We will have our regular services as usual next Sunday.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

THE THREE LITTLE ALLIGATORS.

Once upon a time there were three little alligators and a big daddy alligator. They lived in a place called Florida.

Now one day the three little alligators were playing all alone on the sunny sandy beach. Along came a little colored boy with a basket. The little colored boy's name was Rastus. As soon as he saw the three little alligators he caught them and put them in his basket. The basket had a cover, so that the three little alligators could not get out, although they tried as hard as they could.

Rastus rested quite often, and as he had not done so for an hour, he decided to lie down and take a nap. But just then the old daddy alligator came swimming along to find the little baby alligators. He walked right up close to Rastus, and not knowing what to say, he just coughed a little.

Rastus turned his head, saw the old daddy alligator, and then he ran as fast as he could to his mother.

The old daddy alligator saw the basket and decided to take it home as a present to Mrs. Alligator. But just then a funny thing happened. You see there were holes in the bottom of the basket, and the feet of the little alligators came right through. As they walked the basket moved right along up the sandy beach.

"Gracious!" said the old daddy alligator. "Never before did I see a basket walk. What do you s'pose makes it?"

He followed the basket, which walked along up the beach rather slowly. He decided to take the basket home right away, so he put it on his rough scaly back and swam home.

"See what I have brought you," he said to Mrs. Alligator. "Here is a queer basket that walks right along." And when he put it on the floor it did walk right along.

"Well! well!" said Mrs. Alligator, "how queer! Let us open the the basket and see what is inside." They carefully opened the basket and out jumped the three little alligators.—Selected.

REASONED VERSUS AN UNREASONED FAITH.

A brother recently expressed doubt as to the value of certain studies pursued in schools of theology, especially those studies that have to do with investigating the grounds of our faith. He was quite sure that ministers should not disturb their people by referring to the doubts and questions raised by skeptics.

This raises a serious question. The brother who believes is certainly right in his view that it is outside the minister's province to awaken doubts and fears regarding the foundations of Christianity. But he must remember that a people's minds are open to suggestions from many sources. Skepticism finds many organs of expression. It takes on the appearance of respectability and makes an appeal that is especially strong to the young and inexperienced. Shall the pastor ignore this fact? If he does, he is likely to lose his hold on them. And if he tries to answer argument with mere sneers, he will fail of his end. The only course open to the pastor seems to be to study thoroughly and profoundly and answer questions with better reason.

Christianity will stand the searchlight of the strongest reason. Our faith should be well grounded, our hope should be anchored within the veil and every minister especially should always be ready to answer those who ask a reason for the hope that is in him.

"He drew a circle that shut me out;
Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout,
But Love and I had the wit to win,—
We drew a circle that took him in."

—On June 10, after twenty years of negotiation, the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches of Canada became the United Church of Canada.

—Referring to the union of Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches in Canada, Rev. Richard Roberts writes: "There have been unions of Presbyterian groups before this, and there have been unions of Methodist groups. But not yet has there been a union of Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists. It is a new thing in the world, and a bold thing. Presbyterians and Methodists have been separated by a doctrinal emphasis; the former followed John Calvin and the latter Arminius. And the difference was at bottom about the relative places of God and man in the business of man's salvation. Arminius gave more room to the human agent than Calvin with his doctrine of Divine Sovereignty could. But nowadays we see that the whole of God and the whole of man are to be engaged in the task of redemption."

WILL OUR PEOPLE REALIZE?

We mean will they realize the need, pressing need, compelling need of money to meet the obligations of High Point College? Please read on page 5 what Brother J. Norman Wills says about it. He is in a position to be keenly distressed if we do not respond to the call. He has given freely of his time and his money, and wishes to make High Point College the beneficiary of the savings of his life-time. Gratitude to him should move us to come to his relief in this emergency, if we cared nothing for the college. But surely every man of us wants High Point College to go on and to go on successfully. Just what can YOU do to help at this time?

—Brother Wills reports this week an increase in receipts for College. Thanks to those who have so promptly paid.

—Professor Forelines recently visited Palestine. He gave an illustrated lecture on his trip at the Pastors' and Young People's conferences at High Point College last week.

—There were several hundred people at High Point College last Friday. Rev. Fred Baylis's address was much enjoyed. It was a moving address, too. In response to it 28 young people went forward and gave him their hands as a token of their consecration to Christian service wherever and however Christ may direct.

—Richard Lee Ogburn, son of Brother J. B. Ogburn, of Flat Rock church, was graduated from Western Maryland College this year. We congratulate him.

EVANGELISM.

The regular summer revival season is near at hand, and many of us are preparing for an intensive evangelistic effort. It is not a debatable question as to whether our earnestness and intensity should be more pronounced during the special revival season than at all other times. We have gotten the habit of shifting the emphasis from one objective to another. The one superlative thought, or thing, that we emphasize with intense earnestness in midsummer should be emphasized in midwinter with a like degree of earnestness.

This writer believes that the church and the kingdom are suffering as a result of misplaced emphasis. I am not ready to say that service and sacrifice are overemphasized; but will say that a very vital point is not receiving the attention and emphasis necessary to make it appealing to men. A great deal is being said from the pulpit these days concerning sin. Mental pictures of the darkest hues are being painted, depicting various phases of sin, and sin's attendant results. I am not contending that the picture is unmeritably black. But is there not a brighter and better side that is not adequately revealed? I doubt very seriously if we ever get very far in our effort to raise a higher standard of morals by continually and unmercifully condemning bobbed hair, the public swimming pool, the dance and certain other things.

Where, you ask, should the emphasis be; or, upon what? Jesus said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." The key to successful evangelism is in the verse quoted, namely: The uplifted Christ. When we properly present, emphasize, and magnify the uplifted Christ, men will come from the east, the west, the north and the south, and falling at His feet will beg to do Him reverence. Our task then is to make real the cross and the Christ. Our theme should ever be, "The Uplifted Christ."

DETERMINED BY THOUGHT.

A man's thought determines the moral climate of his life, and will settle the question whether his conduct is to be poisonous marsh or fertile meadow, fragrant garden or barren sand. The pose of the mind determines the disposition, and will settle whether a man shall soar with angels in the heavenlies or wallow with swine in the mire. What we think about the things that are greatest will determine how we do the things that are least. What are your primary thoughts about God? The prints of those thoughts will be found in your courtesies, in your intercourse, in the common relationships of life, in the government of commerce, in the control of the body, and in all the affairs of home and market and field.—J. H. Jowett, D.D.

"GOD GIVE US MEN."

Five Splendid Fellows.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

Pastor Lippincott was in a reminiscent mood. He is not old and is far from being loquacious. He has been and is now a close observer of people. His memory is good, he has unusual ability in setting forth the outstanding qualities of any man under discussion, and he is always kindly in his remarks.

On a warm Summer afternoon we were sitting in the shade of a wide-spreading maple, talking of men and their relations to the churches. I knew he had had wide experience in several parishes, so I said to him, "Won't you tell me of some of the men in your Deerfield parish? What sort of fellows were they, and how did you get along with them?"

"Of all the churches I have served," Pastor Lippincott began with enthusiasm, "the Deerfield church had the most interesting set of men. They were of varying types and talents. There wasn't a fossil among them. Not all of them moved as rapidly as I could have wished, but every one of them faced in the right direction—and they kept going. I shall speak of only five, there were many others."

Alfred Packard.

"I take pleasure in placing the name of Alfred Packard at the head of the list, for he was easily the foremost man in the community. I knew and respected him before I became his pastor. He was one of the responsible officers in his church, and the largest contributor. He was faithful in attendance at the services of the church, including Sundayschool and prayer-meeting. He was not talkative in meeting, but his brief prayers and remarks were from the heart, and people always listened to him with interest and profit. He had a good deal of responsibility in the management of the affairs of the church, but showed none of the 'bossiness' or the 'lordliness' sometimes indulged in by 'influential' members. He had no children, but he was very much interested in the young and served them in many ways. He was an extensive employer of men—holding the respect and loyalty of every one of them. He did quite a large business, handling considerable property. Partly because he would not drive a sharp bargain, he was not particularly successful in business. Some one said that Alfred Packard had lost money on more pieces of real estate than had any other three men in Deerfield township. He never in any way interfered with the pastor, always taking it for granted that the minister was prepared for his job and could be trusted. He listened, with evident interest and profit, to the Sunday sermons and was ready with money and personal effort to further any good local cause or missionary enterprise. I realize I haven't told much about him—you need to come into personal contact with him to get the full sense of his fine, manly, brotherly character."

David Brainard Allen.

Pastor Lippincott smiled as he spoke the next name, "David Brainard Allen." "David Brainard," he said, "was the name of the first missionary to the Indians in Massachusetts, and Mr. Allen was very proud to bear it. He had become a school-teacher, manager of a store, instructor in a state-penitentiary, a farmer and a fruit grower. But along with and above all these occupations, he was a Sunday-school man. Through nearly all the history of the Deerfield Sunday school he had been its superintendent, until he took work in connection with the State Sunday School Association. It was his meat and drink to prepare the lesson and conduct the exercises of the school. He was great at making Bible history charts, fixing dates and connecting periods. Some of these charts were quite ingenious. They were not always convincing, sometimes they failed to communicate the life that is in the word. But, on the whole, the school was very effective—both from the educational stand-point and as a means of spiritual instruction and growth. I think I have never seen any one conduct the lesson review so well as Mr. Allen managed it. 'What do we get out of this lesson?' was frequently the first question of the superintendent. Almost always a fitting answer readily came from pupil or teacher. Members of the men's class often responded, and the pastor sometimes had a brief word. Opinions differed, no one spoke at length, all were full of the lesson, just a word gave one's idea and the hearers could easily judge of its value and place it where it belonged among their own thoughts on the subject. I think Mr. Allen had the Bible and the Sunday school on his heart all the time—it will be better for our churches when there is at least one such man in every congregation."

Truman Lamson.

"When I have occasion to speak of a man who has achieved a fine character and an honorable standing in his community—coming up from small beginnings and through great hardships and discouraging difficulties—I think at once of Truman Lamson. He was a neglected child. While still small he sustained an injury to one of his hips. A simple operation would have repaired the damage. His father did nothing about it; so the boy was lame all the rest of his life. His early moral and religious training was neglected. But notwithstanding his handicaps, he secured a fairly good education, and became a fine Christian man, an officer in the church, respected and honored wherever he was known. All this came about because of two things: he married the right girl, and he tied himself up to the church. His wife taught him to read, he became an exceptionally good pen-man and was an effective speaker in any church or community gathering. Being a Christian herself, she led him to the church. He worked for Alfred Packard for several years, coming thus under the strong influence of his Christian and churchly character. The Deerfield church has been fortunate in having a succession of well-educated pastors. Their preaching has been on a high level of intellectuality that has built up the thoughtfulness of the people. Mr. Lamson attended the services faithfully, heard good ideas well expressed, got into the habit of taking broad-minded views of things, read rather extensively for one of his opportunities, and learned to think for himself. He became a successful business man, was generous in the use of his money, never forgot the debt he owed to his wife and to the church. When he died at the age of thirty-eight, a large place was left vacant in the home, in the church, and in the community."

Rev. Levi P. Spelman.

"When I thought of going to the Deerfield church I was not very enthusiastic over the fact that a former pastor of that church had returned to make his home in the parish. I had heard that it was possible for a retired ex-pastor to become a very active thorn-in-the-flesh. I adopted the plan of going softly for a while, until I got the lay of the land. There is so much material of a constructive, helpful sort that a new pastor does not need to take texts or subjects having special controversial possibilities. The new voice will, for a time at least, make interesting even old themes and views. After the church comes to feel that the new minister loves God and is devoted to the study and preaching of His word, the people are quite willing to grant him freedom. He may interpret the Scriptures and apply their teachings in accordance with the light that has come in the course of his prayerful study—and they will follow him with profit. One day Mr. Spelman and I were in conversation when he remarked that some people were inclined to be afraid of the newer views concerning the Bible and theological teaching. Then he added quite modestly, 'But I like them, they are of real value to the Christian life.' That sounded good to me. Old age is not always reactionary. Sometimes it is thoroughly open-minded. I was glad it was so in this case. During all the years of my pastorate there I found the soul of this good father in Israel open to all the refreshing winds of truth from whatever direction they blew. He taught a Bible-class, took a modest part in the prayer meeting, only occasionally consenting to have a part in a public meeting. He was much interested in families, and out of that grew a suggestion for which I have always been grateful. 'Why not make an effort to complete our church families?' he suggested. We went at it. A husband, coming into the church, completed his family. A son or a daughter added to the church in other cases completed their families. A father and their son and daughter in their teens, and a small boy of eight years—a whole family—came in together. It was a fine piece of work—a blessing thus came to the church."

Frank E. Rood.

I knew that Pastor Lippincott had been called to Deerfield recently for the funeral of a very dear friend. I wondered if the name of that friend would be the last on the list of the five men of whom he was to speak. It was.

"Only a few weeks ago," he began, "I officiated at the funeral of one of my best friends—Frank Rood. I am glad to speak of him in connection with these others, for he was one of the younger men in the Deerfield church when I began my pastorate there 25 years ago. He and I were about the same age. He had six children, I had four. My two boys and two of his were together a great deal of the time. I camped with these boys, and others, in the woods by the big lake, and none of us have ever forgotten the experience. Frank Rood's early life was very different from that of Truman Lamson, his friend and business partner. He was born and brought up in a fine Christian home. He united with the church while still a young boy, early became an officer, grew up interested in the local church and in great missionary enterprises—an uncle spent forty years as a missionary in Africa, thus binding the interest of the whole family to that sort of work. I admired my friend's steadfastness in the path of duty, his faithfulness to the details of life, his bindness, his persistent interest in good things, his confidence in good people and his hopefulness for those who had not yet attained a worthy standing in the community. There had been every opportunity for him to become priggishly 'pious,' but his religion was of the natural, wholesome sort. He had had no experience as a 'tough' boy; he had sowed no "wild oats," yet he was thoroughly sympathetic with those who had been wayward. He saw how some men and women reach a worth-while character through darkness and difficulty, and he wanted to cheer them on the way toward the light. He was already to believe the better report concerning any person, and to hope for the best. His last illness was prolonged, and he knew for months that there was no possibility of recovery. During the last few months before the end I was in his home several times—glad to be living within a few miles of my old parish. 'It is good of you, Mr. Lippincott,' he said one day, 'to come to our home as you do. You seem to belong to us, and I hope you will run in whenever you can. When the time comes I want you to have charge of the funeral. I know you better than I know any other minister, and you know me and my family better than does any one else. So I am sure all of us want you to come and say the things that will be in your heart at that time.' Of course I would do as he desired. In some ways it seemed hard for him to leave his good wife and six children, all married and away from home except the youngest, a daughter. But there were no distressing farewells when he put out to sea. One of the sons came home to help care for his father the last few months. Would that every man could have such a strong, tender, cheerful and faithful son to minister to him in his last sickness."

"But, Mr. Lippincott," I remarked, "these are all mature men. You have had experience with boys and young men, have you not?"

"Yes, indeed," he replied, brushing the film from in front of his eyes. "But that will have to be another story."

SKIPPER TOM'S COD TRAP.

By Dillon Wallace.

A story for boys. Dillon Wallace wrote a book entitled, "Life of Dr. Grenfell," for boys.

By permission of the author a chapter from this book is reproduced.

Skipper Tom lived, and for aught I know still lives, at Red Bay, a little settlement on the Straits of Belle Isle, some sixty miles to the westward of Battle Harbor.

Along the southern coast of Labrador the cabins are much closer together than on the east coast, and there are some small settlements in the bays and harbors, with snug little painted cottages.

Red Bay, where Skipper Tom lived, is one of these settlements. It boasts a neat little Methodist chapel, built by the fishermen and trappers from lumber cut in the nearby forest, and laboriously sawn into boards with the bit-saw.

Skipper Tom lived in one of the snugest and cosiest of the cottages. I remember the cottage and I remember Skipper Tom well. I happened into the settlement one evening directly ahead of a winter blizzard, and Skipper Tom and his good family opened their little home to me and sheltered me with a hospitable, cordial welcome for three days, until the weather cleared and the dogs could travel again, and I pushed forward on my journey.

Skipper Tom stood an inch or two above six feet in his moccasins. He was a broad-shouldered, strong-limbed man of the wilderness and the sea. His face was kindly and gentle, but at the same time reflected firmness, strength and thoughtfulness. When he spoke you were sure to listen, for there was always the conviction that he was about to utter some word of wisdom, or tell you something of importance. The moment you looked at him and heard his voice you said to yourself: "Here is a man upon whom I can place absolute confidence."

If Skipper Tom promised to do anything, he did it, unless Providence intervened. If he said he would not do a thing, he would not do it, and you could depend upon it. He was a man of his word. That was Skipper Tom—big straight-spoken, and as square as any man that ever lived. That is what his neighbors said of him, and that is the way Dr. Grenfell found him.

Now and again the Methodist missionary visited Red Bay in his circuit of the settlements, and when he came he made his headquarters in the home of Skipper Tom. On the occasion of these visits he conducted services in the chapel on Sunday, and on week days visited every home in Red Bay. Skipper Tom was class leader, and looked after the religious welfare of the little community, presiding over his class in the chapel on the great majority of Sundays when the missionary was engaged elsewhere.

The people looked up to Skipper Tom. The folk of Red Bay, like most people who live much in the open and close to nature, have a deep religious reverence and a wholesome fear of God. As their class leader, Skipper Tom guided them in their worship, and they looked upon him as an example of upright living. So it was that he had a great burden of responsibility, with the morals of the community thrust upon him.

In one respect Skipper Tom was fortunate. He did not inherit a debt, and all his life he had kept free from the truck system under which his neighbors toiled hopelessly, year in and year out.

He had in one way or another, picked up enough education to read and write and figure. He could read and interpret his Bible and he could calculate his accounts. He knew that two times two make four. If he sold two hundred quintals of fish at $2.25 a quintal, he knew that $450 were due him. No trader had a mortgage upon the product of his labor, as they had upon that of his neighbors, and he was free to sell his fur and fish to whoever would pay him the highest price.

To be sure there were seasons when Skipper Tom was hard put to it to make ends meet, and a scant diet and a good many hardships fell to his lot and to the lot of his family. And when he had enough and his neighbors were in need, he denied himself to see others through, and even pinched himself to do it.

But he saved bit by bit until, at the age of 45, he was able to purchase a cod trap, which was valued at about $400. The purchase of this cod trap had been the ambition of his life and we can imagine his joy when finally the day came that brought it to him. It made more certain his catch of cod, and therefore lessened the possibility of winters of privation.

It is interesting to know how the fishermen of the Labrador catch cod. It may be worth while also to explain that when the Labradorian or Newfoundlander speaks of "fish" he means cod. In his vocabulary a trout is a trout, a salmon is a salmon and a caplin is a caplin, but a cod is a fish. He never thinks of anything as fish but cod.

Early in the season, directly the ice breaks up, a little fish called the caplin, which is about the size of a selt, runs inshore in great schools of countless millions to spawn. I have seen then lying in windrows along the shore where the receding tide had left them high and dry upon the land. This is a great time for the dogs, which feast upon them and grow fat. It is a great time also for the cod, which feed on the caplin, and for the fishermen who catch the cod. Cod follow the caplinschools, and this is the season when the fisherman, if he is so fortunate as to own a trap, reaps his greatest harvest.

The trap is a net with four sides and a bottom, but no top. It is like a great room without a ceiling. One one side is a door or opening. The trap is submerged a hundred yards or so from shore, at a point where the caplin, with the cod at their heels, are likely to run in. A net attached to the trap at the center of the door is stretched to the nearest shore.

Like a flock of geese that follows the old gander, cod follow their leaders. When the leaders pilot the school in close to shore in pursuit of the caplin, they encounter the obstructing net, then follow along its side with the purpose of going around it. This leads them into the trap. Once into the trap they remain there until the fishermen haul their catch.

The fisherman who owns no trap must rely upon the hook and line. Though sometimes hook and line fishermen meet with good fortune, the results are much less certain than with the traps and the work much slower and vastly more difficult.

When the water is not too deep, jigging with unbaited hooks proves successful when fish are plentiful. Two large hooks fastened back to back, with lead to act as a sinker, serve the purpose. This double hook at the end of the line is dropped over the side of the boat and lowered until it touches the bottom. Then it is raised about three feet, and from this point "jigged" or raised and lowered continuously until taken by a cod.

In deep water, however, bait is necessary, and the squid is a favorite bait. A squid is a baby octopus, or "devil-fish." The squid is caught by jigging up and down a lead weight filled with wire spikes and painted bright red. It seizes the weight with its tentacles. When raised into the boat it releases its hold and squirts a small stream of black inky fluid. In the water, when attacked, this inky fluid discolors the water and screens it from its enemy.

The octopus grows to immense size, with many long arms. Two Newfoundlanders were once fishing in an open boat when an octopus attacked the boat, reaching for it with two enormous arms, with the purpose of dragging it down. One of the fishermen seized an ax that lay handy in the boat and chopped the arms off. The octopus sank and all the sea about was made black with its screen of ink. The sections of arms cut off were nineteen feet in length. They are still on exhibition in the St. John's Museum, where I have seen them many times. Shortly afterward a dead octopus was found, measuring with tentacles spread, forty feet over all. It was not, however, the same octopus which attacked the fishermen, for that must have been much larger.

We can understand, then, how much Skipper Tom's cod trap meant to him. The trap was, to a large extent, insurance against privation and hardship. It was his reward for the self-denial of himself and his family for years, and represented his life's savings.

When at last the ice cleared from his fishing place and the trap was set, there was no prouder or happier man on the Labrador than Skipper Tom. The trap was in the water when the "Princess May," one Saturday afternoon, steamed into Red Bay and Doctor Grenfell accepted the hospitable invitation of Skipper Tom to spend the night at his home.

It was still early in the season and icebergs were plentiful enough, as, indeed, they are the whole summer long. They are always a menace to cod traps, for should a berg drift against a trap, that will be the end of the trap forever. Fishermen watch their traps closely, and if an iceberg comes near so as to threaten it the trap must be removed to save it. A little lack of watchfulness leads to ruin.

"The trap's well set," said Skipper Tom, when Doctor Grenfell inquired concerning it. "The ice is keepin' clear, but I watches close."

"What are the signs of fish?" asked the Doctor.

"Fine!" said Skipper Tom. "The signs be wonderful fine."

"I hope you'll have a big year."

"There's a promise of un," Skipper Tom grinned happily. "The trap's sure to do fine for us."

But nobody knows from one day to another what will happen on the Labrador.

According to habit Skipper Tom was up bright and early on Sunday morning and went for a look at the trap. When presently he returned to join Doctor Grenfell at breakfast, he was plainly worried.

"There's a berg driftin' down on the trap. We'll have to take her in," he announced.

"But 'tis Sunday," exclaimed his wife. "You'll never be working on Sunday."

"Aye, 'tis Sunday and 'tis against my principles to fish on the Sabbath day. I never did before, but 'tis to save our cod trap now. The lads and I'll not fish. We'll just haul the trap."

"The Lord'll forgive that whatever," agreed his wife.

Skipper Tom went out when he had eaten, but it was not long until returned.

"I'm not goin' to haul the trap today," he said quietly and decisively. "There are those in this harbor," he added, turning to Doctor Grenfell, "Who would say, if I hauled that trap, that 'twould be no worse for them to fish on Sunday than for me to haul my trap. Then they'd go fishin' Sundays the same as other days, and none of un would keep Sunday any more as a day of rest, as the Lord intends us to keep un, and has told us in His own words we must keep un. I'll not haul the trap this day, though 'tis sore hard to lose un."

For a principle, and because he was well aware of his influence upon the folk of the settlement, Skipper Tom had made his decision to sacrifice his cod trap and the earnings of his lifetime. His conscience told him it would be wrong to do a thing that might lead others to do wrong. When our conscience tells us it is wrong to do a thing, it is wrong for us to do it. Conscience is the voice of God. If we disobey our conscience God will soon cease to speak to us through it. This is the way every criminal in the world began his downward career. He disobeyed his conscience, and continued to disobey it until he no longer heard it.

Skipper Tom never disobeyed his conscience. Now the temptation was strong. His whole life's savings were threatened to be swept away. There was still time to save the trap.

But Skipper Tom was strong. He turned his back upon the cod trap and the iceberg and temptation, and as he and Doctor Grenfell climbed the hill to the chapel he greeted his neighbors calmly and cheerily.

Every eye in Red Bay was on Skipper Tom that day. Every person knew of the cod trap and its danger, and all that it meant to Skipper Tom, and the temptation Skipper Tom was facing; but from an outward appearance he had dismissed the cod trap and the iceberg from his mind.

When dusk fell that night the iceberg was almost upon the cod trap.

At an early hour on Sunday evening Skipper Tom went to his bed as usual, and it is quite probable that within a period of ten minutes after his head rested upon his pillow he was sleeping peacefully. There was nothing else to do. He had no doubt that his cod trap was lying under the iceberg, a hopeless wreck.

Well, what of it? In any case he had acted as his conscience had had him act. He knew that there were those who would say that his conscience was over-sensitive. Perhaps it was, but it was his conscience, not theirs. He was class leader in the chapel. He never forgot that. And he was the leading citizen of the settlement. At whatever cost, he must needs prove a good example to his neighbors in his deeds. Worry would not help the case in the least. Too much of it would incapacitate him. He had lived forty-four years without a cod trap, and he had not starved, and he could finish his days without one.

"The Lord will take care of us," Skipper Tom often said when they were in a tight pinch, but he always added, "If we does our best to make the best of things and look after ourselves and the things the Lord gives us to do with. He calls on us to do that."

Though Skipper Tom could scarce see how his trap might have escaped destruction he had no intention of resting upon that supposition, and perhaps he still entertained a lingering hope that it had escaped. There is no doubt he prayed for its preservation, and he had strong faith in prayer. At any rate, at half past eleven o'clock that night he was up and dressed, and routed his two sons out of their beds. At the stroke of midnight, waiting a tick longer perhaps, to be quite sure that Sunday had gone and Monday morning had arrived, he and his sons pushed out in their big boat.

Skipper Tom would not be doing his best if he did not make certain of what had actually happened to the cod trap. Every one in Red Bay said it had been destroyed, and no doubt of that. But no one knew for a certainty, and there might have been an intervention of Divine Providence.

"The Lord helped us to get that trap," said Skipped Tom, "and 'tis hard to believe He'll take un away from us so soon, for I tried not to be vain about un, only just a bit proud of un and glad I has un. If He's took un from me I'll know 'twere to try my faith, and I'll never complain."

Down they ran toward the iceberg, whose polished surface gleamed white in the starlight.

"She's right over where the trap were set! The trap's gone," said one of the sons.

"I'm doubtin'," Skipper Tom was measuring the distance critically with his eye.

"The trap's tore to pieces," insisted the son with discouragement in his voice.

"The berg's to the lee'ard of she," declared Skipper Tom finally.

" 'Tis too close t' shore."

" 'Tis to the lee'ard!"

"Is you sure now, Pop?"

"The trap's safe and sound! The berg is t' the lee'ard!"

Tom was right. A shift of tide had come at the right moment to save the trap.

"The Lord is good to us," breathed Skipper Tom. "He've saved our trap! He always takes care of them that does what they feels is right. We'll thank the Lord, lads."

In the trap was a fine haul of cod, and when they had removed the fish the trap was transferred to a new position where it would be quite safe until the menacing iceberg had drifted away.—Selected.

EMERGENCY FINANCIAL STATEMENT
HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

The special session of the North Carolina Conference, held in High Point on Tuesday, June 9, directed me to prepare a concise state-ment showing the condition of the college, as to its assets and liabilities.
The folowing statement shows all assets ex-cept a small amount of cash on hand. The available cash balance today is less than $1,-000. A final statement has not yet been re-ceived from the contractors for dormitories and boiler house so the exact amount due them cannot be determined. Other than that the statement is accurate.

The members of the Conference provided a note for $45,000, payable to the contractors, which I hope to be able to use. This note will be due November 1, and it will be absolutely necessary that we raise the money to pay it by that time. $5,000 was promised by friends, and I am hoping that the balance can be pro-vided by High Point contributors, though I have yet no definite assurance regarding what may be expected from that source.
It should, however, be made clear that there is a pressing need of money, and all who can make payments on their pledges, even though the amount may not be due, will greatly aid the instiution by so doing. We have no other source to which we can look for money with which to meet the pressing requirements, ex-cept our own people.
Very respectfully, J. Norman Wills,
Treasurer.

LETTER FROM TREASURER WILLS.

Greensboro, N. C., June 20, 1925.
Rev. J. F. McCulloch,
Asheboro Street,
Greensboro, N. C.
Dear Brother:
I enclose a few copies of our emergency financial statement, as directed by the spe-cial session of the Annual Conference. I think, however, some further explanation is re-quired.
Pressing Requirements: It is imperative that we have in hand by July 23—$21,500, on August 1—$1,927.60, and during the next few weeks, to meet special notes—$6,300.

Insurance Premiums: These, amounting to $14,873.44, fall due from July 3 to December 20. The bulk of the amount, however, is due during the month of August. In order to pro-vide for these, pledges and collections for the insurance endowment should be pressed.
Amount Due Contractors: While I have not listed this amount among the pressing require-ments, it is perhaps the most pressing of all. I have as yet been able to make no arrange-ments with the contractors, as they have not agreed to accept the note for $45,000, and no steps have been taken as yet to make the bal-ance on High Point's pledge available, either now or in October.
You will see, therefore, that it is extremely important that our own people do everything possible to aid us in this emergency.
Yours sincerely, J. Norman Wills.

—The Committee on Goodwill between Jews and Christians reports a spontaneous springing up of demonstrations of goodwill in a score or more of American cities. These demonstrations take the form of various relig-ious groups, in behalf of better understanding. They have been attended in all, by many thousands of people.

PLENTY OF TIME, BUT BETTER HURRY.

Lots of folks are heeding my suggestion that there is still ample time to arrange to hold a children's day service, and are sending in their orders for the free supplies, and you ought to do the same, if you have not already secured them, brother superintendent.

Many schools have not been accustomed to hold children's day service, and may have the idea that it takes much time and effort to prepare for it, as the music is new, but it is easy and pleasing, and if it is found impossible to have the school learn it by the time you wish to hold the service, you can use hymns in the book you have.

We are most anxious for every Sunday-school to get the supplies, because the music pamphlets contain latest information about our missionary work in Japan, China, and India, the recitations, etc., are excellent, and the two large illustrated posters have fine pictures of all our church's missionaries and of many other workers, and of buildings, students, etc., and would grace the walls of the school room.

All the supplies are sent to our Sunday schools free of charge and all that is necessary is to send a postal to Rev. Fred C. Klein, Berwyn, Md., and your order will have immediate attention.

Please attend to the matter at once, and you will render a service to your Sunday school, Brother Superintendent, which will be appreciated by all, and will place your school in the front rank where it ought always to be, and also help the Union Board to take care of the growing foreign missionary work of your own church.

Splendid reports are reaching us of the children's day services which have already been held in different parts of the church, and the offerings indicate that our people generally are appreciating the opportunity of taking an active part in celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the children's day service and in honoring the memory of Rev. F. T. Tagg who introduced it in 1885 by larger gifts than last year.

We sincerely trust that all the Sunday-schools will exert themselves to the utmost to secure the largest possible offering, because the Union Board is in great need of funds, for the Nagoya church has been started, the one for those 1,100 students at Nagoya College, and the surrounding community, and other pressing demands are upon the Board and must be met.

Among the nice letters which we have received expressing appreciation of the service held is one just to hand from our good brother H. D. Moore, of Conley, Georgia, "We had a splendid children's day at Cedar Grove church on Sunday. Our collection was $43. We had one of the happiest-looking congregations that ever met at our little church (in the country), seemed full of the spirit of thankfulness, and gave liberally. Hope you are having fine collections at all the churches."

Remember that every Sunday school which contributes for foreign missions fifty dollars or more will receive—while our supply lasts—a set of fine pictures, 7x14 inches, describing India, or a set of those covered by the title, "The Call of the World."

Remember, too, that we have ordered in Japan two more of the beautiful embroidered banners which will be awarded, one to the school contributing the largest amount for foreign missions, and the other to the school contributing the largest amount in proportion to membership, and be sure to give the membership of your school when sending the offering to your conference treasurer, or we cannot award it properly.

Send your order, hold the service, make the largest possible offering, and gladden the hearts of our missionaries and native workers.

Fred. C. Klein.

ON TO COLLEGE.

"Can I give you a lift?" said a motorist one day in early September to a boy in humble apparel, with a pack on his back, trudging along the roadway in the Ozark Mountains. The boy turned a grateful face toward him.

"Sure!" And he jumped into the machine. "Thank you, sir."

"Where are you going?" asked the motorist.

"I'm going to college!"

The tourist, startled, questioned the frank-faced country lad as they journeyed along. He found out that the boy was headed for the College of the Ozarks, at Clarksville, Arkansas, nearly two hundred and fifty miles distant. He had set out on foot to secure an education. He was determined to go to college; therefore distance meant nothing to him. If you really want to go to college difficulties will not stop you.

If you have just graduated from high school and have a compelling desire to continue your education in a school of higher learning, but are restrained by the notion that you cannot meet the expenses of college training, read this:

A boy graduated from high school with first honors, which gave him a four-year scholarship to the state university. His father said: "It won't be of any use, as we can't afford to send him to college." His mother said, "It will, for he is going to college." That settled it!

Among his graduation presents were checks amounting to twenty-five dollars, which his mother told him to deposit as the nest egg for his college fund.

He had always helped with the work around home, so he applied for a job as carpenter's helper where his father was working, and for three months he went with his father to work six days out of the week, saving every dollar he made. By the time school opened in September he had saved enough to make the first advance payment on his room rent, books, and other expenses.

But some one may say, "I did not win a scholarship." Even that is not necessary if you have determination and pluck. A girl in the freshman class of a Western college wrote: "Last summer I worked extra in a department store and saved every penny I could possibly spare. The clothes I bought were few but substantial. I was the happiest person in the world when I deposited my first fifty dollars. It seemed almost a thousand to me; and how carefully I spent it!"

Although it is well to have the first year's expenses in hand or planned for, boys and girls have seemingly done the impossible. Take a young Russian for example. He landed in Seattle with fifty dollars in his pocket. He went to the Washington State College. With the aid of the Russian Student Fund and odd jobs ranging from dish-washing to potato-digging, from peddling razors to blacking boots, he gained his education.

"Often I had to go without dinner and supper," he says. "I do not mention breakfast. As I turn the pages of my diary, I see the following remarks, 'I did not have my dinner today.' The statement appears several times. Then there are a few blank pages. Then—'I had my dinner today!'"

Would you be willing to dress fifty orphan boys daily to get a college education? That is what two students at the University of Pennsylvania did last year every morning at an orphanage in Philadelphia. Every night they put the same orphans to bed—fifty of them, remember. They were bound to get an education. Are you?—The New Guide.

ANOTHER MARY'S SON.

(To the great painting, "The Presentation of the Virgin," by Titian, in the Academy at Venice, this little story owes its origin.)

In one of the later years before the coming of the Christ a throng of people had one day gathered about the great temple in Jerusalem. All eyes were watching the figure of a little maid upon the steps, who was going steadily upward to the Great High Priest before the temple doors. Questions of wonder were on the lips of many, while some who had pressed very near the steps were silent except for awed whispers. "It is Mary of David's line," was in their thought.

The sunlight lay upon the steps in golden flood, but about the little maid was clinging a greater radiance still. Before it many eyes became wet with tears and many a head was bowed. A deep thrill was stirring hearts to a wonderful hope as the great thought came, "It is the Promise."

Standing close to the steps and leaning eagerly forward was another child, a little dark-haired girl who also was called Mary. She looked with wondering eyes at the little Virgin and longed to touch her as she went past with her golden hair gleaming over the blue of her gown, but instead she could only watch silently. Then as the others were going away, she heard words that she did not understand—words that seemed to be full of joy to those who spoke them, while others shook their heads as if in unbelief. As she went to her home she carried what never faded from her memory, the picture of the little golden-haired girl going up the temple steps to the waiting priest above. It became to her almost a grief that she herself did not have beautiful, shining hair, and sometimes even tears and sobs would come as she wound about her head her own dark braids.

A few years passed and Mary, no longer a child, saw once again that Mary who went up the temple steps. This time the picture that she took away was of a sweet and tender face from which the beauty of a pure life shone, and the longing now grew up in her heart that her own life might be pure and sweet and strong. As the wish unfolded, a great joy wrapped within it as in the heart of a flower, unfolded too. So though she knew that her own face beneath the dark coronet of braids could never shine with beauty as that other shone, whenever the picture rose before her eyes, there, too, was the blossoming wish with joy within.

Other years went by and Mary of Jerusalem came to womanhood and wifehood. It was the time when the thoughts of the little nation of Judea were reaching into the widening ways of that great promise of Jehovah that there should come one to lead His people. Old words were rising to men's lips: "His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." How this people longed for the time when the King should be among them and the glory of His kingdom should begin!

When the strange, wonderful story was spread throughout the land of the lowly birth in Bethlehem of the child who was to be the King, there were only a few who believed, but Mary of Jerusalem was one of these. With love that had grown from those childhood days to an even greater strength than she herself had known, her thoughts went swiftly out to that young mother from whom the words had sounded forth, "My soul doth magnify the Lord," and in whose arms was now enfolded the tiny babe who was to be the Light of all the world.

Then into the life of Mary in Jerusalem also a great joy came. It was not long after the star flashed out its message and the shepherds and wise men came to worship the Child in Bethlehem, that upon her bosom also a little baby lay. Tender love beamed from her eyes as she looked into the face of her little son, and earnestly she prayed that she might be worthy of this greatest gift of life.

From a childhood through which the loving care of wise parents guided him, the little lad in Jerusalem passed into youth, in the very beginning of which he was to face the harder things of life. With the death of the father, mother and son had to enter alone into many a struggle, but while burdens pressed heavily upon them, love with its lightening power was always there. Another love there was to make a bond between them, for often the mother talked tenderly to her son of that one with whom he was of equal age, who had been born in Bethlehem to be the King.

Thus it was with the two during those years in which there were only a few tidings of the family in Nazareth. Somehow those who believed that the King was now upon the earth could wait, even though there were scoffers who called it madness to think that a workman in Nazareth could have anything to do with royal power. By many the story of the birth in Bethlehem had been set aside or even forgotten; yet there in Nazareth lived the King, going forth to daily work like other men who toiled. When stories of great wonder began to be told about this workman, Mary and her son were among those who hung intently upon every word. From the first it was noted by those around them that they did not greatly marvel; they were nearly always silent as they listened, but the light of love shone clearer in their eyes.

While there were some who followed from place to place this workman as He became a teacher of the people, the son of Mary in Jerusalem followed Him in spirit no less than they, though still he went about his daily work. At night he often went out of the city to hear more of this one who was called Jesus. Sometimes the two talked at Bethany with those who loved Him there, and all that they heard became a precious part of life.

A great wish was now making luminous this Mary's thought. It was centered in her Master and in her son, and she did not even ponder deeply how her own life might grow in beauty and in strength. The longing with her always was that her son might minister to Mary's son—and all this time the fellow workmen of that son were giving him such love and honor as few other men could win.

Many weeks passed during which Jesus was in Galilee. From there came words that brought new joy to His followers everywhere. One of the days when He came up to Jerusalem and taught the people held for Mary and her son unspeakable joy. By a sudden movement in the throng the son found himself looking directly into the face of Jesus. One word he uttered—"Master"—and the look that was his answer made all life a sweeter thing henceforth.

On the dark day of Christ's death the two followers were bowed in grief, and the shadow lay heavy upon them till there dawned the great shining day when they knew that death had been only where life met life.

He who had been their Master was now no longer upon the earth. The days of the world went on as before, yet not as before for those in whose hearts the love of Him had grown. "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know," resounded in their ears.

It was toward evening. Mary in Jerusalem was waiting in her home for the returning footsteps of her son when she saw a stranger in the doorway. A messenger with the sadness in his face of the news he had to tell, had come from the work-yard to which her son had that morning gone in the full of manhood's strength. Thither Mary was taken, and there she was led to the crushed form of him who was more to her than life itself.

This workman, comrade, follower of Him who gave His life for His friends, had with quick sight and strong arm pushed back into safety a worker at his side who was in danger from a lifted and loosening block of stone.

There was only time for a whispered word to the mother whom he loved so well, from whom the cry now rang out, "Oh, son, my son! My heart breaks!" The fellow workman who was supporting his drooping head raised him that he might use all of his ebbing strength as the mother bent over him to listen to the last words he could utter—"This other would have had to die, my mother, if I had not."

There was a moment with only sobs in it, sobs of the mother in her anguish and of the comrade who was holding the crushed body. Then a strange thing happened. Mary, raising her bowed head, held it as if she were listening to what no one else could hear, while her eyes gazed as if into a far place at something that no one else could see. Past the sightless face of her son, past the rough workman whose tears were falling on the lifeless form of this one who had been his friend, she saw the Christ's face; above the words that broke from the comrade's lips, "It was for me he gave his life," she heard the Christ's voice—"He did it unto me."

Then while bystanders cried out, "Behold, what radiance is in this woman's face! What miracle is this that grief is turned to joy?" they led her away from all that was left on earth of the son whose life had been not his own but his Master's.—Helen L. Newman, in Zion's Herald.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

A short time ago there appeared in the local papers in Ohio a copy of a resolution said to have been passed by the Board of Education in Lancaster, Ohio, in 1828. This resolution was as follows:

"You are welcome to use the school house to debate all proper questions in. But such things as railroads, and telegraphs are impossible, and rank infidelity. There is nothing in the word of God about them. If God had designed that his intelligent creatures should travel at the frightful speed of fifteen miles an hour by steam, He would have foretold it by the mouth of His holy prophets. It is the device of satan to carry the souls of the faithful down to hell."

What would that school board have said had some one ventured to predict the aeroplane, the moving picture, the transmission of electric power developed from water-falls or fuel and to be used hundreds of miles from the source of development or the radio?

We have come a long way since the passage of that Lancaster resolution. America then was a mere infant. Geographically it consisted almost entirely of the territory lying east of the Mississippi River. The Louisiana Purchase and the Florida Purchase had just been made and these vast areas were wild, undeveloped tracts. The lands lying west of these territories were unknown wastes.

The people were largely Anglo-Saxon, Scotch-Irish, with just a sprinkling of other nations from the north of Europe. Agriculture was the great industry, and almost the entire population lived in small rural settlements.

In the hundred years that have passed since that time the railroads and the telegraphs have come in spite of the trembling fears of these saints of God, and America is a different land from the one they knew. The California and Oregon country have been added to the territory. Alaska has been purchased from Russia, and Porto Rico from Spain. The Philippines have come under our control, and the population has increased to more than 110,000,000 of people. More than half the people live in cities, and while agriculture has grown by leaps and bounds, America leads the world in manufactures and commerce.

How about that inner life of visions and dreams of which we spoke in the article last week? That muddle of convictions about God and human freedom? Those ideals of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? What has happened to them?

These ideals have been fighting for existence, rather than for expansion and development. Our churches have been committed to the task of perpetuating this idealism, and of instilling it into the hearts and minds of these vast new multiplying populations, but the task has grown faster than the ability of the churches. Is it news to you that 27,000,000 of our children and young people, and 20,000,000 of their elders are without connection with religious institutions of any sort? And that 62,000,000 of our fellow citizens are absolutely unattached to any sort of religious organization? Can America maintain her spiritual leadership of the world, and allow this condition to continue? Only by a complete revivification of the spirit of the Mayflower compact, beginning, "In the name of God, Amen."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JUNE 28.

Review.

Golden Text: "Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Acts 1:8.

Lesson I. teaches that the one hundred and twenty of the first Christian church were given to much earnest, united and unceasing prayer, that in answer to their prayer the Holy Spirit was poured out in complete cleansing and wonderful power, that under this endowment of power Peter preached Jesus Christ and Him crucified, and that three thousand souls were converted and added to the church.

Lesson II. teaches that Peter, in the name, and by the power, of Jesus Christ, healed the crippled beggar at the Beautiful Gate of the temple, that this beggar gave God much glory and praise for this miracle of healing, that it is better to give service to the cause of Christ than it is to give money, and that every service faithfully given becomes an opening wedge for a much wider sphere of service.

Lesson III. teaches that the Apostles' witness of the resurrection of Jesus was attended by great power and demonstration of the Spirit, that the oneness of hearts of the early church led to their making a common fund of all their possessions, that Ananias and his wife met with sudden and tragic death for falsehood, and that all hypocrisy in the church is lying to the Holy Ghost and deserves and receives the severe judgment of Almighty God.

Lesson IV. teaches that Stephen was the most powerful and effective defender of the faith in the Jerusalem church, that the enemies of the cross, who could not answer his arguments, wreaked their vengeance by stoning him to death, that he was strengthened and encouraged to endure martyrdom by a vision of "the Son of man standing on the right hand of God," and that in his dying moments he prayed God to forgive his persecutors and murderers.

Lesson V. teaches that Daniel "purposed in his heart" to keep himself clean and "unspotted from the world," that he declined to eat such meat and drink such wine as were forbidden by the law of his God, that the substitute diet of herbs and water was conducive to better health and strength, and in response to loyalty to truth and right living on the part of Daniel and his companions, "God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom."

Lesson VI. teaches that Philip, an evangelist of large gifts and success, was commanded by the angel of the Lord to take the message of life to the treasurer of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, that in his chariot Philip explained to this seeker after truth Isaiah's prophecy of the crucified and risen Christ, and that this eunuch believed this message, was converted, and by baptism united with the church of Christ.

Lesson VII. teaches that Saul of Tarsus became the leader of the persecution of the early church, that he received letters of authority from the chief priests to arrest the Christians in Damascus and take them to Jerusalem to be punished, that near Damascus he had a vision of Jesus Christ, saying unto him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" that Saul yielded to this voice of rebuke and appeal and gave his heart to God, and that he received baptism and was filled with the Holy Ghost.

Lesson VIII. teaches that Saul began at once to preach the gospel that he had sought to destroy, that he escaped a plot to take his life, that in Jerusalem "he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus and disputed" successfully against all who opposed the doctrine of Christ, and that to escape another attempt upon his life he went to Tarsus to preach the gospel of salvation to his home people.

Lesson IX. teaches that Peter in exercising oversight of the churches of Judea came to Lydda, where there was a paralytic, named Aeneas, of eight years' standing, that in the name of Jesus Christ he restored him to vigorous health, that through the power of the same Christ Dorcas was raised to life, and that through the influence of these two miracles the gospel became the power of God unto salvation to many people in and around Lydda and Joppa.

Lesson X. teaches that Peter was taught by a thrice-repeated vision that no class of mankind was unclean or unworthy to receive the gospel, that the Holy Spirit led him to open the door of the Kingdom of God to the Gentile world in the house of Cornelius, and that this company of Gentiles accepted Christ and received the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

Lesson XI. teaches that those fleeing from the persecution that sent Stephen to don the martyr's crown carried the gospel to the Greeks at Antioch of Syria, that Barnabas was sent by the apostles to investigate this work of grace, that he found it genuine and joined heartily in breaking the bread of life to the Gentiles, and that he went to Tarsus and brought Saul back with him to assist in this great work of the Lord.

Lesson XII. teaches that Peter was in prison, under sentence of death, that the entire church at Jerusalem was supplicating the throne of grace for his deliverance, that on the very night before Herod intended to execute him, an angel of God delivered Peter from prison, and that this deliverance was so sudden and strange that the praying company at Mary's house was overwhelmed with astonishment and thought it was too good to be true.

—The church service should make people realize their sinful condition and teach them what they must do to be saved and to remain saved and to be a blessing to the world. If all churches would be faithful in this, the church attendance would, in the long run, be solved, and solved right.—World Evangel.

Resolutions of Respect for Mrs. T. B. Vassar

It has pleased our Heavenly Father in His all-wise providence to remove from our midst May 27, 1925, one of our much loved and faithful members, Mrs. T. B. Vassar. Her death has brought genuine sorrow to the members of our Ladies' Parsonage Aid Society and the entire community. She has passed to the eternal home beyond not made by earthly hands, but a hand eternal in the skies. Sister Vassar will be greatly missed. She loved the society and was always ready and happy to respond to the calls of need. Even the last days of her life were marked by loving thoughts of it. She was always present when her health permitted; and her hearty handshake and cheerful smile and interest in everything pertaining to the good church work never ceased. Her life was an inspiration to all with whom she came in contact, to be in her presence was to gain a blessing and a desire to prepare for a better and brighter life in the world beyond. We know that our loss is her gain.

A SCHOOLBOY'S PRAYER.

Give me a healthy body, Lord;
 Give me the sense to keep it so;
 Give me a heart that is not bored
 Whatever work I have to do.

Give me a sense of humor, Lord;
 Give me the power to see a joke;
 To get some happiness from life,
 And pass it on to other folk.

"FOR LITTLE CHILDREN."

There's a friend for little children
 Above the bright blue sky,
 A Friend Who never changes,
 Whose love will never die;
 Our earthly friends may fail us,
 And change with changing years,
 This friend is always worthy
 Of that dear Name He bears.

There's a home for little children
 Above the bright blue sky,
 Where Jesus reigns in glory,
 A home of peace and joy;
 No home on earth is like it,
 Nor can with it compare;
 For every one is happy,
 Nor could be happier there.

There's a song for little children
 Above the bright blue sky,
 A song that will not weary,
 Though sung continually;
 A song which even angels
 Can never, never sing;
 They know not Christ as Savior,
 But worship Him as King.

There's a crown for little children
 Above the bright blue sky,
 And all who look for Jesus
 Shall wear it by and by;
 All, all above is treasured,
 And found in Christ alone;
 Lord grant Thy little children
 To know Thee as their own.

JENNY'S BEST CAT.

Jenny Mackenzie was twelve; she was jolly, she made a gay companion, but she was inclined to be selfish. For instance, she always made out that all the eight cats living at her grannie's farm were hers. Not one belonged to sister Judith. This was all very well; but when the time came for big sister Judith to be married, there was a fuss.

"I want to take Roland Graeme to live with me at our flat in the Temple," Judith said.

Roland Graeme was called after the hero in Scott's fine novel, "The Abbot." He was a gorgeous kitty and a great purrer.

"I can't spare him," said Jenny; "he's mine. He's to stay with me forever."

The farm where Jenny and Judith lived with their grandparents was in the Border. From Jenny's window she could see the Eildon Hills. The main railway line to England ran through grandfather's land. Night and day the great expresses thundered by, and every time she heard the little Jenny felt how wonderful it was to think that the engine rushing through the fields she knew so well should pass into the unknown country. She longed to go to London, but Roland was not going, O, no! On the day before the wedding Jenny overheard a little talk between Judith and grannie. They were in the spare room together packing up Judith's elegant new clothes.

"I do want to take Roland to London," Judith was saying. "Our flat is the very place for him—so quiet, right off the street. He can wander safely about the old courts, and he will remind me of you all; but Jenny's upset about it."

"Jenny's getting rather selfish, I think," said grannie sadly.

"I shan't say anything about it," said Judith. "I'll give up the plan."

Jenny cried in secret over this but said nothing. Judith was married; she went north for her honeymoon; she was to pass through a station five miles from Jenny's farm on her way to London. Jenny and grannie meant to go to have a few words with her as she went through.

Now Jenny had been feeling a little miserable over Roland. After all, she owned seven other cats Lovely, Bracelet, William Wallace, Betty, Honorable, None-So-Pretty, and The Bold. Could she not give up Roland? At any rate, she would take him to the station with her in the car. Judith should see him, pat him, and understand how he throve on the fine air of the Border. It might be cruel to take Roland to London, but in her heart Jenny knew that Judith would be so kind and careful that with her Roland could be happy anywhere.

Grannie would not have allowed Roland to come in the car, Jenny knew, so she popped Roland into a large canvas bag they used to collect shopping parcels in, and he obligingly went to sleep.

Now the station to which grannie and Jenny drove was north. They were in the station yard just two minutes before the express was due. Grannie went on in front, rather agitated. Jenny took Roland out of the bag and carried him in her arms unseen. He was quiet and sleepy.

The train arrived, and Judith's happy face appeared at a window, with her husband looking over her shoulder.

"Hullo, people! Grannie, dear, are you all right? Oh, we've had a lovely time! Jenny! you've got my Roland!"

There were exclamations: there was laughing. Jenny felt a perfect pig as two minutes later, when the train was starting, Judith handed back the big kitty to her. He was now rather dionieted.

A sudden impulse seized Jenny. "You take him. Take him, Judy. I'll come and see him in London," she whispered. There was not a moment to discuss the thing. Roland was rushed back into the bride's arms, and she just cried: "Oh, thank you! How perfectly splendid!" And, lo, and behold! the train had gone on, and in a few minutes Roland from the carriage window would be looking at the fields which he knew so well at his own farm and probably would see his friends Lovely and Honorable playing about in the haystack.

Jenny is very glad she tried to be unselfish. She goes to London once a year now, and Roland always knows her. He is as happy as possible. For exercise he roams round the Temple Church and past the little wig shop by Fump Court. All the English cats in Fleet Street who have seen and talked to him understand now that Scottish cats are bigger and wiser than they can ever hope to be.—Mother Marjory, in British Weekly.

STRING BEANS.

By Ella B. Wightman.

Allison Tate dropped the paper quickly. Why did his mother leave it lying open on the kitchen table—those figures staring right at him! Usually they talked bills over together, he and his mother, but somehow Allison felt that she would rather he did not see this one. It was only Dr. Slade's bill, and not a very large one at that considering the doctor's numerous visits, but to Allison that bill seemed enormous—$31.00.

Allison stepped out into the yard. He must be alone where he could think. $31.00! His mother couldn't pay it. His illness had incurred so much expense that she could hardly make both ends meet as it was. Surely there must be some way whereby he could earn money this summer. Of course he wasn't strong enough yet. His legs felt awfully weak and wobbly. He dropped down on an up-turned tub and rested his chin in his hands. It was a wonderful May day. The maples were sprouting and the birds were chattering noisily, but Allison noticed none of these signs of the return of spring.

Everything in life was wrong. Nothing but a long dreary summer ahead! Pitcher of the town's famous baseball team and too weak to even throw a ball over the fence! Six weeks out of school—no exams—no high school in the fall—no chance of that engineering course later on—that course on which Allison had set his heart. Allison felt very blue and discouraged. His eyes wandered to the next yard, where Tim, Mr. Baker's hired man, was at work. He watched him turn spadeful after spadeful of earth getting the ground ready for planting. Suddenly a thought struck him. Why couldn't he have a garden! His was only a small patch—barely sufficient for three rows but—he might make a little money towards that bill. Perhaps he could pay it all. He started for the cellar and soon returned with a spade. He jammed the corner of the spade in the earth, and tried to force it down. The ground was terribly hard—such loads of stone. He paused uncertainly.

"Hullo, there," called a friendly voice from the other side of the fence. "Hullo, Allison. Glad to see you out. How're you feeling?"

"Oh, better, Mr. Baker, thank you. Wish I was stronger," Allison answered in a disheartened tone.

"Oh, well, that'll come in time. You've had a hard pull. What are you trying to do?" Mr. Baker glanced curiously at Allison's spade.

"Thought I'd start a garden," Allison replied.

"Garden! Didn't know you ever had a garden," surprised.

"No, we never have had, but Doctor said I must be out of doors, besides I've got to earn some money. I thought perhaps, vegetables—" hesitatingly.

"You mean you'd raise vegetables to sell?"

Allison nodded. "You see, Mr. Baker, there's a big doctor's bill. My illness has cost a good deal. Mother isn't strong enough to work and I have to be in the open air anyway, so—"

Mr. Baker studied Allison's face thoughtfully. At last he said slowly, "I don't know but that's a good idea." He glanced down at the little patch of tough grass. "See here, Allison, you never can make any money here. You haven't ground enough for one thing, and what you have is no good. That ground over here this side of my barn is good and rich. I don't need it. S'pose you work that this summer. Tim'll tell you what to do. Let's walk over and take a look at it."

Allison's face brightened when he saw the ground. "What! Plant all that! Why, I could raise beets and potatoes and onions and squashes and tomatoes and—"

"Better talk is over with Tim before you begin," suggested Mr. Baker with a laugh.

Allison was surprised the following morning, to find Tim busily at work spading up his bit of ground.

"Halloo, there, Tim," he called, "What are you doing? That's my work."

"Sure, I know," grinned Tim good-naturedly, "but you're not strong enough yet to do such work. I'll just get it in shape a bit so you can start. Don't you worry. There'll be many an odd chore you can do for me."

Allison watched Tim in silence until the work was finished.

"There! That'll be enough for you to start on. What are you thinking of planting?" Tim asked, leaning on his spade.

"Oh, answered Allison proudly, "peas and beans and tomatoes and corn and—all the things a garden usually has."

Tim laughed loudly.

"I don't see what there is to laugh at," Allison flushed slightly.

"I was thinking, you were just like everyone else who starts a garden. They want to grow everything at once, but say, you want to make some money out of it, I hear?"

"That's what I'm doing it for. I want to make a lot if I can."

"Well, then, the thing for you to do is to specialize. Let me see." Tim thought a few minutes. "Why don't you try beans?"

"Beans?" echoed Allison. "You don't mean beans and nothing else?"

"Sure. I b'lieve you could make a lot out of beans. You know Mr. Porter—who keeps the hotel? He told me last year he couldn't get half the fresh string beans he wanted. I believe if you went to see him, you could make a bargain to sell him all you could raise. You might keep him supplied all summer."

"All summer!" Allison glanced over his bit of ground.

"Sure you could. You'll be surprised how many batches you can get off this plot." Still Allison looked doubtful and Tim continued, "You see you don't plant it all at once. Not more'n a quarter of it to begin with, then in a couple of weeks you plant again, and two weeks later some more. You can keep on doing that till the last of August and you'll have fresh beans all summer."

"Yes, but I'll use up all my ground long before the summer's over," said Allison.

"Then you just start over again at the beginning. You see this ground's fine and rich. If you cultivate it well, you ought to have a good crop."

Allison grew enthusiastic. "Why—that'll be easy work—only work a quarter of it at a time."

"That's the way to do it. Now you just go and make your bargain with Mr. Porter and get your beans. I'll start you right, and sometime you can help me a bit."

Mr. Porter readily agreed to take all the fresh string beans Allison could furnish during the summer.

In spite of Tim's help Allison found his work hard at first. He was often obliged to stop and rest, then as the days passed, his strength returned rapidly. He grew to love his work. Under Tim's directions, he planted and cultivated and how those beans did grow! Every evening, for the days were very hot, Allison worked as late as he could see. He loosened the earth and watered his beans well, for it was long since they had had rain and the ground was very dry. If only the boys wouldn't play baseball so near. It was so aggravating to hear their shouts when they were practicing for the Fourth of July game. That game was a great event in the town, and Allison had been proud of his position as pitcher. He could pitch as well as ever now but—those beans!

One hot, sultry morning Allison was returning from Mr. Porter's when he heard his name called.

"Hey, there, Tate. Wait a minute, will you. What's your hurry?" Tom Mason called breathlessly as he ran up.

"Oh, halloo, Tom. No hurry at all. Why, what's the matter?"

"Matter? Just this. You know our game's coming off on the Fourth? Well, you should see Bates pitch! 'Twould make you sick! Should think he'd been raised in the city and never seen a ball. Come on back. You ought to be strong enough by this time. We've two more weeks to practice in."

Allison hesitated and Tom continued. "We'll lose the game sure if you don't. Come on. You know we only play evenings when it's cool."

It was a terrible temptation—the game Allison was crazy over.

"I'll tell you," added Tom persuasively, "come on over tonight and try it. 'We'll look for you, seven sharp."

Allison was surprised to find that he could pitch as well as ever. He had forgotten none of his old tricks. The boys were enthusiastic—wild. The game was theirs now for sure. Of course Allison was lame and sore the following morning, but another evening's play would fix all that. 'Twould do no harm to let his garden go one more day. My, 'twas great to be back on the diamond once more. He'd do his work in the early mornings after this—watering and all, in spite of what Tim said.

The third morning Allison started for his garden. 'Twouldn't do to let it go another day, besides this was the day for Mr. Porter's beans. Allison was dismayed at the sight of the hard-baked ground, and wilted vines as he picked his limp pods.

Mr. Porter counted out Allison's money and handed it to him. He remarked seriously, "Guess the weather's too dry. S'pose you won't have any more."

Allison was startled. He did some thinking on the way home. He couldn't work and play too. The work must be done. The only way was the best. He started early the next day to Tom, and that evening he was back again with the hose. Mr. Porter had no fault with his next batch of beans.

With the coming of a good rain the much needed rain, Allison's work was lighter, until he had planted his last beans.

One morning Allison came bounding in to where his mother sat by the window sewing. He waved something in his hand.

"I've got it, mother! I've got it!" he cried excitedly. "Get your hat on and we'll go right away and pay it," grabbing her vest and giving it a throw on a chair.

His mother looked at him in amazement. "What's the matter, son? Are you crazy?" she asked.

"It's the money, mother. The money for that doctor's bill." Then realizing that his mother still looked bewildered, "Oh, it's all right. I worked all summer and earned it. Mr. Porter paid me the last this morning. Count it and see," eagerly.

His mother counted the bills. "How did you earn this, Allison?" she asked seriously.

"Beans, string beans. I grew them and sold them. Mr. Baker let me have the ground. It's great fun when you know how."

His mother stared a minute longer, then she burst into a hearty laugh.

"Oh, Allison, Allison, you've worked all summer growing string beans and selling them and—the doctor's bill was paid long ago."

"Paid!" Allison looked stunned. There was a tender note in his mother's voice.

"Allison, dear, I had the money all saved up for the doctor's bill, but listen! I have some news for you, some you'll be glad to hear. Mr. Cox was here this morning. He says if you'll study up these next two weeks, you may take your exams in private and enter high school with the others."

Slowly Allison's face changed. His mother continued, "As for your clothes—" she held up the roll of bills.

"Sav, Allison," said Tom Mason that evening, "your old string beans made us lose that July game. How about Labor Day?"

The Labor Day game was won.—Selected.

—Amundsen and his party have returned. They failed to reach the North Pole by over one hundred miles. Their supply of gasoline became low and they thought it prudent to turn back. They started with 5,000 pounds of gasoline, according to report. It is expected that Amundsen will soon make another dash for the Pole.

—Senator Robert M. La Follette is dead. He had been ill for weeks with heart trouble. His last message to the public was: "I am at peace with all the world, but there is a lot of work I could still do. I don't know how the people feel toward me, but I shall carry to the grave my love for them which has sustained me through life." We believe Mr. La Follette was generally regarded as a real friend of the people.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Bethel, Alamance Circuit.—We had the pleasure of having with us the second Sunday in June, Dr. and Mrs. A. G. Dixon, who were accompanied by their daughter and Miss Cordia Thompson. We were also delighted to entertain them in our home. Mrs. Dixon gave us a splendid address on missions in the morning, which was much enjoyed by an appreciative audience. Mrs. Dixon organized our missionary society just 20 years ago. This is her first visit to us. We were delighted to have her. 'Twas our annual Thank-offering Service for both home and foreign societies. Collection amounted to $22.12, making a thank-offering from each society of $11.06. Brother Dixon preached for us in the afternoon. A splendid sermon, which we enjoyed very much.

Missionary societies met the first Sunday in June with Mrs. J. M. Foust. Program was interesting and good. We were glad to have them. Our foreign society raised for the last year $108.52. Our home society with only a few members raised $36. We need more members in the home society. Next meeting to be held the first Sunday in July at 2:30 P. M. with Mrs. R. W. Lindley. Subject, God's Grace.

A delegation from Burlington will hold a series of prayer services at Bethel church beginning June 30, embracing Tuesday night, Wednesday night and Thursday night. Will begin at early twilight. These people are filled with the Spirit of our Lord. Often have conversions at these meetings. We trust all will pray earnestly and come, and we are hoping for a revival of God's Spirit among us.

We are glad that Mr. W. R. Foust, who was so seriously hurt by a runaway, getting caught under his wheat binder, is now home from Burlington Hospital. Mrs. W. A. Foust, who has been under treatment at Graham, is also home. We hope for them both a speedy recovery. Mrs. J. M. Foust, Reporter.

Love Joy, Why Not Circuit.—We had no Sunday school on last Sunday. The choir, having received an invitation from Macedonia church requesting that they come and help them out in their Children's Day exercise, gladly responded; a nice time was reported. Our pastor, Rev. J. W. Hulin, preached for us Sunday night at 7:30 o'clock to a very large last Sunday night at 7:30 o'clock to a very large congregation considering the inclement to the church. It has been said that there is no standstill to Christianity; it sure does seem that way with us. As soon as one task is completed another one approaches. Thank God for the courage, energy and determination that gets things accomplished. We are planning now to purchase a Deleo lighting system which will be used to lighting up the church and arbor. We have been in the dark long enough. May the people all unite and work so that we will emerge from this darkness into light.

We are going to begin a ten-days singing at Love Joy on July 6. Prof. T. F. Scott of Steeds, N. C., will be the teacher.

Our Children's Day service will be held on Sunday, July 12, all-day service, dinner on the grounds; everybody is invited to come and spend the day with us.

Sunday school next Sunday as usual at 10 o'clock, prayer meeting also as usual. Best wishes. Hobart Reynolds, Reporter.

Salem, Saxapahaw Circuit.—On last second Sunday Brother Isley gave us a fine sermon; there was a good congregation present. We also had communion service. Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. We held our Children's Day exercise on the third Sunday morning. We had a good day, the offering was very good.

Miss Olo Paris has returned from Rainey Hospital and is getting along nicely. With best wishes to the Herald, Reporter.

High Point.—The Ladies' Aid society served a fried chicken supper in the new church last Thursday evening. The tables were set in the Sunday school assembly room, and an elaborate and delicious meal was served at six P. M. to about one hundred patrons at $1 per plate. The proceeds will be used for the carpet fund.

The Men's Club will hold its monthly meeting in the church next Thursday evening and supper will be served. A good program has been prepared, and the occasion will doubtless be very enjoyable.

A large number of splendid young people is attending the services of the Young People's Summer Conference at the College, which will continue until Thursday, June 25.

Last Sunday morning Children's Day was observed by the Sabbath school, and a play, "The Call," was rendered in a most interesting manner by a number of pupils. There were songs by the primary department children, also by beginners and Juniors. To Mrs. S. S. Coe much praise is due for the success of this service.

On Sunday morning the pulpit was filled by Dr. H. L. Elderdice, president of Westminster Theological Seminary, who is no stranger to our congregation. His subject was, "Being Like Jesus," and he was inquisitive to know what the audience's conception of Jesus was as to personal appearance. He then enumerated the different conceptions of Jesus as portrayed by various great painters, depicting his birth in the manger, infancy, youth, manhood and death. Each painter represented him according to his own concept and imagination. The speaker declared it to be not impossible for one to acquire physical similarity to Jesus, but this occurs only with those who best exemplify and express the teachings of the Master. He recalled personal memories of men and women who have obtained, by a life of Christian service, features and bearing which immediately invoked the personality of Christ to those who beheld them.

Sunday evening at eight o'clock Dr. Frederick J. Baylis, president of Illinois Conference, delivered his very remarkable sermon, "From the Bread-line to the Pulpit." There was a large audience including a number from other churches of the city and the young people in attendance upon the Summer Conference. Dr. Baylis related the personal story of his life. Born in Stratford-on-Avon, England, he attended grammar school in the same building in which Shakespeare was taught. He tasted strong drink for the first time when 16 years of age. At 19 he joined the cavalry, and engaged in two Beer wars in Africa. He continued to drink after his marriage, and while employed as manager of a club. His wife and child soon died, and he plunged deeper in dissipation to drown his sorrow. He came New York in a fit of discontent and restlessness, and was soon sleeping under Brooklyn Bridge or in Battery Park. He stood in the bread line at Bowery Mission to eke out miserable existence; he was converted at the mission, and thereafter was a changed man. Not a drop of whiskey has passed his lips since that day. He entered the ministry, and is today the honored and useful president of Illinois Conference. Basing conclusions on the bitter experience of his own life, he says that in order to attain the state of greatest joy and happiness, man must be in harmony with God, since the only things in nature out of harmony with Him are human beings. The sermon was highly interesting.

Mrs. R. M. Andrews has resigned as director of the choir, and her place is being filled by Mr. Dan W. Smith, head of the music department of High Point College. The congregation was extremely loth to part with Mrs. Andrews, but considers itself quite fortunate in having so worthy a successor. Miss Myrtle Perry of Thomasville, who is a great favorite with our people, sang a beautiful solo last Sunday morning, which was greatly enjoyed.

Miss Blanche Burgess went to Raleigh to attend the recent Baraca-Philathea convention as a delegate from the A. M. Idol Philathea Class, and was elected a member of the executive committee.

Miss Lucille A. Pickens is attending summer school at N. C. C. W., Greensboro.

Mr. J. Richard Reitzel and Miss Lily Nelson Mason of Durham will be married next Saturday, June 27. The groom-to-be is one of our most splendid young men, and his bride will receive a cordial welcome to the hearth and homes of our people.

Wyatt A. Pickens, who has been taking post-graduate work at Harvard University, returned home last week.

Little Miss Betty Ray Montsinger, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Homer E. Montsinger, received one of the prizes in the recent Baby Show, which was given by the auxiliary of the Friends church.

Mr. Robt. A. Brown, son of Dr. and Mrs. Geo. R. Brown, who is taking a course in medicine in Emory University, Atlanta, visiting his parents.

Mrs. C. E. Forlines and son, Charles, Westminster, Md., have been guests of Mr. and Mrs. Brown at the parsonage, while Mr. Forlines attended the Pastors' Conference and Young People's Summer Conference.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Garrett and family expect to move into their new home near the College about July 1.

Messrs. Ray Montgomery and Holt McPherson, students at the University, are spending the summer with home folks.

June 22.

English Street Church.—The church of tomorrow must depend on the young people today. And we can say the hope for English Street is good. Since we last reported we have had with us Rev. J. W. Hulin from Winston. He brought two very inspiring messages to us the fifth Sunday in May. Brother C. Hall of High Point College has been here us. And last Sunday we were gladly surprised when Dr. and Mrs. A. G. Dixon came. We can truly say gladly because we feasted on the wonderful message Dr. Dixon brought us. We extend an invitation to all these we have had with us to come again. Our pastor, Rev. A. M. Hamilton, is in poor health and has been for some time. We ask all Christians to pray if it be the will of our Lord that he may be restored to health. Owing to this condition Brother Hamilton will call on others to help carry on the work. Pardon us for such a long report this time, but owing to the fact no report had been made for a few weeks we feel you will bear with me this time. I will wait so long next time. Reporter.

Palestine, Flat Rock.—Our pastor being away at Summer Conference, Brother Harvey Brookbank, a young man just starting out in ministry, filled Brother Trogon's apartment today. Mr. Brookbank preached a most good sermon. His message was impressively spoken. We had a very good congregation today. Some of our people thought we would not be any preaching.

Our circuit is going to pay Brother Trogon's expense to Summer Conference. This church collected its part of his expense today. Sunday school is doing very well; 61 present today though not near what it ought to be. We should have not less than 150 every day. Seems that it is hard to get people to go to church these days. Almost all our Sunday school is young people and children. The way they are trained today determines the kind of leaders they will make in only a few years.

Sunt Sarah Landreth, the good wife of Uncle John, has been very sick for quite a while and does not seem to improve very much.

Mr. Ashby Williams, the father of Miss Ruth Williams, one of our church members, is confined to his bed and it seems that the end is near. They have our sympathy, especially the only child of Mrs. and Mr. Williams. We ask the prayers of all our people for these good people.

Third quarterly meeting at Palestine Saturday before the second Sunday in July, 2:30 o'clock. Grace R. Tucker.

Chilch, Connelly Springs Charge.—Sunday school report for June 21: Attendance: officers and teachers, 5; departments—adults senior 8, junior 9, beginners 14; visitors, 1; total attendance, 46. Collection, $1.29. Number of chapters read the past week, 505.

Rev. W. P. Martin made us an interesting Sunday school talk, which was much enjoyed.

"Oh, heaven without my Savior
Would be no heaven to me;
Dim were the walls of jasper,
Rayless the crystal sea!

"He gilds earth's darkest valleys
With light and joy and peace;
Then what must be the radiance
Where sin and death shall cease?"

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.
Macy A. Martin, Reporter.

Union Grove, Kernersville Charge.—The third day in July will be the time when our special meeting will begin. Rev. C. W. Bates of Asheville will be the pulpit help. We are glad that Rother Bates is coming to preach for us. He is an able man and may we begin early to work and pray for a great revival.

Pastor Suits preached a very inspiring sermon last Sunday afternoon. The attendance was not as large as usual, due to the hot weather, I suppose.

Mr. R. L. Diggins continues seriously ill at the home of a daughter in Greensboro.

The reporter with a party of her friends motored over to High Point First M. P. Church last Sunday evening and enjoyed the service of the Young People's Conference.

Nelle Gray, Reporter.

June 23, 1925.

Greensville Circuit, Matthews Chapel.—It has been quite a while since we last reported, but will let the readers know we are still in existence.

Yesterday was our usual preaching day but we are sorry to report Brother Powell has been suffering with carbuncles on his neck and couldn't be with us. We hope he may soon be able to take his usual place again.

Our Sunday school is doing nicely now that summer is here and all the little folks can get out.

The ladies of the W. H. M. S. gave a lawn party last Saturday night. Quite a good sum was realized. We are planning to carpet our church and get a good supply of song books before our revival meeting, which is the fourth Sunday in July.

Owing to an epidemic of whooping cough our Children's Day has been postponed. So there will be no Children's Day on the first Sunday in July as was planned.

Reporter.

June 22.

Shelby.—Despite the extreme hot weather we had another increase in Sunday school attendance last Sunday.

Our Children's Day service will be held next Sunday night at eight o'clock. The children have been trained for the service for three weeks and we are expecting a good service and a large congregation.

C. B. Way, Pastor.

Reidsville.—The members of the Philathea class motored out to Ware's Spring Tuesday evening and partook of a sumptuous picnic supper, served with hot coffee.

Dr. J. D. Williams, teacher of the class, was present and added much to the enjoyment of the evening with his wit and humor.

After spending a social hour at the spring they motored to the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Dixon, where a musical program was rendered, after which ice cream and cake were served by Mr. and Mrs. Dixon, assisted by Messrs. Iola and Effie McCollum and Blanche Throckmorton.

The class adjourned at a late hour, having spent a pleasant evening together.

Effie McCollum, Secretary.

Union Grove, Forsyth Circuit.—Pastor Curry preached to us yesterday.

The people of Forsyth charge gave our pastor a pounding on Saturday evening before the fifth Sunday of last month. Between forty and fifty of his members and friends went to the parsonage and loaded his dining-table with good things to eat. Among the ones that went was Rev. Mr. Franklin of Winston-Salem, pastor of the Southside Church of Christ. We all went to show our love and appreciation to our pastor and his children.

The fifth Sunday was our pastor's vacation, which he spent at home with his children. He has all his children with him now except the baby Johnsie, whom Mr. and Mrs. Binkleys of Winston-Salem are keeping for him.

We will begin our protracted meeting on Monday night after the second Sunday in July, holding it over the third Sunday. Brother Bethea of Lexington will be the help. The services at night will begin at eight o'clock; in the afternoon at three; an all-day service the third Sunday. Pray, and come and be with us in our meeting.

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

TESTIMONIES TO THE BIBLE.

The sense of the value of the Holy Scriptures has not only revived, but it has spread throughout the modern world. Recent voices of all sorts might be quoted bearing proof of this. The testimonies of Professor Huxley, Matthew Arnold, and Lord Morley are familiar. Mr. Renan has called it "The great book of consolation for humanity." President Roosevelt has said of it, "No thoughtful man can doubt that to decrease the circulation and use of the Bible among the people would seriously menace the highest interests of civilized humanity." President Lincoln's presidential addresses could never have been written but for its inspiration. Not the least impressive of the modern American testimonies to the Bible are the words of Mark Twain, who said: "Who taught these ancient writers their simplicity of language, their felicity of expression, their pathos, and above all their faculty of sinking themselves entirely out of sight of the reader, and making the narrative stand out alone and seem to tell itself?" In recent days we have those remarkable testimonies of General Foch, Lord Haig, Lord Roberts, and others, which are well known and often quoted. General Pershing has said to his soldiers, "Hardship will be your lot, but trust in God will give you comfort; temptation will befall you, but the teachings of our Savior will give you strength." Admiral Sims has added his testimony that "This Testament is a handbook of manhood; it introduces you to the pattern Man, who shows you what to become and the way to become it."—Dr. John Kelman.

—Charles Carroll, the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, nearly a century ago laid the stone that marked the beginning of the Baltimore and Ohio, America's first railroad.

—The Southern States imported only 13 pounds of butter in 1924.

—There are between 100,000 and 125,000 habitual vagrants in the United States who are able to work but refuse to do so.

—Early English newspapers were frequently named Mercury with some qualifying appellation.

LET GOD EXPLAIN HIMSELF.

When we cannot understand a person's conduct we ask him for an explanation. No fair-minded person will condemn anyone until this privilege has been accorded. Our laws guarantee to even the most immoral the right to testify in their own behalf. Why do we not do as much for God?

We instinctively feel that there is an obligation resting upon God for his creatures. And he is responsible for the animals he owns and the children he brings into the world. Is God less moral? Jesus settled this. He said that not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice and that man is of more value than many sparrows.

But the sparrow falls, that is the difficulty. Why did not God prevent its fall? More still, why did God's wind blow it out of the nest. A great many people want that question answered. That was the problem discussed by Job and his friends.

Three things God said to Job in reply. They do not contain a complete answer but they point out the way.

(1) "Why are you finding fault with me? I did not send this trouble. Satan is its author." The answer still holds. This is not the work God made. He made it perfect. Neither sorrows nor sorrow were in the original program. He made all things "very good." His disasters and sorrows were introduced by Satan. If man had not sinned there would have been no problem of this kind. When you permit someone to tamper with the strings of your precious violin so that it gives forth discords instead of harmony, you do not blame the maker. When you carelessly expose yourself and contract pneumonia, do not blame it on God. His laws are all beneficent but when violated, they necessarily bring suffering. We blame a great many "providential dealings" on God for which we alone are responsible. The sooner we learn this truth the better.

(2) But God permitted Satan to afflict Job! Why? The second thing God said to that suffering man was, "Wait until I am through. When then you see how it turns out." When one interrupts you in the middle of a sentence with a contradiction you indignantly say, "Wait until I finish the sentence. I am only half through. This is a semi-colon, not a period." Let God do his own punctuating. The completed sentence may contradict and certainly will make clear the unfinished half. You take your friends to the studio of the artist who is painting your picture. He at once begins to criticize—"The colors are dull, the curves are not well rounded." You say, indignantly, "Wait until he has finished. He has just given the rough outline. It will not be nearly so handsome as I am for several sittings yet." Why not be as fair with God? The splendidly developed, the richly rewarded Job was the completed sentence, the finished picture.

(3) Job's problem was not perfectly solved but the Voice from the whirlwind revealed the divine wisdom and power and love in such measure that Job was speechless with shame that he had dared to doubt the care of a God so good and great.

We have a knowledge of the incalculable magnitude of the universe and of the infinite wisdom and power that rule it beside which that which silenced Job was as nothing. But we have infinitely more. God's revelation of himself in his Son and of his love in Calvary, should make us silent and trustful when we cannot understand—even when life seems a stark contradiction to all that seems kind and wise.

Let God explain himself.—United Presbyterian.

THE UNKNOWN JOURNEY.

"He went out not knowing whither he went."—Hebrews 11:6-10.

Abram began his journey without any knowledge of his ultimate destination. He took "one step," and he did not "ask to see the distant scene." And that is faith, to do God's will here and now, quietly leaving the results to him. Faith is not concerned with the entire chain; its devoted attention is fixed upon the immediate link. Faith is not knowledge of a moral process; it is fidelity in a moral act. Faith leaves something to the Lord; it obeys his immediate commandment and leaves to him direction and destiny.

And so faith is accompanied by serenity. "He that believeth shall not make haste"—or, more literally, "shall not get into a fuss." He shall not get into a panic, neither fetching fears from his yesterdays nor from his tomorrows. Concerning his yesterdays, faith says, "Thou hast beset me behind. Concerning his tomorrows, faith says, "Thou hast beset me before." Concerning his today, faith says, "Thou hast laid Thine hand upon me." That is enough, just to feel the pressure of the guiding hand.—J. H. Jowett.

WOODROW WILSON ON THE BIBLE.

This is what President Wilson wrote for the Testaments for the soldiers and sailors:

"The Bible is the Word of life. I beg that you will read it and find this out for yourselves—read, not little snatches here and there, but long passages that will really be the road to the heart of it. You will find it full of real men and women not only, but also of the things you have wondered about and been troubled about all your life as men have been always; and the more you read the more it will become plain to you what things are worth while and what are not, what things make men happy—loyalty, right dealing, speaking the truth, readiness to give everything for what they think their duty, and most of all, the wish that they may have the real approval of the Christ, who gave everything for them—and the things that are guaranteed to make men unhappy—selfishness, cowardice, greed and everything that is low and mean. When you have read the Bible you will know that it is the word of God, because you will have found it the key to your heart, your own happiness, and your own duty."

WHEN PAUL TOOK STOCK.

Our spiritual poverty is all too often a tragedy of life. Riches beyond measure are ours for the taking. Paul was always making inventories of our wealth. If we read him more we might be richer than we are. In one of his books the Australian essayist, Frank W. Boreham, says that, as he was preparing a sermon on "The Unsearchable Riches": "I was struck by the various translations. Dr.

Weymouth speaks of the 'exhaustless wealth' of Christ; Dr. Moffat renders it 'fathomless wealth'; while Dr. Jowett tells a story. 'Once, he says, 'I heard Dr. Rendel Harris read a chapter in which these words are found, and he read from his pocket Greek Testament and gave his own translation, and I remember now, when he came to this passage, he threw out his arms in a wide gesture as he repeated the words "the unexplorable wealth of Christ." If these synonyms are meaningless to us, are we not guilty indeed of Laodicean blindness? (Rev. 3:17, 18.)

Orange Charge.—The pastor and some of the members attended the Young People's Conference and Pastors' Conference at High Point, N. C. Am sorry none of our young people could go for the entire conference.

We are grateful to the Effland congregation for releasing us from our appointment Sunday, 21st, and contributing $4.00 toward our expenses to the summer conferences. We also thank Brother J. F. McAdams of Hebron for $5 and Mrs. Lelia Gill also of Hebron for $2 on above expenses.

We are planning for Children's Day exercises at the following times and places: Hebron, fourth Sunday, June, 11 A. M.; Effland, first Sunday, July, 8:00 P. M.; Chestnut Ridge, second Sunday, July, 11 A. M.

There will be services at Hebron fourth Sunday in June as follows: Children's Day exercises, 11 A. M., dinner on the grounds, preaching 2:00 P. M.

The following will be the order of services at Chestnut Ridge second Sunday in July: Children's Day exercises 11 A. M., dinner on the grounds, preaching 2:00 P. M.

There will be no preaching at Chestnut Ridge fourth Sunday in June, nor at Hebron second Sunday in July.

The third Sunday in July is Home-Coming Day for the Effland church. Two preaching services, 11 A. M. and 2:00 P. M., dinner on grounds.

All former pastors and friends are invited to attend these services. Sincerely

B. M. Williams.

Dulins, Mocksville Charge.—We are glad to report that the Children's Day exercise was held yesterday at this place. We had all-day service, the children's exercise yesterday morning and good singing in the afternoon. The children rendered their parts well for no more training than they had. The collection amounted to about $5.05. We certainly do appreciate the work that our pastor, Rev. J. T. Sisk, is doing for this church; if we can keep him two years longer we feel like Dulins will be up with the leading churches of this charge instead of just dragging along. We were glad to have Brother Garrett, formerly the superintendent of the Children's Home, with us. He made some very interesting talks about the Children's Home and College. The College talk was very interesting to both the parents and young people who have ever thought of going to college. I think it is the duty of every Methodist Protestant that intends to go to college to patronize his or her own college.

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

Stanly Circuit.—The earth is not being turned upside down on Stanly circuit; however, there are some indications of progress. Since the last report from Stanly our church has been painted outside and inside, also the roof, which adds greatly to the appearance. Brother Taylor said it would be interesting to see reports in the Herald of all churches providing markers. Friendship church has put in front on the public highway a beautiful changeable letter church bulletin board, which cost $80.

This pastor regrets very much he had to miss the sessions of the Pastors' Summer Conference and the Young People's Conference at the High Point College which began last Wednesday. It is the first time in a number of years that we have not met with the brethren in the Pastors' Summer Conference. I am glad to say that Friendship people had raised the money to pay my way to the summer conference, like they always have done for me. But we could not make the trip to High Point because of sickness in the home. Mrs. Ridge has been real sick. Not much better yet, sorry to say. Brethren, pray for us. We greatly desired to attend the sessions of both conferences and while absent in body we have a sincere interest and concern for the success of the conference and our prayers are with those who have attended the conference. This pastor is convinced that he has been deprived of many blessings of fellowship, recreation and valuable instruction gained in the summer conference. May the dear Lord bless you all.

Notice to the People of Stanly Circuit.
The third quarterly conference will be held at Porter church July 18. Brethren, I trust you will be there. We will be looking for you and a good report.

Yours for the Master,
I am A. Ridge.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Callie Handy Roberson Thompson, born May 29, 1864, died at the age of 60 years, 11 months, 11 days.

She was married to J. C. Thompson in 1885. To this union were born ten children, two boys and eight girls. Three of the children preceded her to the grave several years ago, one son, Joe, and two daughters, Mrs. R. T. Woody and Mrs. D. H. Isley. The children living, namely, Mrs. L. E. Guthrie of Saxapahaw, Mrs. L. R. Pickard, Mrs. M. C. Pickard, Mrs. C. A. McNey, Alfred T. Thompson, Misses Bettie and Dora Thompson of Burlington.

In early life she professed faith in Christ and joined the M. P. church at Concord, of which she remained a faithful member until death.

She was a great sufferer, having been sick for a long time. However, she bore her affliction with patience, and we feel sure she has reached her reward.

Mrs. Thompson was an excellent woman in her church. She was always ready to help any cause. She was a good neighbor, a good friend to all and always had a cheerful word for every one she came in contact with.

She was laid to rest in Concord cemetery. The funeral was conducted by her pastor, H. L. Isley, assisted by S. W. Taylor of Burlington. The large floral offering showed the love people had for Mrs. Thompson and the sympathy they had for the bereaved ones. The mound was more than covered with the beautiful flowers.

May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ abide with the sorrowing husband and children who feel more keenly than any one else the passing of this good woman from labor to reward.

"Mother, thou wast mild and lovely,
Gentle as the summer breeze,
Pleasant as the air of evening,
When it floats among the trees.

"Dearest mother, thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel,
But 'tis God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.

"Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life is fled,
Then in heaven with joy to greet thee
Where no farewell tear is shed."

Goodbye, dear wife and mother. We know thou art gone where no sickness nor sorrow can come. Thou hast crossed over the river to rest under the shade, to be with our Saviour at home.

Louise Jarrett.—On the first day of June death visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ed Jarrett and claimed Martha Louise who was a sweet, tender, year-old child. Baby Louise was intensely sick for more than one week, and suffered more than words can describe. Everything that loving hearts and a skilful physician could do failed to keep alive the vital spark. At Mt. Lebanon on June the 2d the tender mortal form was laid to rest beneath a rich profusion of flowers. The large attendance and the beautiful flowers were an expression of love toward the departed one, as well as an expression of sympathy for Brother and Sister Jarrett. The bereaved parents bore their distress as only those who trust in God can.

The service was conducted by the writer.

THE JOB.

But, God, it won't come right! It won't come right!

I've worked it over till my brain is numb.
The first flash came so bright,
Then more ideas after it—flash—flash!

I thought it some
New constellation men would wonder at.
Perhaps it's just a firework—flash! fizz! spat!
Then darker darkness and scorched paste-board and sour smoke.

But, God, the thought was great,
The scheme, the dream—why, till the first charm broke

The thing just built itself while I, elate
Laughed and admired it. Then it stuck,
Half done—the lesser half, worse luck!
You see, it's dead as yet—a frame, a body—and the heart.

The soul, the fiery, vital part
To give it life is what I cannot get. I've tried
You know it!—tried to snatch live fire,
And pawed cold ashes! Every spark has died.
It won't come right. I'd drop the entire thing,
Only—I can't! I love my job.

You, who ride the thunder—
Do you know what it is to dream and drudge and throb?

I wonder.

Did it come at you with a rush, your dream, your plan?

If so, I know how you began.
Yes, with rapt face and sparkling eyes,
Swinging the hot globe out between the skies,
Marking the new seas with their beach lines,
Sketching in sun and moon, the lightning and the rains,

Sowing the hills with pines,
Wreathing a rim of purple round the plains!
I know you laughed then, as you caught and wrought

The first swift, rapturous outlines of your thought.

And then—

Men! —

I see it now.

Oh, God, forgive my pettish row!

I see your job. While ages crawl!

Your lips take laboring lines, your eyes a sadder light.

For man, the fire and flower and center of it all—

Man won't come right!

After your patient centuries,
Fresh starts, recastings, tired Gethsemanes
And tense Golgothas, he, your central theme,
Is just a jangling echo of your dream.
Grand as the rest of it may be, he ruins.

Why don't you quit?

Crumple it all and dream again! But no;
Flaw after flaw, you work it out, revise, refine,
Bondage, brutality and war and woe,
The sot, the fool, the tyrant and the mob—
Dear God, how you must love your job!

Help me, as I love mine.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

THE CHRISTIAN'S DAILY DOZEN.

First, turn your heart to God for grace
Before you look on any face.

Next, breathe a word of thankful greeting
To him who watched while you were sleeping.

Now, if you find this hard to do,
Invoke your will to help you through;

Stretch forth your hands or turn your head.
'Twill drive the night mists from your bed.

Next say a verse or hum an air
To make an atmosphere of prayer.

At length, when mind is keenly turning,
Repeat some new verse you are learning.

Then it will surely clear your vision
To voice in words, the day's decision;

To talk with Christ about your work,
For heaven can ever bless a shirk.

And now, prepared the day to meet,
Arise and stand upon your feet.

Then, from the table while you're dressing,
Clean something from the Book of Blessing;

And, for the climax of all motion
Fail not to kneel in sweet devotion.

So go you forth with smile to greet
The first and every heart you meet;

And all day long your soul will thrive,
And you'll thank God that you're alive.

WHAT WILL YOU GIVE?

The Children's Day Offering affords you the opportunity to lay on the altar of the Methodist Protestant Church, your gift to extend Christ's Kingdom.

By holding a Children's Day service your Sunday school can raise one-fourth of your church's budget.

Every Sunday school should observe the 40th Anniversary of the Children's Day service and at the same time honor the memory of Rev. F. T. Tagg, D.D., who instituted it.

It is not too late to hold a Children's Day service. Send your order for free supplies to What will be settled by that trial at Dayton, Tenn.? Certainly it will not settle the question whether there has been evolution of free speech. Nor will it settle the question as to whether there has been evolution of free speech. That has already been settled and is not at issue in this trial. The main question involved seems to be that of the right of the people of a state to determine what they will have taught in their public schools. Have the people the right to exclude from the school courses a study lacking utility or that is questionable as to its value? There does not seem to be any solid ground for doubting this right. The Governor of Tennessee predicts that the question will be disposed of in a very short time by the attorney for the defense says that the trial may last a month. It may last even longer than that and yet settle nothing.

The Bible has been ruled out of the public schools in a number of our states. Now the "evolutionary hypothesis" has been ruled out in one state, why is there such a howl about those that said nothing about free speech? The Bible was ruled out? It seems to deny whose ox was gored, doesn't it?

It took God 1,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 years to make the first gnat, how long would you suppose it took Him to make the first

The Bible is the worst-hated and the best-loved book in the world. It is hated by some because it sets God forth as a moral governor who will call men to account and reward them according to their conduct. These men do not wish to be called to account. They do as they please without any disturbance as to a day of judgment. They want to be responsible to nobody. Daniel Webster's greatest thought of personal accountability to God they do not wish to admit to their minds at all. They are ruled by pride and self-will, they would be irresponsible, they want license to sin as they choose, and they hate the Bible because it rebukes them and threatens them with just punishment. Other men love the Bible above all other books because it shows them a way of escape from condemnation and everlasting punishment for their sins; it shows them a way to make peace with God, a way to regain His favor and live evermore a joyful recipient of His blessings. The Bible is a great book; truly it is the Book of books.

—The pastor of Anderson circuit, Rev. R. C. Koons, has entered upon his work enthusiastically. He writes under recent date: "We just closed a very good tent meeting at Duncan; about 18 made profession. Prospects look good for a future church in Duncan. Methodism and Protestantism are not much known here. We expect to spread the rich butter of M. P.-ism all over Greenville and Spartanburg counties. Methodism and Protestantism make a wonderful combination. Every 100 per cent American Christian ought to love the M. P. Church."

WHAT IS A CHRISTIAN COLLEGE?

1. It is not a donation by Christian people, with Christian motives, although that is very important.
2. It is not an institution where all the members of the faculty are professing Christians, although that is important.
3. It is not an institution that is owned and managed by a Christian denomination, although that is important.
4. It is not an institution where chapel services and church attendance are required, although that is important.
5. It is not an institution where the Bible is taught as a part of the course of study, although that is important.
6. A Christian college is a college that honors the person of Jesus Christ as God and man, as the creator of the world, and its upholder, as its providential guide and redeemer; and that exalts Him in all departments of instruction as the key to all knowledge and history.—Wm. H. Black, President, Missouri Valley College.

WOODROW WILSON ON THE BIBLE.

This is what President Wilson wrote for the Testaments for the soldiers and sailors:

"The Bible is the Word of life. I beg that you will read it and find this out for yourselves—read, not little snatches here and there, but long passages that will really be the road to the heart of it. You will find it full of real men and women not only, but also of the things you have wondered about and been troubled about all your life as men have been always; and the more you read the more it will become plain to you what things are worth while and what are not, what things make men happy—loyalty, right dealing, speaking the truth, readiness to give everything for what they think their duty, and most of all, the wish that they may have the real approval of the Christ, who gave everything for them—and the things that are guaranteed to make men unhappy—selfishness, cowardice, greed and everything that is low and mean. When you have read the Bible you will know that it is the word of God, because you will have found it the key to your heart, your own happiness, and your own duty."

THE UNSEEN LOVER.

When Dan Crawford, the missionary, went from America to Africa, he studied carefully his fellow-travelers on the ocean. He wrote back to a friend: "We have first-class passengers here whose life is one dismal yawn. They have no Christ and no 'hope of glory,' so the air is electric with irritation." In contrast, he wrote also of a lively girl who was a faithful follower of Jesus Christ, that she wore a locket about her neck, which bore not a portrait but the words: "Whom having not seen I love." It is when we have the consciousness of the Unseen Lover with us that life becomes diffused with the spirit of contentment.—Selected.

One means very effectual for the preservation of health is a quiet and cheerful mind, not afflicted with violent passions or distracted with immoderate cares.—John Ray.

—Three men, an Irishman, a Swede, and a Hebrew, were brought to court. The Hebrew was arrested for stealing a cow, the Swede for stealing a horse, and the Irishman for stealing a wagon.

"Well," said the judge, turning to the Hebrew, "where did you get the cow?"

"I've had it since it was a calf," was the reply.

"Where did you get the horse?" he asked the Swede.

"I've had it since it was a colt," replied the Swede.

"And, Patrick, where did you get the wagon?"

"Oh, Your Honor, I've had it since it was a wheelbarrow."—Selected.

"BOYS WILL BE BOYS."Many of Them Become Splendid Men.*By Rev. Luther K. Long.

"I do not worry over Howard," said the mother of a seven-year-old boy, as we were discussing her son. "I learned my lesson while caring for my small brother at home. I was afraid he never would learn to be a clean child. He was so careless about his face and ears, I had to be after him with a washcloth most of the time. Then he came to the age when he looked after himself. Now he is as neat and orderly a young man as you could wish to see. I think it will be the same with Howard. I work for him and I teach him, but I do not worry about him."

Pastor Lippincott and I had walked out into the woods and were sitting on a grassy slope overlooking a valley in which a herd of dairy cows were peacefully grazing. "Tell me," I suggested, "the stories of some of the boys and young men you have had to do with in your several parishes."

Lying on his back, his long legs extending down the slope toward the stream while his head rested on his clasped hands, he began to reminisce:

Joe.

"I am glad to begin the list with Joe," gazing thoughtfully into the depths of a passing cloud. "When I became pastor of the Gun River church, many years ago, this lad was a senior in high school. He had already united with the church and was a worker in the Endeavor society. We had a janitor who neglected his work shamefully. He had to be discharged. Joe volunteered to care for the house of worship for the small remuneration that was being paid. He did his work well, put in a lot of extra time, greatly increased the comfort and enjoyment of the congregation, felt a sort of proprietorship in the building and grounds, made his work a means of grace, and he grew in the respect and confidence of all the people. This work, begun and continued in a spirit of devotion, was one of the best possible means of permanently tying Joe to the church. All through the years since then he has been faithful, specially interested in church buildings and grounds. Wherever he goes he attaches himself to the church, attends its services, enjoys its fellowship, and aids in promoting its interests."

Bob.

"When I think of Bob I instinctively 'Look and Listen.' He may be nearby—'pulling off' one of his mischievous pranks. Bob's father was a prominent man in the community; and the boy began public life early. That was the trouble. Everybody knew him, and he knew everybody. He was everywhere—seeing everything there was to see and hearing all that was said. This sort of life is bad for any boy: Bob knew too much, he was bold, he was fearless in the face of any obstacles standing in the way of the mischief on which his heart was set. At the age of eleven he, along with several others, indicated his desire to unite with the church. His mother came to see me. She was anxious about him. She had no illusions concerning his being an angel—she wanted the best thing done for his moral and religious welfare. Though attending our church and working in some of its organizations, she was not a member—being still connected with a denomination not represented in the community. She told me that when an older son had become interested she had discouraged his joining the church. She was sure that had been a mistake on her part. She now proposed to be received at the same time as Bob, in case I thought best, and she was desirous of making every possible effort to hold the boy's interest. They were received. Bob's wings did not sprout at once, he still had time for a lot of mischief, he needed considerable rope and sometimes got things tangled. With the aid of the church and the home over the 'slippery places of youth' God 'led him up to man.' He is now a well-established, responsible physician."

Larry.

"While I am speaking of waywardness perhaps it is best to refer to one case that has not, so far, come out well. When I think of Larry I am impressed with the truth of the saying, 'There are no bad boys, only good boys gone wrong.' Larry had certain pleasing, attractive and generous qualities. But he was morally weak, and it had been the custom at home to humor him; his mother never could be 'hard on him.' He got into a serious bit of trouble at school, and misrepresented the facts in order to clear himself. Thinking to help the family I went to his mother and proposed that she bring pressure to bear on Larry to induce him to make a clean breast of the matter—offering to take it up with the boy himself, if she thought that advisable. But she wanted no help. Larry was all right. Others were lying about him. There were plenty of boys worse than he. The fact was that Larry's misconduct could, and should, have been entirely isolated and treated without reference to what other boys had done. I felt that the mother did a far greater injury to the boy than his own conduct had done. He had gone wrong, and she stood in the way of his recovery. He was not prosecuted, but he lost his standing in the community. The family soon moved away. The last I knew of Larry he was serving a long-term sentence in a far-western penitentiary."

James and Clark.

"Two boys are inseparable in my thought of them as they were, for a number of years, inseparable in their lives. James and Clark were not in the same grade in school, they did not belong to the same social strata, they were not of the same type of mind. Yet they were fond of each other and spent a great deal of time together. They united with the church at the same time, belonged to the same Sunday school class, went off together on hikes and bicycle trips. They were very helpful to their pastor. If he wanted a message carried, or help with a stereopticon entertainment, they were always to be depended upon. One went to college, the other stopped with high school, they married about the same time, living some hundreds of miles apart they do not often see each other but their loving interest never has failed. These boys have been 'regular fellers,' full of life and activity. At the same time they have never forgotten the church, they stand by, accepting responsibility and bearing burdens. They never caused me any trouble or anxiety when I was their pastor, and I have never heard of their bringing grief to any other minister. All their strength and influence have been given to help the churches and communities where they have lived."

Nathaniel B.

"The young man who rendered me the greatest amount of helpful personal service in connection with his work in the church was Nathaniel B., or N. B., as we almost always called him." This was in reply to a question from me with regard to a young man of whom I had heard him speak frequently. Pastor Lippincott went on:

"When I became pastor of the Salem church N. B. was its treasurer, and he continued to serve in that office during all the years of my pastorate. He was busy, both at home and in the office of a large corporation, yet he found time to do thoroughly his church work. He did not confine himself to receiving and paying out the funds of the church. He solicited subscriptions, saw that they were paid, and was largely responsible for repairs on the church and parsonage properties. He knew how to approach people. At two different times during my stay extensive alterations and repairs were made on the church building. N. B. solicited and collected the money. I congratulated him on his success. He came back with the generous statement, 'Oh, it is easy to get money when the pastor has created the right atmosphere.' The old custom of renting pews still prevailed. Some of us thought that should be done away with. The trustees agreed that if the treasurer could manage the income, the change should be brought about. Only two pew holders were opposed. 'What would you say if I raised $500 more than the pew rent amounts to?' he asked them. If he did that they would accept the free-pew plan. As N. B. already knew where the extra $500 would come from, the change was made—and a substantial sum was added to the pastor's salary. I shall never forget how interested he was in getting my goods into the parsonage when I moved there, how careful he was to have the house in good condition, some help on hand to speed settling, a supply of fuel to start with, and an offer of money in advance to tide over the extra expense connected with a long move. I tried to think of these kindnesses as intended not so much for my personal benefit as to make my service to the community more effective. There was that element no doubt, but, as the years went by, I became convinced that N. B. was also my personal friend, and loved and served me for my own sake. He will always have a warm place in my heart."

"How about the women? Paul found some of them very helpful. What has been your experience?" I asked.

"There is a good story about the women," he smiled. "We shall have that later."

Taking a last look at the wooded hills beyond the grazing cows, Pastor Lippincott and I wended our way back to the village.

When we plant with a selfish motive, the fruit is apt to be disappointment and pain.

We need to go to the side of truth more for our own good than for the good of truth.

PROF. J. A. W. THOMPSON.

William Thornton Whitsett

" 'Tis sweet, as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse
How grows in Paradise our store."

"Is there anything in the world to be compared to friendship? Can any treasure in this transitory pilgrimage be of more value than a friend?"

Prof. James Alexander Wilson Thompson was born September 11, 1853, and departed his life March 30, 1925. He was the son of John and Sabrina Thompson, and was born at the old Thompson home in Alamance county, N. C. He was educated at the Bingham School of Orange county, and at the University of North Carolina. Early in life he was married to Miss Virginia Isabel Roberson of his native county. Four children were born to this union,—Jewel Belle, Prince Battle, Grace Albene, and Mabel Joy,—all dying while still in early childhood. Professor Thompson was a life-long member of the Salem Methodist Protestant church located near Saxapahaw in Alamance county. He was an active and loyal member of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics. He leaves a devoted wife, and a host of friends to mourn his death. These facts give but a faint idea of the life of this devoted man, and only those who knew his ambitions and his struggles will be able to appreciate the great work that was embraced in the limits of his days of activity while here on earth.

His Work as Educator.

In 1881 he began his work as superintendent of Oakdale Academy located in southern Alamance, and during the following six years he so impressed its patronage, and enlarged its courses of study that he placed it among the few first-class boarding schools of North Carolina of that day. Students were drawn to his school from all sections of the State, and even from beyond the borders of North Carolina. It took rank with the best of the older boarding schools of the State, and hundreds of young men and young women were prepared for college and for the activities of life. The school so increased in numbers and influence that in order to secure better and larger buildings and more conveniences in 1887 the school was removed to Siler City, N. C., and the name changed to The Thompson School. Here his success continued for the following ten years, until 1897, when from ill-health and other causes he was forced to lay down the work that he loved so well, and to which he had given nearly twenty years of the most devoted service.

Scattered throughout North Carolina and other States are many of the leading men and women of our day whose preparation was received either at Oakdale Academy, or at the Thompson School, and whose lives were greatly influenced for higher and better things by the fine oversight that Professor Thompson always delighted to give to every student under his charge. His work was done in a day when the public school was still short in term, and poor in quality, and his school was one of the few schools open to those who aspired to the best in educational matters in that day of North Carolina's educational beginnings.

His Power to Influence and Direct.

Any person who has had much experience with schools and with teachers has come to know that while many have the education necessary to impart instruction, there are but few who work in the school-room who have the rare ability to inspire, and to give to students the proper ambition for higher and better things. Professor Thompson possessed in unusual measure the power to influence his students, and by gaining their respect, their love, and their enthusiastic support, he soon gained the position in their minds that enabled him to point and lead them onward to higher and better things. This was one of the very strongest points in his whole career, and it is the testimony of his former students that he exerted a wonderful influence over the lives of those entrusted to his educational care.

His Christian Example.

But few of the teachers of the State in his day had a more powerful and direct Christian influence upon those around him. He was a sincere Christian, who carried his idea of Christianity into every act and thought of his life. While he made no attempt at sectarian bias, or denominational tendencies, still he was not content to allow any one around him to be overlooked as to the great fundamentals of the Christian faith. Had he not been a Christian teacher, he could have been nothing else than a Christian minister; and it was always a question with his close friends as to whether he should have been at work in the school-room, or in the pulpit. In fact, he set up his pulpit in his school-room, and his students testify that he preached and lived such a fine type of Christian faith, that they could not help being influenced by his word and deed. Hundreds will never forget the hours he spent in discourses before them, pleading with them for the best things that could come only through a strong Christian faith and life. Herein lay one of his greatest powers with the young.

His Life Ambition.

Prof. J. A. W. Thompson never dreamed of becoming a rich man in the stocks and bonds of this world's wealth. While he had one of the best patronized boarding schools of North Carolina for many years, still he found too many young people without means for an education that they greatly desired; too many young men wanting preparation for the ministry, for teaching, and for other good work,—too many in need with but scant means to resist the desire to help them at the expense of his own financial gain. It will never be known how many thousands of dollars he virtually gave to help educate worthy and deserving students. He and his faithful and devoted wife never turned a deaf ear to those who called for help. Tuition was given, board was given, books were given, that the worthy might not be denied the possibilities that could only be opened by education and training.

His Work Lives On.

He has passed from among us. In peace he now sleeps in the old home burial ground of the Thompson family in his native county, near the ashes of the members of his family for generations back. He had his sorrows, and heavy they were! A devoted brother, trained in his school, and graduating from the University of North Carolina, died in early life; and Professor Thompson could not explain his passing by any earthly philosophy. He was called upon to carry to the grave one by one each of his four little children, and again he could not understand why he must suffer such loss and grief. But in all this, and in other sorrows, he was sustained by the same faith and Christian fortitude that he had pointed out to others as the only sure support for life's vicissitudes. Disease laid its hand upon him; long and suffering hours in hospitals followed; but he never forgot "Him who had loved him, and given Himself for him." His dreams and aspirations live in the lives of those who knew him, and were influenced by him in the years of his labor among the youth of the State.

"O may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence; live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night
like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues."

—George Eliot.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.A Happy Ten Days.

June 15 to June 24 inclusive was spent at the Children's Home and at the High Point College in conferences with the pastors and with the young people. It was a busy time, but a happy time for all who participated in these conferences. I take it that a full report from each conference will be made by others. It was a genuine pleasure to mingle with the ministers and with their happy, consecrated young people for the ten days. All who attended will be the better fitted for Christian service in the days to come.

The young preachers who took the course arranged for them expressed very great appreciation of the course and of their teachers. This course will help men who care to be ordained to an earlier ordination.

The College.

We feel that the young people's conference which was held in the College buildings will be worth much to the College in the days to come.

This is the time to enroll students for the College for the term beginning in September. Fortunate will be those boys and girls who sign up for the High Point College.

Also please look up the Herald for June 25, and turn to page 5 and study carefully the statements made by our treasurer, Mr. J. Norman Wills, and respond to this worthy appeal as speedily and as strongly as possible. The Lord has led us on to do so well, that, for His dear sake we must do better.

All Praying.

Pray for the College and for its success in every way, and especially pray that we may have a fine student body at the High Point College for the next college year.

Also, let us all join very earnestly in prayer for the rich blessings of the dear Lord upon our many churches which will be in the midst of their revival work during the next four months.

Just four months of the conference year remains in which to finish up the year's work. We will take much faithful and prayerful effort to accomplish all we started out to accomplish when we entered upon the year's work immediately after the close of the last annual conference.

Sunday, June 28, was spent on Guilford College. By special invitation Mrs. Dixon spoke at three of the churches on Guilford, assisting Rev. C. H. Whitaker in arousing an interest in the circuit rally to be held at Vickery church on Thursday, August 13. We believe they will have a large crowd that day with an interesting and helpful meeting.

Appointments.

July 4 and 5, Weaverville, District Rally.
July 8, P. M., English Street.
July 12, West Thomasville, Opening Service of New Church.
July 12, P. M., Saxapahaw.
July 19, Effland, Home-Coming Day.
Yours in the Master's service,
A. G. Dixon.

A. C. B.

One day during a battle the general asked where one of his faithful officers was and a soldier replied, "He is fighting on the left." The general said, "I knew he was fighting, I only asked where." We knew we could depend on Mt. Pleasant to go over the top. We have a combination there—pastor and people that love to do things for the Lord, so they go over. Well done, Mt. Pleasant, thank you. Charlotte goes over the top on the G. C. B., reporting the amount sent in by the missionary societies. I stated some time ago that where a church goes over counting the missionary societies' work we would publish them over." Charlotte has done this and is the second one over the top on both budgets. Isn't that fine work? Just a little past the middle of the year and all obligations on both budgets paid in full. The Lord must joy over these with singing (Zeph. 3:17).

Three new names appear on the list this week, Shelby, Caroleen and Chatham. Democrat enters the A. C. B., and Union Grove the G. C. B. This leaves only seven not heard from on one or the other of the budgets. Mt. Pleasant's going over the top sent all the rest one higher than they would have been, and leaves Forsyth leading on the A. C. B., while Charlotte's going over let all below them up one from what they would have been, with Concord still leading.

Shelby entered the A. C. B. at 33, Caroleen at 51, Chatham at 53, and Democrat at 60. Forsyth merits special mention for fine contributions on both budgets, gaining first place on the A. C. B. and second on the G. C. B. That is fine work. This was the best weekly report yet. Eight charges sent contributions on both budgets. Mt. Pleasant not only paid out on A. C. B., but sent $100 on the G. C. B. First Church, High Point, made a good gain, going from 26 to 7. That was fine, High Point. Mt. Hermon went from 30 to 23. That was fine. Flat Rock from 51 to 29. Siler City from 52 to 38, Mecklenburg from 62 to 37, Democrat from 66 to 64 and Union Grove left the foot of the list and went above Midland. This is all good work. We are looking for more just like it next week. It will be interesting to see who will head the lists next week. The time is growing short and "we must work while it is day."

THE NEW BOY UP GOOSE LANE.

By Minnie Leona Upton.

When Peterkin is all curled up, taking a nap, you might easily mistake him for a handsome yellow-fur cap, round and soft and shining. But when his nap is over and he uncuddles you see at once that he is only a kitten—one of the finest kittens in the world to be sure—but after all a kitten is no more than a kitten. When Peterkin waves his golden plume of a tail and looks up at you with his big, mischievous blue eyes and says "Prrrrr!" you can easily understand how glad Poppy Parker is that he belongs to her. So you know how she felt the other day when she heard him calling for help from the top of a tall young maple tree.

No one knows why Peterkin climbed so high. One of the neighborhood dogs might have frightened him, but that seemed unlikely, since all of them are good friends. Perhaps a strange dog came along.

Anyway, there he was, very much frightened and fluffed up, and the question was how to get him down. The limb was too slender for any one of the neighborhood boys to climb out on, and also too slender to rest a ladder against. When Poppy called coaxingly, Peterkin seemed to be puzzled and perplexed, and only crawled farther the wrong way.

"What shall we do!" quavered Poppy. And her mother and grandmother Parker said, "What shall we do?" None of the neighbors who had come out to look could think of a single thing.

And just then along came a boy, a square, stubby boy, shy and in patched clothes, but with a steady look in his blue eyes. It was Tommy Doane, "the new boy," whose father and mother had just moved into the old house up Goose Lane. He stopped and thrust his hands into his bulging pockets. "Does he sleep in a basket?" he asked.

"Y-yes!" answered Poppy.

"All right; then you bring it out and bring a long rope—a clothesline would be just the thing."

Poppy ran into the house and came out with the basket and the rope. Then Tommy, who had been exploring his pockets, pulled out a ball of twine. He unwound some of it, drew back, squinted up at Peterkin, and threw the ball. Up, up it went, sailed over Peterkin's limb just in front of his nose and came down into Tommy's hand. Then Tommy tied the end in his hand to an end of the line and began to wind the twine back on the ball. The clothesline began to rise, and soon the end tied to the twine was over the limb. Tommy kept on winding, and in half a minute the line was within reach. With quick strong fingers, he tied it to the basket. Then he took up the clothesline reel, and began to wind it up until the basket was right in front of Peterkin.

What a happy, understanding little "Meow" Peterkin gave! Then he crept cautiously forward and down into his own dear basket. Then Tomy unwound the line from the reel—"paying it out," he called it—and down, down, down came the basket while Poppy held up her arms to get Peterkin safe in them as soon as possible.

Then Grandfather Parker fished a shining silver dollar from his pocket and said, "This is for you, my boy."

"Not much!" Tommy spluttered; "I mean, 'No, thank you!' I don't take pay for anything like that!"

Then Grandfather Parker thanked him, and Tommy, conscious of his shabby cap, ran off down the road.

After that every one was in a hurry to get acquainted with "the new boy up Goose Lane."—Selected.

Mrs. W. A. Bowman, one of Guilford county's best loved women, and wife of Mr. W. A. Bowman, who for several years represented Guilford county in the State Legislature, and prominent farmer in southeastern Guilford, died March 23, 1925, in a hospital in Greensboro. With only her husband, one sister and a few other close relatives gathered at the bedside, she peacefully slipped away, just as the sun was casting its early glow across the eastern hills, as though providence timed the passing of this saintly soul. The rising sun certainly gives at least a picture of what transpires as one who trusts in Jesus Christ as she did, passes into the celestial morning of a brighter day. Her sun is now rising, not setting, her day just beginning, not ending, her life just started, not done. She gave abundant evidence of this only a day or two before she took her departure. She often expressed her willingness to go, saying that Jesus could make a dyin' bed soft as down pillows are, and would sing "I'll soon be at home over there, for the end of my journey I see,

Many dear to my heart, over there, as watching and waiting for me."

Then, too, just as Mrs. Bowman was crossing the valley, a little bird perched on a limb near the window sang so sweetly, as though a accompanying the music that must have thrilled her soul as she entered that land of perfect music and heard the angels playing on the harps of gold.

Mrs. Bowman was a woman of love character, unassuming in her manners, kind, all, and loved by all. She was a leader in her community and in her church, and always stood for the betterment of the social condition in her county. Though her body be dead, she still lives in the hearts of those who knew her.

For several years she was a patient sufferer, as grim disease laid his unrelenting hand on her many years ago, and during all the years of suffering, she concealed her sufferings as much as it was possible and strived to live for others, and the happiness of her family.

Before her marriage she was Miss Mart E. (Bettie) Greeson, daughter of the late M. and Mrs. Thomas Rankin Greeson, of Clinton, N. C., who only about two years ago preceded her to the spirit world. She was married Mr. Bowman August 1, 1888, and had been helpmate worthy of the name. To this union three children were born.

Mrs. Bowman is survived by her husband Mr. W. A. Bowman, two sons, Roy L. and Grady Bowman of Liberty, N. C., one daughter, Mrs. George Sockwell of Burlington, N. C., one brother, Mr. John T. Greeson of Clinton, N. C., three sisters, Mrs. J. H. Bown of Liberty, N. C., Mrs. W. Charles Kirk of Pleasant Garden, N. C., and Mrs. D. Neese of High Point, N. C. All these have our heartfelt sympathy, and especially do our hearts go out to the husband and children those who feel the loss greatest.

Interment was at Pleasant Union Methodist Protestant church, where early in life she consecrated herself to Jesus Christ, and united with his church. The floral offerings were many and beautiful, attesting the high esteem in which her many friends held her. Funeral was conducted by Dr. T. M. Johnson, Mebane, assisted by Rev. G. F. Millaw, Rev. J. A. Burgess, Rev. J. R. Hutton, F. L. W. Gerringer, there being several other ministers present.

She was a faithful and consecrated member of her church until she was called home, always giving in unstinted measure the best service she was capable of rendering. Truly she will be missed in her church, in home, and in her community, but all have blessed consolation that our loss is her eternal gain.

DOING, BUT NOT DONE YET.

The statistical secretary of the General Conference reported through the church papers in March that, so far as he could ascertain, our denomination had 1902 Sunday schools.

We have put forth extra efforts to have all the Sunday schools hold a Children's Day service, and at this date, June 24, the number of schools that have sent for the supplies, and thus planned to hold a service, 967.

That is a larger number of orders in the same period than has been received since I became secretary, but that represents only 16 more Sunday schools than half the number the statistical secretary reports we have.

While there may be reasons for some schools not being able to hold a service, it seems reasonable to infer that very many more could hold a service than have sent for the supplies.

For all such I beg to state that there is ample time to do two things. Send me your order at Berwyn, Md., stating how many music pamphlets your school needs, and we will add the other supplies, and they will be sent to you free of all cost, and promptly.

2. Ample time to prepare for holding a service which will be interesting, and will be a joy to your young people, and a great satisfaction to your entire church.

You can hold the service any time which best suits your local conditions, provided you do not delay too long, and interfere with the Rally Day service of the Board of Education.

It will put your Sunday school among the front rank schools, and will enable you to render needed aid in maintaining your own foreign missionary work in Japan, China and India.

Yes, your own foreign missionary work, because our church, like every other church that bears the name of Jesus Christ, is a foreign missionary society, and, as you are a member of the church so you are a member of the foreign missionary society, and you must do all you can to make a success of the work its Great Head, Jesus Christ, ordered it to do—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

As superintendent you have a wonderful sphere of service, for by holding a Children's Day service, using the free supplies furnished by the Union Board, you impart information of our church's work, instill the missionary spirit in the young, help to lay foundations of a greater church, and by the offering you aid in doing Christ's will by developing the work abroad which He has blessed.

We need your school to help pass the 1,000 order, and so worthily celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the Children's Day service, and honor the memory of the secretary who introduced it into our schools, Rev. F. T. Tagg.

To express appreciation of efforts, and to increase missionary interest, we will give a set of the beautiful pictures, 10x14 inches, entitled "The Call of the World," or "India" to each school which sends to the conference treasurer, not to me, $50 or more, while the quantity we have lasts. There are eight pictures in the first, and six in the other set.

Remember we have ordered two large, beautiful embroidered banners in Japan, one to be awarded to the school that sends in the largest amount for foreign missions, the other to the school sending the largest amount in proportion to membership, so send the number of your school to your conference treasurer when sending him the offering, and be sure to tell him it is the Children's Day offering, or the Union Board may not get it.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN

The Home Missionary unit is no longer the frontier only. This work has been broadened to include every possible phase of organized Christian work in America, including not only the work on the frontier, but work in town and country in the older sections of the land, work in the city, among the mountains, special work for the immigrant, the Indian, the Negro, and other special peoples. Everything which is a part of the duty of the church of Jesus Christ in America today, is a part of the business of the several boards of home missions of the various denominations. This article will be given to a discussion of the rural church.

In the early history of our country, the farmer built the churches, provided the ministers and initiated the revivals. Until this day, the great majority of the ministers, and of the leading laymen both in city and country, are country bred. But there is no assurance that the farmer will continue to be the inspiration for all the religious life of the land. The country was first because the farm preceded the store, the mill, and the factory. The oldest churches in most of our cities were the mothers of churches as the cities grew, and the membership of both the mother churches and the branches was recruited from the rural congregations.

But to a surprising degree the leadership has passed from the country. Occupations have left the country. Nearly all the trades have been moved from the rural shops to the city factory. In many sections only the working farmer is left. The church and the school have remained with the farmer, and have suffered with him. There are 750 abandoned churches in Missouri, 800 in Ohio, and 1700 in Illinois. Other states have a similar report to give. The circuit rider built these churches, and did it with splendid consecration and untiring service. But he lived with the farmers, and many times engaged in agricultural operations himself. The modern country minister is a town or city dweller. The churches which the circuit rider built, the absentee minister cannot maintain. In Ohio, perhaps an average state, only six open country churches out of a hundred have the full-time service of a resident minister. Only a resident minister can have the intimate and sympathetic knowledge of the local parish which is essential to a successful ministry. The resident pastor holds the key, and the future of the country church rests with him.

A third difficulty in the country church is lack of co-ordination. The farmer is too often an individualist, accustomed to making his own plans, and accepting no suggestions from others. Co-operative effort is necessary to a successful church.

A fourth consideration should be presented here. In many instances the rural church suffers from a narrow outlook, with a limited field of service and work. Too often its effort for self-perpetuation consumes the entire force of the organization. The work ends where it began. If the country church is to survive and grow, it must serve the community in all of its interests, and be an active partner in the general missionary and educational work of the denomination of which it is a recognized part. The rural church has an unparalleled opportunity of service.

STUDENTS ARE BEST PREACHERS.

The students in the theological seminaries are preaching sermons seventy per cent better than those of ordained ministers, according to the Rev. Dr. John Barlow, of the Memorial Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. Dr. Barlow believes that the undergraduates are approaching the modern needs of religion with a freshness of viewpoint that augurs a brighter future for the Churches of America.

"I have just finished reviewing several hundred sermons composed by undergraduate students of the theological seminaries for the annual homiletic review contest," says Dr. Barlow, "and the average of these sermons, I think, is 70 per cent higher than the average of those sent in by the ordained ministers for the last competition."

"It is one of the most encouraging things to see the earnest, thoughtful ability of the young men who are coming up to take our pulpits in the next few years. They seem to have a soothing understanding of the unrest that is rampant, and project their thoughts with force and convictions."

Our churches will surely have a bright future when they are committed to this body of really splendid and able young preachers. They are a great hope for the Churches of America."

E. Jerome Johanson, of the Hartford Theological Seminary, is announced as the winner of the homiletic prize for the best sermon by an undergraduate theological student. Mr. Johanson's theme is "The Hiding of God."

Carl H. Wilhelm, of the Yale Divinity School, is awarded second prize for his paper, "The Revealing Darkness," and Ernest A. Hull, of Drew Theological Seminary, is ranked third with his theme, "His Hands." The sermons will be published in a future issue of the Homiletic Review, a magazine that is devoted to the interests of ministers.

Five minutes spent in Bible reading and prayer at the beginning of each day will have a wonderful influence in molding the character and strengthening one for his daily tasks.

—The funeral of Brother R. L. Dwiggin was conducted at the Kernersville church last Friday by his pastor, Rev. Edw. Suits, assisted by Rev. L. W. Gerringer.

—Calvary church has a new pulpit Bible, a gift of the daughters of Rev. T. F. McCulloch in honor of their parents. The same church has a new baptismal silver bowl, a gift of Mrs. Riddick in honor of her father, Rev. J. R. Ball, who was instrumental in securing the building of the first Methodist Protestant church in Greensboro.

THE PREACHER AND RELIGIOUS MUSIC.

Music's Spell.

By Rev. E. L. Ballard.

Music—oh, how faint, how weak!

Language fades before thy spell!

Why should feeling ever speak,

When thou canst breathe her soul so well?

Friendship's balmy words may feign—

Love's are e'en more false than they;

Oh, 'tis only music's strain

Can sweetly soothe and not betray.

—Moore (On Music).

The power and value of music in human experience is inestimable. Various feelings are aroused within the human breast by the sounds of music. Laughter may be turned into tears, and sadness may be transformed into joy. Soft sweet music may quiet an aching heart or soothe a troubled breast. Vivacious music may awaken a sleeping soul or instil animation into an indolent being. Vast audiences have been moved to tears, or stirred to action, by the use of this divine power. Soldiers have been inspired to battle and victory by the stirring music of the horns, flutes, and drums. Souls by the thousands have been swept into the Kingdom of God by the impelling force of the human voice.

Pope tells us in verse:

"Music the fiercest grief can charm,

And fate's severest rage disarm,

Music can soften pain to ease,

And make despair and madness please;

Our joys below it can improve,

And antedate the bliss above."

(St. Cecilia's Day).

Oh, where may be found words or expression adequate to give music its deserving commendation? Is there a man upon whom music has no power whatever? Shakespeare pronounces a verdict upon him:

"The man that hath no music in himself,

Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds;

Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils;

The motions of his spirit are dull as night,

And his affections dark as Erebus;

Let no such man be trusted."

(Merchant of Venice.)

Music is the oldest and most natural of all the fine arts, and, therefore, is found among all nations, however ignorant of every other art. No art is exercising such a strong influence over the human race at the present time as the art of music. It has become so thoroughly a part of our existence, that we rarely pause to consider to what extent we are, as it were, enveloped in its sweet sounds, or how irremediable its loss would be to us.

It is immortal. Its origin is unknown, and its finality will never come. George P. Upton has this to say: "Music was the first sound heard in the creation, when the morning stars sang together. It was the first sound heard at the birth of Christ, when the angels sang together above the plains of Bethlehem. It is the universal language, which appeals to the universal heart of mankind. It greets our entrance into this world, and solemnizes our departure. Its thrill pervades all nature—in the hum of the tiniest insect, in the tops of the wind-smitten pines, in the solemn diapason of the ocean. And there must come a time when it will be the only suggestion left of our human nature and the creation, since it alone, of all things on earth, is known in heaven. The human soul and music are alone eternal." (Woman in Music).

The Hebrews were eminently musical people. Their history is full of illustrations of this feature of their national character and life. Their literature is a monument of it; for a large portion of their poetry was conceived in the form of psalmody or sacred lyric song. The Hebrew nation made no claim to the invention of music or musical instruments, but assigned to it an antiquity as remote as the antediluvian days of Jubal, who was "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." (Genesis 4:21.) The inventor of musical instruments, therefore, like the first poet and the first forger of metals, was a Cainite.

It is true that the posterity of Jacob learned much in arts and sciences from the Egyptians, with whom they sojourned for such a long time, yet it is reasonable to suppose that they were indebted to that ingenious and inventive people for some further progress in the art of music. Their exodus from Egypt, which was their birthday as a nation, was an event celebrated by the outburst both of poetry and song. On the banks of the Red Sea, Moses and the children of Israel sang their triumphal song of deliverance from the hosts of Egypt; and Miriam, in celebration of the same event, exercised one of her functions as a prophetess by leading a procession of the women of the camp, chanting in chorus the burden of the song of Moses, "Sing ye to Jehovah, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

The wild cries and shouts, which reached the ears of Moses and Joshua, as they came down from the mount, sounded to the latter as the din of battle, the voices of victor and vanquished blending in one harsh chorus. But the quicker sense of Moses discerned the rough music with which the people worshiped the visible representation of the God that brought them out of Egypt. The song of Deborah and Barak is cast in a distinctly metrical accompaniment as one of the people's songs like that with which Jephthah's daughter and her companions met her father on his victorious return. (Jud. 7.)

During the period of Samuel, David and Solomon, a simpler form of music was used. As an example, we have the simple impromptu with which the women from the cities of Israel greeted David after the slaughter of the Philistines, which was apparently struck off on the spur of the moment. With the establishment of the Schools of the Prophets, a systematic cultivation of music among the Hebrews supplied a great need. Music was an essential part of the practice of the students. Saul had, at intervals, recourse to the soothing influence of David's harp. David seemed to have gathered around him "singing men and singing women." Solomon did the same. But the temple was the great school of music, and it was consecrated to its highest service in the worship of Jehovah. The position which the tribe of Levi occupied among the other tribes naturally favored the cultivation of the art of music.

Not only in the Temple, but in their synagogues and in their dwellings the Jews celebrated God with sacred hymns. From them the use of music and choral singing was adopted by the primitive Christians. Christ himself, in His final interview with His disciples before His crucifixion, sang with them the customary paschal songs at the institution of the Sacrament, and by His example sanctified the use of the sacred songs in the Christian church. Paul and Silas, lacerated by the cruel scourging which they had received, in close confinement in the inner prison, prayed and sang praises to God at midnight. (Acts 16:25). The use of psalms and hymns and spiritual songs is moreover directed upon the churches by the apostle as an essential part of religious devotions. (Col. 3:16; Eph. 5:14, 19; Jas. 5:13.) Persecuted and afflicted—in solitary cells of the prison, in the more dismal abodes of the mines to which they were doomed, or as wandering exiles in foreign countries—they forgot not to sing the Lord's song.

In their songs of Zion, both old and young men and women bore a part. Chrysostom says: "It was the ancient custom, as it is still with us, for all to come together, and unitedly to join in singing. The young and old, the rich and poor, male and female, bond and free, all join in one song. All worldly distinctions here cease, and the whole congregation form one general chorus."

Hence, we observe that music formed a vital part of the services of worship all through past ages, as well as served as a medium of expression of various feelings aroused within the soul. Today it maintains its place in our public worship.

In assembling for worship, certain means of grace are enjoyed, such as the preaching of the gospel, partaking of the Sacrament, praying, singing, and meditation.

Music, whether that of the organ or other instrument, singing of the choir, soloist or congregation, is of untold value if properly employed. The organist or performer possessing a deep religious experience; the soloist or choir singing with an intelligent interpretation of their song; the congregation voicing their own experiences through the hymns; will feel, and cause others to feel their souls exalted above the commonplace of life, and be conscious that the very atmosphere they breathe is perfumed with the presence of God.

Singing is not always regarded with the proper degree of sacredness, nor is there derived from it its full benefit by singers as well as listeners. The tendency in church music today is to drift away from the standard hymn tunes of old and adopt the "catchy" popular airs of modern songs. The latter may be used to some advantage, but the productions of the minds of such men as Simeon B. Marsh, composer of the music which we sing to "Jesus, Lover of My Soul"; John E. Gould, whose music we sing to "Jesus, Savior, Pilot Me"; Lowell Mason, who wrote the music to "Nearer, My God to Thee"; Thomas Hastings, who composed the music to "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me"; and others, will always strike responsive chords in the hearts of devout worshippers. "The effect of good music is not caused by its novelty. On the contrary, it strikes us more, the more familiar we are with it." So speaks Goethe.

Henry Ward Beecher says: "Singing is that natural method by which thoughts are re-

THE SIGNATURE OF GOD.

By Emily J. Bryant.

Finely wrought and rare with jewels
Is the veil over Nature laid,
O'er seas and skies and fields and fells,
O'er mountains tall and valleys staid.
Touched with grace and toned to duty
Is this web of matchless beauty.

The holy light of stars shines down
On everlasting hills below,
The flashing light and grewsome shade
Are spread over uplands and low,
That we may see each wondrous hour
The unfoldings of His power.

The pebbly brook, the moss-grown seat,
The opening bud, the closing bloom,
The silence stealing soft and sweet
Are wrought in nature's mighty loom
To lead our thoughts to God above
And trace His goodness and His love.

The grand cathedral of the wood,
The sapphire blue of morning's dawn,
The deep-toned music of the sea,
The dazzling on evening's lawn,
Are touches of the Master's rod.
These—the signature of God.

(Patriotic Consecration Meeting.)

A Belated Fourth Meeting

"Observe the Fourth of July the day after the fourth. Sometimes we observe a holiday the day before and sometimes the day after so as to avoid Sunday, this time let's observe it the day after in order to hit Sunday. It will be easy to have the society room decorated in the patriotic colors. Sing patriotic hymns. Ask an outside speaker to talk on the subject: "After America's First Fourth." Urge all church members to participate in a program that recognizes the spiritual element in our Fourth. We celebrate the political every year, this year let's make a great thing of the spiritual significance."

Fully Surrendered to God.

A friend once said to Mr. D. L. Moody, "God never has had a man so fully consecrated to Him that He could use him as He would." After a few moments of thought Mr. Moody replied, "God shall have D. L. Moody to do His will in so far as D. L. Moody can know God's will." We all know how D. L. Moody after that was used wonderfully of God to accomplish great things for the Kingdom. What is true in individual life is fully true in national life. If a nation fully followed the will of God and performed His commands it would be invincibly prosperous, and equally invincibly powerful both in influence for right and to withstand any attacks from outside enemies. Prosperity would bless every home and every occupation and every worker. A nation obedient to divine law never needs to hunt prosperity but prospers as naturally as trees and flowers grow, for it is God's order of things.

True Happiness.

When an individual serves God faithfully he is the happiest that it is possible for him to be. His happiness is wholesome and there are no regrets with it, there is no sorrow to any one else or heartache anywhere but his happiness is of the genuine kind that lasts always. Just so with a nation. If the national life is lived in accordance with the teaching of God's Word it will be wholesome for the entire nation and for all other nations. There would be no need for war, hence no war; and I verily believe there would not be the suffering from what we term natural causes, such as storms, earthquakes, floods, etc. Just as true happiness comes to an individual through right doing so it will come to a nation.

Envy may attack a righteous nation. None has attained to perfection but it will not overthrow it or seriously interfere with its progress and most certainly not with its welfare.

True National Greatness.

True national greatness is founded on the same principles as true individual greatness, to be true, trustworthy, clean and to be a big brother to those who need you. "Nations set goals, like individuals, or ends they seek. Not a single nation has ever set as its goal the life of the Kingdom of God and the practice of the Golden Rule."—C. E. Companion.

Each nation has its great man whom it loves and whose principles it loves, and if these men are not the kind of leaders they ought to be—France, for instance, still loves Napoleon and the things for which he stood, and this has colored all her thought and conduct—the trend of the nation is determined by the man they follow. If a nation loved and followed Christ as they do some hero they set up the nation would be transfigured, just as an individual life is transformed that is wholly consecrated to Christ and the principles for which he died.

So we find that individual greatness and national greatness are one and the same. We cannot have one without the other. There can be no such thing as a great nation unless that nation be composed of citizens whose ideals are high and holy, and whose purposes are in tune with the program of God.

There is no true greatness without God. He has set His seal of approval upon real greatness of mind and heart and soul, and no nation can aspire to this approval unless it sets its mind on the Giver of all good.

God is not dead, although there are those today who talk and act as if He were. He was never more apparent in the direction of world affairs than He is now, and the fact that some folks choose to ignore Him as an active force in the shaping of history does not change that fact. He may not speak to us in just the same manner as He spoke to Israel, but He speaks to those who are willing to hear in no uncertain terms just the same.

There is no proper respect for righteousness, for law and order, without respect for God's word. Many of our greatest statesmen have been students of the Bible. Its precepts and principles form the basis for our common law, and for the underlying principle of justice. When a nation fails, one has only to look to her disobedience of God's law laid down in His Word, to find the cause.

Some one has said: "My rights lie just where those of my neighbor begin—we have many so-called citizens who just because they have the necessary status that they can ride roughshod over everyone and everybody. This can not be right and will not permit such a spirit to prevail."

With the rising generation lies the ring of whatever is wrong with condition of our country. It is our privilege to help the wrongs. It is our opportunity to make who come to our shores truly American Christians. It is our heritage to continue to develop the spirit of Christianity, in death and in life. Thus the well-being of the States will be protected and her future assured.

Pertinent Poetry.

America, my country, I come at thy call
I plight thee my troth, and I give thee my all
In peace or in war, I am wedded to thy I'll carry thy flag through the fire and steel.

America, my country, brave souls gave birth—

They yearned for a haven of freedom on
And when thy proud flag to the winds was furled,

There came to thy shores the oppressed world.

America, my country, I answer thy call,
That freedom may live and that tyrant fall;

I owe thee my all, and my all will I give
I do and I die that America may live.

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT

Mrs. J. M. Stone, Editor.

We are glad to hear from our auxiliary in Burlington. It is always interesting to hear what our wide-awake women are doing. We are good ideas in this report others of our C. Branch might try out.

Burlington.

That we may help and stimulate other societies for more and better work this year for our Master, I am writing to let you know how our society is encouraged and helped by the new members and new interests we are enjoying.

Our society (we have our home and foreign meetings at the same time) has been divided in four circles for the year, and the first Monday night in the month at each member's home; each circle has its chairman, secretary and treasurer, collects the dues, arranges a program for the monthly meeting, when all the circles meet in their regular monthly meeting. At our June meeting we had 36 members present, and after the devotional exercise, conducted by our president, Mrs. Floy Rogers, a splendid program was given from different circles, by readings, songs and talks. After the business of the society was disposed of, Mrs. Floy Rogers and Ella Stafford made timely talks welcoming new members.

Mrs. J. H. Dixon, one of our very active members, who is leaving us to make her home in Greensboro, was presented with sevlovely and useful articles in a most gracious talk by Mrs. Dave DeMoss. The Callie Thompson Circle, of which Mrs. Dixon is a member, gave her a handsome silver cake plate, telling her of their love and esteem and how she has endeared herself to us, since being here. Mrs. Dixon was very much surprised at these gifts but accepted them in a happy speech. The Callie Thompson Circle served delicious home-made banana ice cream and cake to all present.

We feel that our societies owe much to the Ham-Ramsay revival that has closed here recently, for so many new members and new interest, and we are looking forward to a good year's work.

Mrs. J. Ed Ausley,
Corresponding Secretary.

Other Gifts.

Home Missionary Society, Friendship church, Mt. Hermon charge, one dozen tablespoons. Ladies' Aid society, Pleasant Hill church, Spring Church charge, two dresses and underwear for a little girl. C. E. society, High Point College, clothing for a child. Home Missionary Society, Calvary church, Greensboro, nineteen pillow cases. Home Missionary Society, Henderson, towels and table cloth. J. H. Snotherly, Friendship, Stanly, a lot of Raleigh flavorings and salves.

Many thanks for these gifts that prove to be a means of getting both our daily food and raiment.

E. G. Lowdermilk,
Superintendent.

Philadelphia, Greenville Circuit.—We are very glad to report that our Sunday school continues to grow. We had a large crowd out yesterday and after Sunday school we held a meeting and organized a Christian Endeavor society. The following officers were elected: President, Miss Ida Chambliss; vice president, Miss Helen Powell; treasurer, Mr. Lee Chambliss; recording secretary, Miss Bernice Pearson and corresponding secretary, Miss Louise Powell. I believe that this society will be of much help to our Sunday school. We will hold our first meeting next Sunday night at 7:30 o'clock. Everybody come.

Miss Dora Pearson was with us yesterday and she made an interesting talk about the Young People's Conference at High Point which she attended last week. I hope it will be so that a large number of people from Greenville circuit will be able to attend the conference next year.

We are very sorry to report that our pastor, Brother Powell, hasn't been with us for the last month on account of being sick. But he is much better now, and we are expecting him to preach for us Sunday morning.

With best wishes to the Herald and its readers, Bernice Pearson, Reporter.

June 30.

High Point.—At the home of the bride's father, Mr. J. K. Mason, in Durham, N. C., in a simple and beautiful marriage ceremony, Miss Lily Nelson Mason became the bride of Mr. J. Richard Reitzel on last Saturday evening at eight o'clock. The house was beautifully decorated with smilax and white roses, and just prior to the ceremony a lovely musical program was rendered with piano and two violins. The bride was attended by her sisters, Miss Louise Mason as maid of honor, and Mrs. Ray Shute as dame of honor. Mr. J. Brooks Reitzel, of High Point, was his brother's best man. Immediately following the ceremony, an informal reception was given to a select number of relatives and close friends, after which the happy pair left by motor for a honeymoon of a month in the mountains of Western North Carolina. The bride, who on this happy occasion wore an exquisite bridal gown of white satin, is both attractive and popular; she was educated at Greensboro College for Women. The groom is the older of the two sons of the late Dr. and Mrs. J. R. Reitzel, and is one of our most splendid young men. He attended Oak Ridge Institute, University of North Carolina, and Virginia Polytechnic Institute. Mr. and Mrs. Reitzel will make their home for the present at the family residence, 331 N. Main St. The congratulations and best wishes of a wide circle of friends are extended to this popular young couple, and a warm welcome will await them upon their home-coming.

The following announcement is of much interest here, where the bride has many friends: Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Nicholson announce the marriage of their daughter, Dorothy May, to Mr. J. Everett Cann, of Calhoun Falls, S. C. The marriage occurred at Asheboro, N. C., June 17. Mr. and Mrs. Cann are now at home at 123 Elm St., High Point.

The stewards of the church will meet Tuesday evening and supper will be served to them at seven o'clock P. M. by the members of the "Aunt Lizzie" Welch Memorial Class.

The Men's Club held a delightful meeting last Thursday evening. A delicious six-o'clock dinner was served by one of the five circles of the Ladies' Aid society. Several visitors were present including Dr. A. G. Dixon, Rev. G. G. Shurtz of Tiffin, Ohio, who made an address, and others. A quartet of male voices rendered several selections of music. There were about 50 men of the church present, and they seem to enjoy greatly these get-together meetings each month.

A Mission Circle composed of children from six to twelve years of age has been organized with Mrs. R. M. Andrews as superintendent. There are 16 members, and the following officers have been elected: President, Miss Ernestine Vuncannon; vice president, Miss Helen Davis; secretary, Master Alson Gray; and treasurer, Miss Julia Elizabeth Coe.

The Woman's Foreign and Home Missionary societies will meet next Monday afternoon, July 6, with Mrs. J. G. Snipes on Steel street.

While attending the Young People's Summer Conference where he delivered three addresses, Rev. Geo. G. Shurtz of Tiffin, Ohio was the guest of Dr. and Mrs. S. S. Coe in Emerywood.

The following out-of-town friends attended several sessions of the Young People's Conference: Miss Nan Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Ross, Miss Esther Ross, Mr. and Mrs. J. I. Ross of Asheboro, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Ross of Jackson Springs, and Dr. and Mrs. W. R. Goley of Graham.

Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Hayes spent the week end at Piedmont Springs.

Miss Gene Coil has returned to her home in Madisonville, Ky., after a visit to Miss Ruth Moffitt.

Mr. Earl Teague, who is a member of the faculty of the State A. and M. College, Bryan, Texas, is expected here on a visit to home folks this week.

State Street, Lexington.—All three of the services Sunday were delightful and helpful and all were well attended. One new member was added to the church membership, a young Mr. Hinkle, who has recently joined the Navy and is home on a furlough. We are all very glad to have this fine boy cast his lot with us.

Since the last report to the Herald we have been the recipients of a beautiful and useful gift. Rev. George Curry has presented us a fine bulletin board. He gave this gift in memory of his loved wife who died last year. We wish Mr. Curry could know all the expressions of gratitude that have been expressed and how we every one appreciate the beautiful sentiment that prompted this fine deed.

Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Bethea, their son—N. G. Jr.,—Mrs. Harkey and Mrs. Burkhart attended the Children's Day service at Bethesda Sunday afternoon. The program was well rendered and much enjoyed by all present. Some of the little folks' voices were drowned out by the sound of the rain which poured down during most of the program, but the sound of rain was as welcome as children's voices after the long waiting and wishing for it. The Bethesda folk have enlarged and beautified their church wonderfully lately, a work that they are justly proud of. We will soon have to do some enlarging also. Our Sunday school will soon be too large for our quarters according to the rapid growth of the past few months.

Mrs. J. F. Burkhart,
Reporter.

GIRLS SHOULD KNOW.

That the home kitchen, with mother for teacher and a loving willing daughter for pupil, is the best cooking school on earth.

That true beauty of face is possible only where there is beauty of soul manifested in beautiful character.

That the girl everybody likes is not affected, and never whines; but is just her sincere helpful self.

And, finally, that one of the most beautiful things on earth is a pure, modest, true young girl—one who is her father's pride, her mother's comfort, her brother's inspiration, and her sister's ideal—which all should try to be.

duced to feeling, more easily, more surely, and more universally than by any other. You are conscious when you go to an earnest meeting, for instance, that while hymns are being sung and you listen to them, your heart is, as it were, loosened, and there comes out of those hymns a realization of the truth such as you never had before. There is a pleading element, there is a sense of humility of heart, there is a poignant realization of sin and guiltiness, there is a yearning for a brighter life in a hymn, which you do not find in your closet; and in singing you come into sympathy with the truth as you perhaps never do under the preaching of a discourse."

St. Augustine gives us a bit of his experience, when he says: "How abundantly did I weep before God to hear those hymns of thine; being touched to the very quick by the voices of thy sweet church song. The voices flowed into my ears, which caused the affections of my devotions to overflow, and my tears to run over; and happy did I find myself therein."

Services of worship, including the Bible school, Christian Endeavor society, and other meetings are profaned by the misuse and abuse of music. Singing is often employed to fill in the time. When an awkward pause comes in the meeting, while perhaps waiting for a participant to arrive, a hymn is selected at random and sung. Not infrequently the singing at the beginning of the service is considered preliminary and unessential, except to allow time to get the people settled and give the tardy ones a period of grace. After singing two or more hymns, a preacher will sometimes announce, "Now, we will open our service with a prayer by Brother Longwind," or the like. On the other hand, when pushed for time, the part of the service that is omitted is the hymn, showing how little we value it in the period of worship.

One of the worst sins against divine worship is the use of so-called hymns, or sacred songs, the music of which is no better than our popular "jazz" airs, and some of the words but little better than the music. We may "jazz" our way into the popular circles of gay society, but we cannot "jazz" our souls into heaven. Such pseudo music does little more than to intoxicate. Those engaging in such singing are hardly responsible for the emotions that are stirred in their breasts, and some of the extremists are hardly responsible for their conduct. And to think, we are feeding our children's souls on such stuff! God forgive us, and open our eyes to the need of better singing.

To obtain the right kind of singing, the right kind of hymn books must be used. I believe that the first book every church should buy is our own Methodist Protestant Hymnal. It may cost a little more than this cheap trash, but shall we save a few pennies at the sacrifice of our souls, and the souls of our posterity? Better buy a few at the time than to continue with the degrading variety.

Not being a representative of any hymn book publisher, nor being familiar with all of the good hymnals for the Bible school, I hesitate to mention any. However, that you might have some idea of the right kind to use, I venture to mention the one used at our College, "The Hymnal for American Youth," also "The Church School Hymnal." Both of these are obtainable through our Methodist Protestant Book Concern, of Baltimore.

The preacher may have difficulty in making such a revolutionary change in the music of his church and school, but it can be done by education, agitation, and patience. Get those who understand music and some of the most devout, converted first, and their influence will help to transform the erroneous ideas of the others. I believe that if we expect to sing in heaven, we must learn the right songs on earth, or we shall feel very much out of place when the hosts of heaven, who do homage to Him who sitteth on the great, white throne, sing, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts." Our jazz music will not accord with that. God help us then to sing the songs of Zion that lift our souls heavenward, and make our spirits feel the rapture of the glory world.

WHY METHODIST PROTESTANTS SHOULD PATRONIZE HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

First, because the college belongs to them. For the same reason that a man goes to his own rather than to his neighbor's home to spend the night; for the same reason that a man supports his wife and children instead of the wives and children of others; for the same reason that we are for our country at all times, and finally, for the same reason we are loyal to our church.

Second, we should patronize High Point College because in the development of it we are thereby making our church more secure in the hearts of our people. Here our youth come into contact with the leaders of our denomination and by it learn to appreciate more fully the work they are doing.

Third, we should patronize High Point College because we have put our money into it. While the grounds were donated by some public spirited men, yet most of the money that has gone into our buildings has come from the hard earnings of our own people. Something like seven thousand of our people have contributed to the establishment of this college. It represents sacrifice, hard toil, and prayer.

Fourth, Methodist Protestants should patronize High Point College because it is doing as good work as other colleges. Expressions have come to us from various sources sustaining this opinion. We do not have as yet sufficient endowment to help us in our running expenses, but this lack has not affected the morale of our school nor has it kept us from having a faculty that is both competent and willing to do a fine grade of college work.

Fifth, Methodist Protestants should patronize High Point College at this time because it has no alumni associations, no host of friends scattered over the state to arise to its support in these days of trial and testing. In this particular we occupy an unusual situation. While there is no college in the state that does not have its friends in some high school faculties to speak for them, we are without them and must depend upon our pastors and leaders in our church activities to present High Point College to the high school graduates today. Of course this will be different in a few years, but for the present we must depend upon you.

Sixth, for years we have prayed for a college of our own. We have encouraged our leaders to build such an institution; they have flattered themselves with the expectation that all loyal Methodist Protestants would rise up and support the college by sending their sons and daughters to High Point College and thereby seal their pledge of loyalty to it.

Seventh, does it cost more than elsewhere? We have no club houses where students may cook for themselves, etc., but our price of $2 a month for board is reasonable. Our tuition of $100 a year or $50 a semester is not high compared with other colleges when you include with the tuition the registration fee they charge. For the accommodations in the dormitories no college offers better than is found here; our charge is no higher than is found elsewhere for what is offered. We offer free tuition to all ministerial students, to all students coming from orphanages, and special discount to ministers' children. A small number were able to pay their board working a few hours a week here last year.

What Is Needed.

We want twenty one-hundred-dollar scholarships for worthy students for next year.

We want one hundred and sixty boarding students for next year. We have already registered a goodly number but for special reasons we are exceedingly eager to register at least one hundred and sixty students by September the fifteenth.

We want every Methodist Protestant in the North Carolina Conference to visit High Point College. Investigate the opportunities offered here and think of what it will mean for them to send their children to High Point College in a religious and educational way before a decision is reached to send elsewhere.

Trusting that we may have the hearty support of every loyal member of our dear old church in this time of peculiar need.

I am sincerely, R. M. Andrews,
President.

HUMANITY'S CRUTCH.

Henry Ward Beecher once related to Robert Ingersoll the following incident:

"I was passing along one of the streets of Brooklyn the other day and saw ahead of me an infirm, old man making slow progress on a pair of crutches. And I saw another man coming to meet him, one of those thoughtless, practical jokers. As they met this joker kicked one of the crutches from under the cripple and left him sprawling on the sidewalk."

"The inhuman wretch!" exclaimed Mr. Ingersoll, "he ought to be hanged for such a dastardly deed."

"Mr. Ingersoll," replied Mr. Beecher, "you are the man who is doing that very thing. Christianity is the only crutch that weak, fallen, struggling mankind has to lean upon. It is his only support and hope for the life that now is and for the life that is to come. And you are going over this country and prostituting your God-given talents in a powerful effort to knock this crutch from under a race crippled by sin."

The extreme wing of the modernists are doing far more than Ingersoll ever did in destroying real Christianity. They pose as the friends of Christianity, while Ingersoll stood out as the avowed enemy of the Christian religion. They deny the deity of Jesus Christ when they deny His virgin birth. They deny the supernatural inspiration and contents of the Holy Scriptures. And by so doing they deny the supernatural experience of the Christian religion. They make Christianity an impotent makeshift, without the least power to save from sin, death, and hell. They virtually rob mankind of his only hope of everlasting life. "How are the mighty fallen!"—The Word of Life.

THE "FOOLISHNESS OF PREACHING."

"Yes, I worked three weeks—never toiled harder in my life—to gather evidence against my man, and—I missed him!"

Not often did we find the revenue agent in a reminiscent mood; so we listened attentively. Briefly this is his story:

He had heard that a certain man known as Big John, who lived back in the Southern mountains twenty-odd miles away, was making and selling whiskey. But the agent knew that hearsay is not evidence; so he decided to go into the hills. It is no trivial matter to enter such a mountain community and gather evidence; no stranger escapes close scrutiny.

Then he heard that the people along the creek on which Big John lived were planning to build a church. Having been a carpenter, the agent set out at once. None of the mountaineers were experienced carpenters; they needed him, and his coming did not stir their suspicions.

For a week he labored. He soon decided that Big John would not be an easy man to get out of the mountains. Genial and generous almost to a fault, the man had many friends. As for evidence, after ten days the revenue man found the still on Big John's farm, though he had not yet seen the man at work.

Then came dedication Sunday. The native minister who had inspired the people to build the church came to address them in the morning, and as the moon was full, he stayed for a night meeting also. There had never been "preaching" on that creek, and the new church was crowded at both services.

The revenue man did not attend the night meeting. Instead he went to bed, for he had decided to arrest Big John in the morning at three o'clock. Since it was moonlight, he was certain that he should find Big John working his still. He would "get the drop" on his man, gag him and take him out.

The agent fell asleep with the fervent voice of the preacher in the little church down the creek ringing in his ears.

At two o'clock in the morning the agent slid through the window of his room. He soon reached the site of the still, but Big John was not there. The agent found a huge mass of glowing coals where logs had been heaped for a great fire. Poking in the hot ashes, he found some pieces of twisted, half melted metal. On a tree nearby he saw a signboard, and on it, half written and half printed in large crude letters, was this notice:

"Big John joined the church last night. He are going to live strait. Pray fur him."

"No, I am not sorry," said the agent. "Big John kept his word. You remember what the Bible says about the 'foolishness of preaching'? Big John had never been to church until that time,"—Youth's Companion.

JESUS' PLAN.

Rev. S. D. Gordon, in one of his "Quiet Talks," allows his imagination to picture reverently what might have occurred when Jesus returned to be with the Father. It is somewhat as follows:

Gabriel says to Jesus, "So you have been down on the earth for a long time."

"Yes," replies Jesus.

"And you have lived and suffered and died for the people," says Gabriel.

"Yes," is the reply.

"And I suppose that every one knows about what you have done," continued Gabriel.

"No," answers Jesus.

"Well, what arrangements did you make for spreading the news and carrying on the work which you have begun? Have you any plan?" asks Gabriel.

"Yes," replies Jesus; "I gathered a small group of followers and trained them as best I could. I lived with them and worked with them, and now they are going out to tell others. Those others will tell still others, and so the work will go on until the whole world is encompassed."

"But suppose that the little group does not prove faithful," asks Gabriel: "suppose that Peter goes back to his fishing, and John gets discouraged, and that the others give up their work; have you any other plan?"

"No," says Jesus, "I have no other plan. I am depending on them."

This is the message for you who are members of the church, and you who are yet to become members. We are the messengers of Jesus, doing his work and spreading the good news of him. If we fail, the work fails indeed, for he has no other plan. He is depending on us.—Story Worship Programs, by Stowell.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JULY 5.

The Beginning of Foreign Missions.

Lesson Text: Acts 13:1-12.

Golden Text: Mark 16:15.

The Central Truth: The Kingdom of God has not been left to other people. God is the Pilot of the Ship of Zion. The movements of the messengers of the cross are ordered by the Lord.

Scriptural Points.

1. The center of the Holy Spirit's activities was shifted from the Jerusalem church to the church at Antioch of Syria. From this church started the movement of evangelization that has enveloped the Gentile world.

2. This church must have grown to large proportions in numbers, influence, spirituality, and worldwide vision. Four eminent pastors and teachers ministered at its altars. The Holy Spirit directed its energies. The holy debt to the Gentile world was recognized. A zeal for the salvation of souls in the regions beyond flamed from every heart.

3. "Separate me Barnabas and Saul." The two strongest men were thus set apart for foreign missionary work. Such is God's estimate of pioneer work among unenlightened peoples. Only the best workers can lay the surest foundations of the church of God.

4. These first two foreign missionaries went forth under a twofold commission. The sovereign and authoritative commission was given by the Holy Ghost, the Administrator of redemption. The responsive commission was bestowed by the church through prayer, fasting and the laying on of hands.

5. Cyprus was the first objective; because it was the home of Barnabas. This is evidence that Barnabas assumed the leadership in this campaign. But when they reached Paphos, at the farther end of the island, Saul, from henceforth called Paul, took up the reins of leadership, and for very palpable reasons. Barnabas was the son of consolation, and could only handle peaceable situations successfully. Paul was a son of thunder and could handle the most intricate and trying situations.

6. Sergius Paulus, deputy of the Island and a distinguished Roman, lived at Paphos. He sent for these two missionaries to tell him the new gospel. Here was a great opportunity. But there was a false prophet there, a backslidden Jew, who practiced the art of sorcery. This man strenuously opposed the teaching of these two men of God. Under this peculiar situation Paul assumed the leadership of this movement. He administered a fiery and most scorching denunciation of this emissary of Satan. He denounced him as "full of subtilty and mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness." He furthermore invoked upon him the divine judgment of blindness.

7. At this manifestation of authority and power the deputy believed on Jesus Christ and no doubt became at once a leader of the Christian forces throughout the island.

Practical Points.

1. It is always better and safer to follow the leading of the Spirit. God knows best the course of conduct and service. "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts." Isa.55:9.

2. Every human life is a program of God. And He seeks to fit every man for his appointed task. To search and find out God's purpose in each one's creation and redemption is the beginning of wisdom. To fulfil with the exercise of the full energy of consecration this holy purpose is the gracious fruition of wisdom.

3. The success of evangelization depends supremely upon the Holy Spirit. The truth has power only when it is sent forth by Him through human instrumentalities. The true minister is the mouthpiece of God. Jesus said, "Without me ye can do nothing." Paul said, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

4. "Where the Lord builds His church, there the devil builds his chapel." His satanic majesty is a shrewd and most bitter opponent of the Kingdom of God. "We are not ignorant of his devices." But his followers may be put to flight by the sword of the Spirit and the exercise of faith in prayer.—Word of Life.

—With the forwarding of $46,000 to the Union Church on the Canal Zone, the Federal Council of Churches announces that the erection of a beautiful and adequate church at Balboa, representing more than a dozen denominations, is almost assured. The pastor of the Balboa congregation, Rev. A. R. Brown, has arrived in New York to aid in securing the balance of about $10,000 needed for the finishing of the building, the furnishings and the purchase of an organ.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JULY 12.

The Gospel in Antioch of Pisidia.

Lesson Text: Acts 13: 42-52.

Golden Text: Isa. 55: 4.

The Central Truth: In Antioch of Pisidia began the fulfilment of the prophecy of Jesus: "So the last (Gentiles) shall be first, and the first (Jews) last." Matt. 20: 16.

Scriptural Points.

1. From Paphos of Cyprus the missionaries proceeded to Perga, a seaport of Pamphylia. Here John returned to Jerusalem, his home. Perga must have been too small a town to establish a mission; for Paul and Barnabas proceeded at once to Antioch in Pisidia, where there was a much larger population.

2. On the first Sabbath after their arrival they attended the services at the Jews' synagogue. Receiving an invitation to address the congregation, Paul preached a sermon on Jesus Christ and Him Crucified, in which he set forth from the Scriptures that Jesus was the Son of David and the promised Messiah. "Many of the Jews and religious proselytes" were converted by this message. And the Gentiles present besought these apostles to preach again the next Sabbath.

3. The new doctrine of salvation spread like wild-fire. "Almost the whole city" came the second Sabbath to hear the gospel of Jesus Christ. This aroused the jealousy and vindictive opposition of the unbelieving Jews. They began to contradict the truths that Paul preached and blaspheme the name of Jesus.

4. Right here these messengers of the cross came to the forks of the road. Hitherto they had labored mainly among the Jews, because the Jews were more or less conversant with the prophecies concerning the new faith, and because they were the immediate heirs of the promises. Their malignant opposition compelled Paul and Barnabas to turn to the Gentiles as the more promising field of evangelization. For this was a Gentile country and the Jews were few in number. It was foretold in the Scriptures that the Gentile world would be the first to be gathered into the fold.

5. This decision of the apostles filled the Gentiles with gladness and hope. Large numbers believed, "and glorified the word of the Lord."

6. It is likely that the more influential part of the population failed to accept Christ, for it is recorded that "the Jews stirred up the devout and honorable women, and the chief men of the city," against Paul and Barnabas. It appears that this persecution reached the civil authorities who passed an edict expelling these missionaries from the city.

7. "They shook off the dust of their feet against them." This was in keeping with the admonition of Jesus: "And whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust of your feet for a testimony against them." Luke 9: 5.

8. "And the disciples were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost,"—a sure evidence of sound conversion.

Practical Points.

1. To be a pioneer of a righteous but unpopular movement requires strong courage, wise tact, and unbounded enthusiasm. The heroes of the cross exercised these traits to a remarkable degree in preaching the gospel in the unknown regions beyond.

2. The grace of entrance into the kingdom of God is fundamental; but the grace of continuance therein is equally important. "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing." John 15: 5.

3. A real hunger for the word is an indispensable qualification for hearing the gospel. "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled."

4. The gospel presents a choice between sin and righteousness, life and death, heaven and hell. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. 6: 23.

5. A full salvation not only affords immense joy, assurance, and courage, but it is a mighty bulwark against temptation. A soul that is full of God has little or no room left for the devil. "Be filled with the Spirit."

UNSOUGHT HAPPINESS.

Try to breathe in the fragrance of the blossoming grape, or to smell it, as the saying goes, and it is next to impossible to detect the delicate perfume. So it is with the trailing arbutus; its faint, elusive odor escapes the vigorous and determined effort to enjoy it. But in another moment, perhaps, the sense is taken unaware, and perceives the exquisite fragrance that makes one say, "O-o-o!" with that long breath of satisfaction that cannot be mistaken.

Thus it is with happiness many and many a time. It eludes the too eager and premeditated search. The very pursuit seems to prevent the realization. But sometimes when one goes upon a sterner errand, with no thought of finding pleasure, but simply of doing duty, suddenly the unsought joy may meet him on the way, with a breath as sweet as the strange, delicious odor of the unobtrusive bloom upon the vine, or of the shy Mayflower that trails along the sheltered places in the spring.—Selected.

THE UNKNOWN JOURNEY.

"He went out not knowing whither he went."—Hebrews 11: 6-10.

Abram began his journey without any knowledge of his ultimate destination. He took "one step," and he did not "ask to see the distant scene." And that is faith, to do God's will here and now, quietly leaving the results to him. Faith is not concerned with the entire chain; its devoted attention is fixed upon the immediate link. Faith is not knowledge of a moral process; it is infidelity in a moral act. Faith leaves something to the Lord; it obeys His immediate commandment and leaves to Him direction and destiny.

And so faith is accompanied by serenity. "He that believeth shall not make haste"—or, more literally, "shall not get into a fuss." He shall not get into a panic, neither fetching fears from his yesterdays nor from his tomorrows. Concerning his yesterdays, faith says, "Thou hast beset me behind. Concerning his tomorrows, faith says, "Thou hast beset me before." Concerning his today, faith says, "Thou hast laid Thine hand upon me." That is enough, just to feel the pressure of the guiding hand.—J. H. Jowett.

Nature never writes a blind hand.—King.

HILLS AND STRENGTH.

By Mary Joan Wheeler.

Me.—Miss Sadie Burton, of Reidsville, C., passed away at a local sanatorium, June 29. She had resided in Reidsville and Asheville since March. Her presence in our midst was a blessing to all. The consolation of her loved ones and pastor and church members in Reidsville was Asheville's loveliest young women, Eleanor Webster, was united in marriage to Mr. H. E. Waddell Sunday afternoon 28. The scene of the affair was at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Swain, uncle of the bride. The bride's pastor, Rev. W. Bates, performed the ceremony, which was beautiful and impressive. Two soloists, Mrs. H. B. Harmon, accompanied by Miss Stringfield, added to the happiness of the occasion. Little Robert Swain, the bride's brother, his sister, Betty Beckwith, gracefully strewed sweet peas in the path of the bride. Mr. Irwin Monk was best man. The bride was given away by her father, Mr. A. Webster. The home was beautifully decorated with flowers, the rhododendrons in evidence. Mrs. Waddell is a daughter of Mrs. Harriett Swain, known throughout our conference. Mrs. Waddell and her children and grandchildren actively helped in building up our church in Burke county and Asheville.

Former pastors of our churches in these parts will be glad to know that Mrs. Roberts, mother of our former Mayor Gallatin Roberts, and sister to Miss Jennie Buckner of our church here, and sister to Mrs. Sam Coe of the Maryland Conference, remembers most cordially all her friends. She is still a member at Mt. Zion church, Jupiter. She has been in feeble health for some time.

Miss Ethel Brown, graduate of the High Point Children's Home, spent several weeks in Asheville recently. She is now attending summer school at N. C. C. W., Greensboro.

Our pastor, Brother Bates, is giving us excellent sermons and prayer-meeting talks. Two Sundays ago, he addressed the Men's Bible Class of Trinity Episcopal church.

We pray daily for the college and our other big undertakings.

Winston-Salem.—Rev. H. L. Elderdice, D. D., president of the Methodist Protestant Theological Seminary at Westminster, Md., who has been in the city attending the Reynolds Conference, preached in the Methodist Protestant church Sunday evening, June 21. The people were very glad indeed to have the opportunity of listening to his splendid discourse on "The Invisible Christ." On Friday night Dr. Elderdice gave an interesting lecture in the Sunday school auditorium of the church, "Old Sweethearts" being his subject.

The annual picnic of the Philathea class was held Thursday afternoon (June 25) at Maple Springs church, four or five miles west of the city. There were approximately fifty in the party, including Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Hunter and children, and Rev. Geo. L. Curry and children, guests of the Philatheas. Supper was served on a long table arranged on the church lawn, and everybody thoroughly enjoyed this delightful outing.

Mr. R. N. Hauser and Mr. W. V. Hutchins have been nominated by the quarterly conference to represent the local church in the annual conference, the results of the election to be announced later.

Misses Margaret Hanner and Ruby Sapp, who attended the Young People's Conference at High Point, will make reports next Sunday morning at Sunday school.

Pleasant Grove.—The Sunday school is progressing nicely. The school is going to have a Children's Day July 5, 1925.

The box party that the Christian Endeavor had at J. E. Cecil Tourist Camp took in $20, which will go to put a library in the church.

The 1925 summer session of our Young People's Summer Conference closed last Wednesday night. There were five of our members that took the full course of study; these were our delegates: Misses Maud and Mary Kennedy, Velma Burton, Mrs. Raymond Meredith and Mrs. Ralph Kennedy. We had several others that registered.

Our special meeting will start the second Sunday in July. Rev. A. D. Shelton will be the pulpit help. Brother Shelton is no stranger around Pleasant Grove as he has served the church one year.

Brother Reynolds filled his regular appointment Sunday night and preached a splendid sermon.

The Ladies' Aid society will have their regular meeting July 8 at the home of Mrs. Shelly Murphys at High Point.

Denton Charge.—We started a series of revival services at Denton church June 7 with Rev. J. M. Morgan as our pulpit help. Brother Morgan did splendid preaching which was enjoyed by a large congregation almost every service. Although our audience was large every night and much interest in the meeting was being showed by several of the members, yet we felt it in accordance with God's will to bring it to a close on last Wednesday night. There were about 15 conversions and nine members added to the church. Although these numbers are much smaller than we hoped for them to be, yet we can truthfully say that the meeting was a great success because of the inspiration Brother Morgan gave those who were already upholding the banner of Jesus Christ. As a token of the appreciation of what Brother Morgan did for us, a contribution of $55 was made to him, but we feel that this did not begin to pay him for his service to the town of Denton.

The revival services were not the only work going on during this meeting to bring happiness to the people of Denton and especially to the pastor of Denton M. P. church, because he got a big pounding which filled his soul with happiness, not just because of the many good things to go in the pantry, but because of the manifestation of the spirit which prompted the giving. In the pounding was included three 24-pound bags of flour, 62 pounds of sugar, 11 jars of jelly and preserves as well as meat, lard, syrup, potatoes, eggs, coffee, two chickens, and many other things too numerous to mention. The pounding in money value would amount to thirty or thirty-five dollars.

The givers of these many good things were not only members of the M. P. Church, but the M. E. and Baptist as well, to all of whom the receivers feel very grateful.

Our prayer is that God may bless them all for their kindness, and that He may enable me and my companion to live in such a way that none of them will ever be sorry for helping us as they have by this pounding.

Concord.—The church at Concord experiences many changes. If variety is the spice of institutional life we ought to show real activity in church matters. For several weeks this church had been supplied with different speakers and workers, usually from High Point College. Finally, upon the appointment by Dr. Dixon we came to serve here in the absence of Mr. Lawrence Little who was elected to the young people's work.

So we arrived last Thursday happily enough. Much to our surprise—for we never even thought of such a thing—the friends came in to see us in great numbers. Each was bringing some valuable gift for our use. Having experienced nothing of this kind before we were almost speechless before the throng of new visitors. Well, we thanked them as best we could with words. The bountiful supply of good things they left is, apparently, a young grocery store. Oh, we are happily surprised. These people show their welcome by their deeds. And in return we pledge to them our very best service and lasting good wishes.

We want to thank the ladies for having the parsonage so beautifully prepared for our coming. Rooms were clean, furniture in place, flowers were cheerfully decorating the tables. In fact, "all things were ready" for the beginning of life in a real home in Concord. A new refrigerator was placed for the parsonage use by the Adults' Bible Class. This is sincerely appreciated.

For all this thoughtfulness and kindness in making our arrival pleasant, we can never say "Thank you" enough.

Church life is fine. Attendance is good always and continues to increase. The Sunday school is one of the very best we have seen. Other branches of the religious work are likewise active. The summer looks promising, life is happy and the work is joyous and full of reward.

P. E. Landley, Pastor.

Orange Charge.—Yesterday was Children's Day at Hebron church. A large congregation was present. The children were trained by Mrs. Fanny Nelson and Miss Mildred Sykes. This was one of the best Children's Day exercises the writer has ever witnessed. Each one rendered his part well. The whole program was a success. Offering for foreign missions, $32.00.

Announcements: First Sunday, July, 8:00 P. M., Children's Day at Effland church; second Sunday, July, 11 A. M., Children's Day, Chestnut Ridge church; third Sunday, July, Home-Coming Day, Effland church. Dr. Dixon will be present for this occasion.

Sincerely, B. M. Williams.

Henderson.—Everything has been running just about as usual, and considering the warm weather, our congregations are holding out well.

All the delegates are back home from the Young People's Conference in High Point, also the Baraca-Philathea Convention in Raleigh.

The pastor called a congregational meeting after morning service June 21 to discuss means of meeting the financial conditions of High Point College. Rev. J. E. Pritchard and Mr. E. C. Kittrell were appointed as a committee to collect the endowment pledge.

Our people had the pleasure of hearing Rev. M. P. Chambliss at the evening service two weeks ago.

The Senior Philathea Class, Young Ladies' League, Wiling Workers and the Girls' Mission Band had a Japanese Festival on June 23. Supper was served and booths of different kinds were placed about the building.

After a stay of one week at High Point, attending the Pastors' Conference, we returned to Granville circuit last Tuesday to find that good rains had fallen and new life had been infused in all vegetable life.

A Successful Day.

Children's Day service was held at Union Chapel at 11 o'clock last Sunday. Under the very efficient training of the children by Miss Emily Floyd, assisted by Miss Gladys Stone, the children rendered an unusually interesting service. The auditorium was beautifully decorated. The audience was good and the offering amounted to $19.10.

Evangelism.

On next Sunday at Rebooth we are to begin our special evangelistic services. Rev. R. A. Hunter of Winston is to assist. This meeting is to be followed by one at Mt. Carmel to begin second Sunday in July. Brother Hunter is to assist in the Mt. Carmel meeting also. Then on the fourth Sunday in July we begin our special meeting at Union Chapel; in this meeting we are to have the pulpit and altar help of Rev. R. C. Stubbins of Enfield. We count ourselves very fortunate in being able to secure the help of Brothers Stubbins and Hunter in these meetings. We are intensely interested in this special campaign for the salvation of the unsaved, the strengthening of God's children and the glory of God. We earnestly request the prayers of all who read The Postal Card.

West End, Greensboro.—A number of our West End members have been attending the Young People's Summer Conference at High Point College. Those taking the courses were Rev. E. L. Ballard, Dr. Joy Harris Glascock, Misses Laura Thompson, Annie Livengood and Mabel Bull.

Our hearts go out in sympathy to Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Trogon over the loss of their little seven-months-old son, D. W., Jr. A slight illness suddenly developed into spinal meningitis, and he died Monday morning, June 22. The funeral services were conducted at the home by the pastor, Rev. E. L. Ballard.

The children of the Sunday school presented a very interesting program for Children's Day June 21. At the close of the exercises several members of the Philathea class gave a short missionary play that was very effective. Miss Gladys Routh had charge of the program.

We were pleased to have Mr. J. F. Barrett and his interesting family worship with us Sunday. They have recently moved to Greensboro from Charlotte. Their former home was in Asheville and they hold their membership at our First Methodist Protestant Church in Asheville. We are glad also to welcome our Methodist Protestant girls who are attending summer school at North Carolina College for Women.

Among our young people who have been attending College and are at home for the vacation months are Misses Cordia and Laura Thompson, and Annie Livengood.

Members of the Foust Bible Class had a delightful outing at Kimesville last Thursday. Perhaps the most enjoyable feature was a barbecued pig, with all the accessories. The class is indebted to Messrs. J. C. Edwards and S. E. Ratledge for this part of the program. The entire day was spent in fishing, swimming, boat riding, and playing games. The class will hold its monthly business meeting at the church on Thursday night of this week, at which time officers for the ensuing year will be elected.

Miss Emily Ward entertained the Philathea class at her home on the High Point Road Thursday evening, June 25. Members of the Baraca class were invited guests.

The Senior Christian Endeavor society held a joint prayer meeting with the First Reformed Christian Endeavorers recently, and much good was derived therefrom for both societies. Miss Cora Cox was the leader.

Shelby.—As the Shelby church has no regular reporter, I decided to write a report of our work here. We had a fairly good attendance at Sunday school last Sunday. Also the usual size congregation for the morning preaching service. The pastor preached a missionary sermon from the text, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

We had our Children's Day service last Sunday night which was attended by a large congregation. The church was just about full. The program consisted of songs and recitations by the children and two brief plays by some of the young people of the Sunday school. The entire program was very good and each part was carried out in a splendid manner. The large congregation present for the service seemed to enjoy the program. At the close of the program the pastor made a brief statement concerning the work of our missionaries in China, India and Japan and made an appeal for the offering. The offering amounted to $8.76 and will apply on the General Conference budget. All who took part in the program and those who trained the children are to be thanked for their time and interest in the program.

The pastor and his family enjoyed a good dinner in the home of Brother R. B. Bass and wife, members of our church, last Sunday. After dinner we spent a few hours in conversation and listening to sacred music. We always enjoy being in the home of such good people.

Our prayer meetings have been increasing in attendance for the past several weeks. Rev. Hoyle Swofford, a seemingly consecrated young man, who has been a ministerial student at Rutherford College for the past three years, conducted the prayer service Wednesday night of last week. He gave us a fine talk on the subject of spiritual blindness. His talk was enjoyed very much by the thirty-one persons present.

I trust that our prayer services, our Sunday school and preaching services in the future will continue to grow. I enjoy myself better every Sunday as the attendance increases. I ask all the readers of the Herald to pray for us as we try in our feeble way to do the work in this place.

We are glad to read such a good report from the Burlington church by their new reporter, W. T. Way, who is one of the converts of the great Ham-Ramsay meeting recently held at Burlington. We are glad to see that this young man has taken an interest in the church and the great work of the kingdom of God. We shall look for some good reports in the future from that lively church.

We regret to note the illness of Mrs. Magdalen Brown, one of our members, who has been a patient in the hospital here since Monday, June 22. She is receiving treatment by the hospital surgeons and expects to return home on Saturday of this week.

This writer, a member of the committee of the church to raise money for our annual conference budget, desires to thank all who contributed any amount for that cause. I succeeded in raising $35.

The pastor was called upon to conduct the funeral service of Robert Queen, the two-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. B. G. Queen, on Thursday afternoon of last week. A brief service was held in the home here and the body of the little child was taken to Buffalo Baptist church, six miles from Shelby, where the service was concluded. A large congregation gathered for the funeral. Mr. and Mrs. Queen and the surviving children, three daughters and one son, have the sympathy of their neighbors and friends in the loss of their dear

There will be regular services at our church the next Sunday, with the Lord's Supper at morning service. Mrs. C. B. Way.

Law River.—Our special meetings will be as follows: Mizpah, July 1st, Rev. A. D. Patton the help; Fair Grove, July 2nd, Rev. F. Millaway the help; Friendship, July 3rd, Rev. W. F. Ashburn the help; Midway, July the 4th, Rev. C. E. Phillips the help.

We hope to have with us Bro. Lowder and some of the children from the Home Fair Grove, Friendship and Midway. As we have not fixed time for meeting at town Summit. W. D. Reed.

Mizpah Church Dedicated.—On the first day in June we dedicated our beautiful church at Mizpah. The sermon was by Lawrence Little who delighted us with thought of the bigness of the church. It was a happy presentation of the truth and lightened the joy of the already happy lit-band. It has been said that there is nothing new under the sun; but when I tell you after settling all bills, including painting, painting and installing a new piano, they have a nice surplus in the treasury, what do you think that but new? W. D. Reed.

Halifax.—We held our children's day service at Hollister yesterday morning. The children acted their part well. The offering for foreign missions amounted to $14.00. We had dinner on the ground and preaching service at 2 P. M.

We had preaching at Ringwood at 3:30 P. M. and at Bethesda church at 8 P. M.

Everything seems to be moving on, but not at the speed we would like to travel.

We will hold our quarterly conference at Rigwood church on Friday before the third Sunday in July. All of the officials are requested to be present. Conference will convene at 2 P. M.

The Eden Ladies' Aid Society will meet on Thursday, July 2, at the parsonage at Brinkleyville.

The Woman's Missionary Society of Hollister church is doing good work, and has received a number of new members.

We feel very much indebted to Mr. Vinson for fresh fish and sugar, and to Mr. Street for seed corn, and to Mrs. Hull of Union church for a chicken, and to Brother Ross for apples, soap, starch etc., and to Mrs. E. V. Neville for canned fruit.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Mrs. J. Calvin Thompson.

She was the daughter of Thomas and Sarah Robeson, being born in the southern part of Alamance county May 29, 1864. On the 9th of August, 1885, she was married to Brother J. Calvin Thompson. This union was blessed with ten children, eight daughters and two sons, one son and two daughters having died some years ago. The living are as follows: Mrs. L. E. Guthrie, Mrs. L. R. Pickard, Mrs. M. C. Pickard, Mrs. Clarence McVey, Alfred T. Thompson, and Misses Bettie and Dora Thompson.

In young girlhood, Mrs. Thompson professed faith in Christ and joined Concord Methodist Protestant church, on Saxapahaw charge. Although she moved to Burlington about five years ago, her membership remained at Concord until her death, May 11, 1925.

The writer visited her frequently during her last illness. During all his visits she never murmured, but bore her sufferings with patience and Christian fortitude. She was interested in her church, Concord, and gave of means to support it. She left the testimony that all was well with her soul. This is a great consolation to her husband and children who are left behind.

On May 12 we carried her body back to Concord church, near Saxapahaw, where the funeral was conducted by the writer and Rev. S. W. Taylor. In peace she now sleeps in the old home burial ground, near the ashes of the members of her family for generations back.

DETERMINED BY THOUGHT.

A man's thought determines the moral climate of his life, and will settle the question whether his conduct is to be poisonous marsh or fertile meadow, fragrant garden or barren sand. The pose of the mind determines the disposition, and will settle whether a man shall soar with angels in the heavenlies or wallow with swine in the mire. What we think about the things that are greatest will determine how we do the things that are least. What are your primary thoughts about God? The prints of those thoughts will be found in your courtesies, in your intercourse, in the common relationships of life, in the government of commerce, in the control of the body, and in all the affairs of home and market and field.—J. H. Jowett, D.D.

GOD'S VOICE.

"I am so deaf now I can scarcely hear any one's voice any more, but God's," said a sweet-faced old lady to some young women who had dropped in to see her. It was uttered partly by way of apology, but unconsciously it expressed a beautiful attitude on the part of the aged speaker.

Many people come to a time in life when they can hear no other voice but God's. Through the buffetings of misfortune, through pain and sorrow, through sickness and poverty, all other voices are drowned out. How clear His voice sounds to the weary sufferer upon the sick bed! How plain its accents to the bereaved mother! Is there any music like the music of God's voice at such a time? As the heart thrills at the familiar tones of a dear friend, so thrills the heart of God's servants as He speaks in the hour of need.—Exchange.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

A Little Song of Cheer.

If you're worried in your mind
With some measly little doubt,
So you question all mankind—

Cut it out!

You may quibble, you may jeer,
You may scoff, or you may sneer;
You'll not turn the whole world here
Right about!

Whilst upon life's stormy sea,
You, your little vessel sail,
Full of courage ever be,
Never quail!

Better take your doubting slow,
Trusting wheresoe'er you go—
For the gifts His hands bestow,
Ne'er will fail.

Cloudy pillar every day
Bids thee 'neath its shelter hide,
As you tread the heavenward way
With thy Guide.

So at night when shadows peep,
Though the fears of darkness creep,
Fiery cloud its watch will keep Near thy side.

Trust then ever, pilgrim brave,
Dark though be thy shadowy road,
Fierce the tempest, high the wave,
Hard the load—

Know ye, guardian angel bands,
Swift to heed thy King's commands,
Wait to lead, with out-stretched hands,
Up to God.

The applause of men is faint praise compared to the "well done" of the Lord.

When God utters words of warning He continues to speak with the accents of love.

MARRIED.Hardee-Davenport.

Miss Katie Davenport and Mr. Zora Ashley Hardee were wedded Sunday morning at 9:30 at the Methodist Protestant church, in a ceremony marked by charm and simplicity. The service was a very impressive one, solemnized by Rev. K. L. Hethcox. An exceedingly limited number of relatives and intimate friends were present.

The bridal chorus from Lohengrin's wedding march played by Mary Colan Jackson was a signal for bride and groom to enter. The bride was dressed in a chic ensemble suit of tan crepe roma, hat and other accessories harmonizing. Following the service they left for a wedding trip North. They will make their home near Enfield upon their return.

Mrs. Hardee is the oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Davenport, well known residents of the town. She attended E. C. T. T. S. and the past year held a position in the city school. She is endeared to many in Creswell, having always made her home here. Mr. Hardee is a well known farmer near Enfield and merits the high esteem in which he is held.

SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.The Wells of Salvation.

Text: "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." Isa. 12:3.

Salvation is first of all reconciliation with God. God's anger is appeased. His broken law is satisfied. The enmity of sin has been removed. Full pardon has been granted. Salvation is impartation of life. The dead in trespasses and sins have been raised to the new life of righteousness. It is the life of the new birth. It is the abundant life, and the everlasting life. It is "the life hid with Christ in God." And salvation is satisfaction. It is "the peace that passeth all understanding," and "the joy unspeakable and full of glory." "And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever."

There are three sources of His abounding joy of salvation, the atonement, the believing heart, and the consecrated life. These are the wells of salvation.

Let us first consider

The Well of the Atonement.

By virtue of His sufferings and death Jesus Christ has made atonement for the sins of mankind. He has thereby reconciled man to God. God is at one with the rebellious lost and fallen race. The veil of separation has been rent. The wall of partition has been broken down.

The Rock of ages has been smitten in cruel, shameful crucifixion, and He has become the fountain of living waters. Jesus said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."

This well of the atonement is the source of the mighty river of salvation. It flows from the throne of God and of the Lamb. Its streams flow into every trusting heart. "There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High."

It is a vast river. It is wide enough to embrace all mankind. It is deep enough to meet every need. It is long enough to reach to endless eternity. And it is swift enough to sweep every lost soul into glory.

The water of life is free. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

In the next place let us consider

The Well of the Believing Heart.

Jesus said to the woman at the well of Sychar: "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." From the atonement of Christ, out of the throne and heart of God flows right into the trusting soul this water of life. It is springing or flowing water. It springs into the mind and makes it purer, more buoyant and vigorous. It flows into every part of the body and surcharges it with gladness and a larger measure of responsiveness.

In this well are deposited the indispensable graces of the Holy Spirit, "Love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance"; and these constantly springing up inspire and give character to desire, thought and activity. Love finds its object; joy beams from the countenance; peace flows as a river; longsuffering endures heroically and cheerfully the ills of life; gentleness imparts patience in tribulation; goodness reflects the character of God; faith ascends and reclines upon the bosom of the Father, meekness seeks the lowliest place; and temperance restrains the carnal instincts of mind and body.

In the third place let us consider

The Well of the Consecrated Life.

Jesus said, "He that believeth on me, as the scriptures hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." The streams of love, peace and joy from the river of salva-

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

tion flow into the believing soul, and streams of praise, prayer and influence flow out of the heart and life that is surrendered to God. God said to Abraham, "I will bless thee and make thee a blessing." The blessing of personal salvation and uplift becomes the means of conferring blessings upon others. Jesus is the Light of the world to the body of believers, and they in turn become the light of the world to all who dwell in darkness and sin. "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

WHEN PAUL TOOK STOCK.

Our spiritual poverty is all too often a tragedy of life. Riches beyond measure are ours for the taking. Paul was always making inventories of our wealth. If we read him more we might be richer than we are. In one of his books the Australian essayist, Frank W. Boreham, says that, as he was preparing a sermon on 'The Unsearchable Riches': "I was struck by the various translations. Dr. Weymouth speaks of the 'exhaustless wealth' of Christ; Dr. Moffat renders it 'fathomless wealth'; while Dr. Jowett tells a story. 'Once,' he says, 'I heard Dr. Rendel Harris read a chapter in which these words are found, and he read from his pocket Greek Testament and gave his own translation, and I remember how, when he came to this passage, he threw out his arms in a wide gesture as he repeated the words "the unexplorable wealth of Christ." If these synonyms are meaningless to us, are we not guilty indeed of Laodicean blindness? (Rev. 3:17, 18.)

—All eyes are turned toward Dayton, enn., the seat of the trial of John Scopes for teaching evolution contrary to State law. The ctors in the case seem to be puffed up with sense of their importance. They try to make the case parallel with that of Galileo, tried for teaching that the earth moves. But there is a vast distance between Scopes and Galileo. Scopes learned evolution as a parrot earns, "Polly wants a cracker," and teaches in the same manner, probably. The counsel for the two sides seem to feel that on their shoulders rests the destiny of civilization. But the truth will be found, if found at all, by a long process of investigation and study running through the years. Biological science is in its infancy. It has not cut its eye teeth yet.

—Why has evolution become so popular?
There are several reasons. Love of money partly explains. Text-book makers want to get head of competitors, and they try to do this by incorporating new teachings which they claim are improvements. Love of novelty helps to explain. There are minds that grasp after new ideas and are not careful to assure themselves that they are true ideas. Many teachers belong to this class. Then, thirdly, the supposed theological bearing of evolution helps to explain. Evolution, if it does not eliminate God, seems to remove Him to so great a distance that He is no longer to be feared. Many men welcome evolution as a relief from the ear of a Moral Governor.

The acceptance of a doctrine by large classes of men does not prove its truth. While many have assented to evolution theory, many more have not assented to it from lack of evidence and because of sentimental repugnance.

HE GOT HIMSELF IN ALSO.

The following incident was told by Gipsy
Smith in one of his sermons during his meetings in Nashville, Tenn.: "One night the eloquent minister, Dr. Charles Beery, sat in his study with his slippers on. Everybody had gone to bed in the house. It was after two o'clock, and he was reading and thinking. He was a great student. The bell rang, and he went to the door. It was in his first church, I should tell you, after he left college. He went to the door, and there stood a typical Lancashire girl with a shawl over her head and a pair of wooden shoes, which they call clogs in my country, on her feet.

"She said, 'Are you the minister?'

"'Yes,' he said.

"'Well,' she said, 'come quickly: I want you to get my mother in.'

"She was weeping. In telling the story to Dr. Jowett and to me, he said: 'I thought her mother was in a drunken brawl,' and said, 'If it is a case of that sort, you must get a policeman.' She said: 'It is not a policeman I want.
My mother is dying, and I want you to come and get her into heaven.'

"He stood there, he said, and wondered what he should do. He said he looked at her and said, 'Where do you live?' and she told him. It was a mile and a half away. It was after twelve o'clock at night, and he said,
'Isn't there a minister nearer?' She said:
'Yes, but I have come to you. My mother is dying.'

"He stood hesitating, wondering what the people would think if they saw him walking through the streets at that hour of night with a girl with a shawl over her head. He said: 'I thought more of my reputation than I did of that dying woman. But while debating, she caught hold of my sleeve and said: 'O man of God, make haste! My mother is dying. Make haste!'

"I got ready and went with her, and when I got there, it was a house of shame downstairs, with men singing their low songs and jokes and drinking, and upstairs the woman lay dying. And when I got in the room where she was lying, I began to talk to her about the Jesus I knew, and all I knew about Him was the Jesus of history and the Jesus of example, and Jesus the teacher.

"She wasn't interested, and tossed about on that pillow like a ship at sea in a storm, and she looked at me through her tears and said: 'Mister, that is no use; that is no use for the likes of me. I am a sinner. My life is lived. It is no example. I have wasted my life.
I haven't a chance. I can't live; I am dying.
Can't you tell me of somebody who can have mercy on a poor sinner, and save her and forgive sin?'

"Instantly I knew I was in the presence of a dying woman, and I had no message, I had no gospel, I had nothing to tell her. I was helpless. Here I was in the midst of sin and death, and I had no message; my ministry was no good to her.

"I saw it. And for the sake of that woman
I jumped back to my mother's knees and began to tell that woman what my mother had taught me as a child; that Christ died on the cross for poor sinners because He loved them and that He was able to save the uttermost, and she looked at me through her tears and said, 'Now you are getting at it; now you are getting at it. Tell me some more.' I told her the story, and I got her in. Blessed be God, I got her in, and I got in myself, and my ministry was revolutionized. I got myself in.'—

AN INVENTORY.

It is said that the somewhat eccentric but deeply religious man, John Newton, finding himself unconsciously drifting into an unhappy tendency to worry and find fault with his lot, at the beginning of a new year sat down and made the following quaint inventory:

January 1.

No money, but good mental powers.

No external fame, but quite a little home repute.

No genius, but some degree of common sense.

No high worldly connection, but easy access to God and adoption into His family.

No earthly property, but rich in God's love and forgiveness.

A careful scrutiny of life's ledger will usually reveal the fact that, after all, God has pretty well balanced our accounts.—Expositor.

as invested in electric railways. This approximates one-third of the Interstate Commerce Commission's valuation of the steam roads and is two per cent of the national wealth if —The whole creation is a mystery, and particularly that of man.—Sir Thomas Browne.

"THE ONLY FOUNDATION."

(An address by Prof. Geo. H. Crowell in presenting a Bible to High Point College, June 7, 1925.)

The idea of God is everywhere. If I ascend to heaven, He is there. If I make my bed in hell, He is there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the earth, even there Thy hands shall lead me and Thy right hand shall hold me. The idea is fundamental in the human heart. All nations and tongues and peoples believe in a God. No nations or peoples are so far removed from intelligence, or so steeped in superstition and ignorance as to be wholly devoid of the consciousness of God.

The conclusion comes, then, with the swiftness of a thought and with the force of an idea: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all things else shall be added unto you." That being true, no construction or organization or growth or development or building, physically or mentally or morally, is permanent and eternal unless it is stayed on God.

Foundation is necessary. The right kind of a foundation is the all-important thing. "Other foundation hath no man laid than that is laid, which is Christ our Lord." The everlasting challenge of life, mental, moral, or physical, is: On what are you founded? On what are you growing? On what are you thinking? On what are you building?

And if you are growing and thinking and building not on the word, your house is on the sand.

I. Building Physically.

I have gone up and down much on the earth, in the states, over the seas, through the woods, along the rivers, among the hills, climbed the mountains, crossed the Alps, gone up on towers, ascended monuments, mounted buildings, and on every hand all evidences declare in unmistakable tones and in a voice of thunder: "We are conceived and shapen by God and are held in the hollow of His hand."

II. Building Mentally.

For sixty years, I have been touching and tasting and smelling and hearing and seeing; and, indeed, searching, inquiring and discovering. And the first conclusion that dropped into my infant soul and mind from those hallowed precepts, examples, songs and lullabies of mother was God. And the growth, development, experiences, and the conclusions of my life at the close of each successive day, even to this glad hour, has been God. I have been a hard student of the history and the literature of my native tongue—Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, and German as well. I have quite memorized Young's Elements of Astronomy, De Chenelle's 5 volumes of Natural Science, volumes of Natural History, Hunter's Civic of Biology and Dr. Harris's Philosophical Basis of Theism. I have read Tyndal, Huxley, Darwin, Voltaire, Rousseau and Diderot. I have sat at the feet of an intellectual pagan teacher and studied four years at the University. But, everywhere, on every hand, and every minute, the all-powerful and ever-consuming conclusion, like a pole star, has ever kept shining and gleaming and declaring "The hand that made me and all things is divine."

III. Building Spiritually.

Hear ye the wisest, the richest and the wickedest man on this point. Of all the examples of history rich in experience, perhaps none is more impressive than that of King Solomon. Surely he surpassed all the kings of the earth in riches and largeness of heart. He received annually forty million dollars in gold. Together with the traffic of merchantmen, and with the kings of the various kingdoms and the governors of various governments, together with the ivory of India and the silver of Spain all swelled his income to well-nigh seventy five millions. He made shields of beaten gold, silver was as stones, cedars were as the sycamore trees in the vale in abundance. He gathered chariots and horsemen around to the number of a thousand and four hundred. He built temples and he built palaces.

And he was just as wise as he was rich. His understanding was exceeding. He had wisdom and he had knowledge. He was a statesman and a poet. He spake three thousand proverbs, and wrote songs to a thousand and five. And he was just as wicked as he was rich and wise. In the midst of such wealth, luxury and corruption naturally grew and enveloped king and people. His expensive court, his costly palaces, his powerful navies, his outlay for a gorgeous show, his thousand and four hundred chariots and his multitude of attendants, all enslaved the nation and was despotism so deep that there could be heard groans and mutterings and yells of vengeance.

His love for strange women, his multitude of wives, his cleaving unto those nations of which the Lord said, "Ye shall not go unto them," organized a system of polygamy so extensive that the social life of Jerusalem was rotten to the core.

Every enjoyment that money could buy, that wisdom could devise, that kingly power could control, that commerce could import, and that vice could fathom, all these things were tried by him, and yet he failed to find any satisfaction in any of them.

He walked in beautiful gardens, lounged in splendid palaces, delighted in rich wines, reveled in the consciousness of pleasure, enjoyed the sweets of riches and wallowed in the cesspools of filth of licentiousness, and yet he failed to find any satisfaction in any of these.

The great cord which bound his heart to God had not yet been touched and his life had as yet been a complete failure. His wisdom and his riches, his power and his passion, were all striking lessons to him that there is something else in life than mere living, that ease and comfort and joy and gladness and satisfaction come from the simple life, and that the truth of all things, yea the conclusion of all things is, "Fear God and keep his commandments," for this is the whole man. The richest thought of the richest life that ever lived, and I would ten thousand times that each one of you would meditate upon this great motto until you shall see how it transmutes the restless life of him who seeks happiness here below, into a sublime consciousness of living with God, and sweeps the soul not with midnight gales but with sweet and bracing airs from heaven which shall eventually carry all clouds from the sky and flood the spirit with everlasting sunlight.

The reason for the passing of the pagan world is a question of the insecurity of the foundation. The reason of the fall of Babylon, Nineveh and Gazale of old, is a question of the insecurity and rottenness of the foundation. The reason of the overthrow of the Grecian and Roman civilization, is a question of the insecurity and mistaken ideals of its foundation. The reason of the destruction of life in wars, famines and pestilences, and the deprivation, woe and want among the children of men, is a question of the insecurity and false ideals of its foundation.

On what are you building?

On what are you thinking?

On what are you growing?

"In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth," and He did it in six days, six literal days, twenty-four-hour days, and the history of the world since creation is, such as is represented in the Bible account. But if each day were a cycle of a hundred million years what boots it? God is able to think and to do and to say what He pleases. And our Lord and Christ was the Creator. All things were created by Him that are in the heavens above, that are on the earth beneath and that are in the waters under the earth and without Him was not anything made that was made. Thus, by a two-fold tie, we know Him and belong to Him; He made us and redeemed us. An unmistakable fact! An unmistakable knowledge of a fact! "Hereby we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." And the more we know Him and of Him, the more wonderful and satisfying He becomes, and the more certain we know from whence we came and whither we are going.

Ignorance of God is the cause of all the divers heresies, disbeliefs, reasonings and theorizing. Ignorance of God is a reflection upon man's intellect.

The earth, the hills, the rivers, the seas, the oceans, the worlds, the stars, all reflect in unmistakable terms His wisdom, His Glory, His stability, His passion and His power.

No monkey business in and about God! With Him it is the mount of Transfiguration! With Him it is all Supernatural! With Him it is High and Lifted Up! With Him it is Omnipotence, Omnipotence! With Him it is God created!

1. Puny little, ignorant evolutionist! Going to the enormous expense of buying many books of airy theories of the universe and of mankind, devoting many ages to an evolving process from protoplasm, then a million years to the tadpole, then cycles and cycles to the frog, the aeons and aeons to the monkey, then multiplied millions to man, and the latest stages of that man still indicates the prehensile appetite. And then all nature rested from its labors on the seventh day. Ridiculous!

God is a fact! True science is a fact! True science deals with facts! Evolution is not a fact! It is a theory which attempts to explain certain facts and give causes for them. It is based on a premise, or a hypothesis, which is another name for a guess, and which lies outside the realm of science altogether.

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made. In Him was life, and the Life was the Light of men. The Light shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehended it not."

2. Puny little, ignorant agnostic! Spent ing his days in beautiful and airy theories of how the mind with all its powers is incapable of knowing God; or, in all its searchings, theorizings and huntings, can never find God, and thus robbing life of all zest, hope and immortality.

Over against this atom or speck or gnat, proclaims forth St. Paul, the scholar, the man of God, the man who saw God and talked with God: "In Him we live and move and have our being," and living and loving and thinking and acting, thus "attuned with the Infinite." We verily walk and talk with God, see the heavens open and the angels ascending and descending in holy ministrations to the redeemed.

3. Puny little ignorant atheist! Denying flatly the existence of God and adding embarrassment to embarrassment by seeking to explain the existence of all things by chance!

1. Water chanced to run down hill.
2. My heart chanced to beat.
3. I chanced to fall in love.
4. The old rooster chanced to crow.

Fool! Fool! "A start natal fool!"

The Scripture has it, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

4. Puny little ignorant Modernist! Denying the divinity of Christ, the deity of Christ, the virgin birth, all of which Jesus declared in unmistakable terms, and claim to look upon him as a good man, a great teacher, a superior example of virtue, and in the same breath declare that they cannot accept his words as facts.

Can an impostor be a model man? Can a blasphemer and a liar be an exemplar of every virtue? Can a man who speaks falsehoods be a great teacher? The deity of Christ rests with his virgin birth. It is the one way God chose to make His Son incarnate God. To deny His virgin birth is to deny His deity.

Can any respecting man disclaim the truth of the voice out of the heavens on his baptismal day which cried, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased!"

This gospel is a gospel of fact, divine, eternal fact. It is a fact that Jesus Christ was born in Bethlehem. The old, old miracle of human birth was in him complete, overt, absolute. It is a fact that he was virgin-born, the new glad miracle of the divine incarnation burgeoned in him in glorious beauty and power through the paternity of the Holy Ghost. It is a fact that he lived, that he suffered, that he died, and that, being dead, he rose again and was seen of above five hundred witnesses whose testimony abides through the ages.

Equally is it a fact that, being risen, he ascended up above all heavens to sit at the right hand of the majesty of God. All these divine facts are matters of conscious experience to men, as they are matters of knowledge to the august spiritual assemblies of the universe.

The church that holds to this order of doctrine and confession is a part of the living church. The church which denies this order and confession has a name to live but is dead. "Without me ye can do nothing."

5. Poor little ignorant man, teaching that Christ is the sum total of the universe, and seeking to embody in prose or poetry a story of the evolution of all things to the perfection of a Christ, making him a cosmic Christ, a cosmic development or evolution!

Cosmos is the universe!

Cosmic is of the universe!

A cosmic Christ, an evolution Christ, which reduces Him from deity and divinity to mere materialism, and thus robs Him of all power, authority, efficacy, and renders the word impotent of life and immortality.

The task of the church is not only to retain the doctrine of truth and salvation in the grip of intellectual and spiritual possession; it is also to defend and establish these doctrines as a world heritage, a world illumination. That defense is the supreme need of the hour.

Destructive Bible criticism has been pretty thoroughly dislodged from its old pragmatic positions; but while it has particularly abandoned its fight against the canonical and compositional integrity of the New Testament, it has redoubled the intensity of its assault upon the cardinal doctrines of the gospel, the divine, miraculous birth of our Lord, the crimson atonement made in his blood, his bodily resurrection from the dead, and the present and eternal spiritual power of his Messianic redemption and reign. These doctrines are the eternal rock foundation of the living church. Other foundation can no man lay.

Jesus claimed pre-existence, omnipresence, omnipotence, infallibility, sinlessness, exclusive dominion over the souls of men, creative power, exclusive knowledge of God, to have and to give eternal life, power to raise the dead, power to forgive sins, power to judge the world! We cannot sit silent and listen without protest to the borrowed crudities, the rehashes of infidelity, atheism, modernism, Platonic philosophy, pure paganism, together with blundering interpretations which today are palmed off as the very latest discoveries of knowledge and science. It is ignorance! Ignorance! Unadulterated ignorance of the love and power of the Almighty God! And it spells the inevitable doom and downfall of men, institution, state, nation and people who are spout such vile blasphemous stuff and nonsense.

Alexander the Great conquered the world and wept for others to conquer; but no man on earth has the slightest concern for any law, or any institution, or for any temple that that old pagan and Grecian war god ever made.

Caesar dominated the mightiest empire of his time, but no man cares a whit for Caesar's mighty example of hate, cruelty, power and dominion now.

Napoleon drenched all Europe in blood, made and unmade kingdoms and empires, spoke words in the East big as pyramids, crowned his brothers and sisters and favorites with royalty, brushed aside the Alps, and overran all Italy; but no man is touched with fear, pity or compassion for the downfall of that old atheist at Waterloo, or for his ashes in his silent tomb at Paris. And, likewise, the life and work of heathen, pagan, infidel, idolater, atheist, agnostic, modernist, evolutionist, theorist, sinner, and disbeliever is dead!

No voice of love, hope, faith, command or authority issues from their silent tombs or from their forgotten lives.

But, nineteen centuries ago, standing on the slopes of Olivet, speaking to a few fishermen and lowly toilers, Jesus said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I command you, and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

I cry aloud and refrain not in the hope of the glory of God: "Other foundation has no man laid than that is laid which is Jesus Christ our Lord."

Go teach it in the home.

Go teach it in the church.

Go teach it in the school.

Go teach it in the college.

Go teach it in ideals and standards.

Let there be no other foundation!

High Point College is no accident. It is a conception of God and an heir unto righteousness.

You are called unto a responsibility and a work. Dig deep, throw out the dirt, lay your foundation on the Rock, keep the watchmen in the tower awake day and night, lest evolution or atheism or agnosticism or modernism or infidelity or false ideals or the devil creep in and gnaw at your life.

Let the university and the scientist go on and teach all forms of "tommyrot and devilry," but as for me, High Point College, we, High Point College, will serve and teach the Lord. We, High Point College, will keep on the Rock and keep our lamps trimmed and burning, not only for today, but for the future. If this language does not pledge to the living church the primacy of world thought, then a meaning can hardly be deduced from it. To the church is given not only the authority to teach all nations in spiritual truth but also to purvey in the realm of the intellect. It is only that the church has failed to meet its obligation that the state has had to take up the task of general education. The church should seek in great and challenging institutions of its own founding to instruct first itself and then the children of the nations without in the intellection and thought which are basal in the life of faith, thus "casting down every vain imagination and bringing all things into captivity to the will of Christ."

Let the church lead in the constructive and demonstrative sciences, in archaeology, in biology, in geology, in criticism, and in the field of social experimentations. If startling discoveries are to be made in these realms, let the church make them and face them with the calmness and confidence with which all truth is to be faced.

The living church is marked by its leadership in world service.

The parable of the Good Samaritan and the parable of the nobleman who went into a far country to secure for himself a kingdom and to return measure the gamut of world service by the church. The Christ who walked with healing touch among the lazzaroni of Galilee thought it not a thing to be grasped at that he should also include the kingdoms of this world in the program of His messianic reign and ministry.

The church cannot be indifferent to what is going on in Geneva and at The Hague. The league of nations and the world court are not academic questions to the true followers of the Galilean Christ, at whose birth the angels sang, "Peace on earth, good will to men," and who himself said: "And I, if

HIGH POINT COLLEGE AS SEEN BY A PATRON.

Those who have helped to make High Point College a possibility have had a deep concern, among other things, as to the standard of excellence of the work the college would do. To determine this fully requires two estimates.

Double Standard.

First, the standard of instruction and of requirement on the part of members of the faculty. This standard is the exact measurement of the opportunity offered students for progress in their studies and in fitting themselves for life's work.

Second, the standard of work done by the students themselves in the use of the opportunity offered. A high standard of instruction and of requirement on the part of the faculty and a high standard of work by the students means a finished product as graduates of which any college may be proud.

Such standards and such work done count for vastly more than the age of the institution also for vastly more than the reputation of the institution. The student who thinks he can succeed in life on the reputation or the age of the college he attended will be disillusioned before he gets far in life if not before he starts. He may start, but I doubt it, on the reputation of his college, but he cannot run on it. By the time he is ready to shift into high he will find that he must have his own motor and run on his own power. The world may, but it may not, ask one time what college you attended, at the start in life. But after that, when you want a promotion or a higher position, the question will be: "What can you do?" "How well can you do it?"

High Point College Offers It.

That High Point College has set a high standard of excellence I am thoroughly convinced, and I have a conviction that any thoughtful person will be similarly convinced if he will take the pains to investigate. Because

1. Prominent disinterested educators who have examined the curriculum and have gone over the list of instructors declare what High Point College offers to be A Grade.

2. A standard grade college in North Carolina and one in South Carolina have declared incidentally a willingness to give full credit, should occasion arise, for work done in High Point College.

3. Students who have done work in both High Point College and in other standard colleges declare the instruction offered in High Point College to be fully equal to that offered in the other standard colleges where they have knowledge of the work done.

4. It was my privilege for three years to sit in class as a student of a college of a former generation, and occasionally to sit in class as a visitor of High Point College and of one other standard college of this generation. As a result of my own experience and observation I unhesitatingly declare that I believe the instruction offered by High Point College to be as good as that offered by any college of which I have knowledge, and I make no odious comparison when I say this. I may add that I am saying this as a satisfied patron of High Point College, a patron who would not willingly allow the opportunity of a son or daughter to be impaired by attending an inferior or second rate institution. T. M. Johnson. Mebane.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

District Rally at Weaverville.

Saturday and Sunday, July 4th and 5th, were spent with the workers of the Asheville District in a rally at Weaverville. Wife and I drove up on Friday and back on Monday. The mountains are very beautiful at this time of year, and we thoroughly enjoyed the drive. We also enjoyed being with the folks in the rally. Brother Bates had prepared a good program. The people attended well, all things being considered.

The Weaverville church is running a good Sunday school, and plans are being made for series of meetings between now and conference. I am hoping that similar plans can and will be worked out for Mt. Zion church.

The rally closed Sunday afternoon, and we attended church at Clarks Chapel at the evening hour. The church was well filled with eager worshippers and workers. Numbers of them pledged themselves to better service, and there were three conversions at the altar with two other penitents who were not satisfied. This church is certainly wide-awake. Brother Love is doing a splendid work among them.

Bethel Home.

On Saturday evening Mrs. Dixon and I had the pleasure of visiting the Bethel Home and taking supper with Brother Casto and those who are living there with him trying to regain their health. We enjoyed being with them, and just about the time the sun was hiding himself behind the western mountains we enjoyed a quiet service on the front porch of that Home. May God bless Brother Casto in his quiet, splendid work for the Master.

Pastors and Workers Please Note.

Please look in another column in the Herald and find your standing on budgets.

The last Annual Conference ordered me to arrange the Honor Roll of churches and charges for the next Conference Journal.

It is my purpose to offer just such a list as we are now publishing in the Herald, so each charge will be given honor for what it has done when conference comes. On circuits if individual churches pay out on either or both budgets and report that fact to me a list of those churches will also be made.

Appointments.

Sunday, July 12, West Thomasville, opening of new church.

July 12, evening, Saxapahaw.

July 19, Efland, Home-Coming Day.

August 1 and 2, Friendship, Why Not Circuit, District Rally.

Yours in the Master's service,

A. G. Dixon.

Glen Raven.—Our special meeting closed Thursday night, July 2. Brother S. W. Taylor was pulpit help. He did some wonderful preaching. All enjoyed it very much. There were about 50 conversions and 27 members added to the church and there are still more to be taken in. The Lord is doing a great work around Glen Raven. On last Sunday we had 162 at Sunday school and are hoping to have 200 by the third Sunday.

The Men's Federation of Burlington helped us out very much in these services. I wish to say they are always welcome in our village. They meet with us every Sunday morning at 8:30 o'clock in the men's prayer meeting in which all are taking a great interest. The young people are also taking an interest in this work; they have organized a Christian Endeavor society. We hope that this great work may continue. As a token of appreciation of what Brother Taylor did for us they presented him a purse of $29.80. We begin our special meeting at Haw River tonight, the 6th, with Brother Hendry as pulpit help. Pray for us that we may have a great meeting. In His service, T. A. Williams, Pastor.

Union Grove, Forsyth Circuit.—Our protracted meeting is to begin Monday night, July the 13th. There is to be service at three P. M. in the day and eight at night during next week with three services on Sunday, July the 19th. Rev. N. G. Bethea is to help Brother Curry in the meeting. We ask all who read this to pray that God may have his way in this meeting and all who can to come and worship God with us. A Member.

Charlotte.—The regular monthly communion service was held on Sunday morning, July 5. A large number partook of the Sacrament.

A special feature of the morning service was a duet, "Saved by Grace," sung by Mrs. H. F. Surratt and Miss Carrie Muse.

During the Sunday school hour "Echoes from the Young People's Summer Conference" were given by Mr. Roy Garmon, Mr. William McCall and Misses Ruby McCombs and Grey Stiles. Mr. Garmon's talk was especially interesting, as he gave an account of each day in detail.

At the third quarterly conference Mrs. Virgil Presnell was elected delegate to the Annual Conference.

The annual Children's Day service was held the second Sunday in June. A beautiful program was rendered and much credit is due the girls and boys who made it a success and especially to Mrs. P. C. Carpenter, Mrs. H. F. Surratt and Mrs. R. S. Garmon, who so faithfully trained the children.

Mrs. R. S. Garmon delightfully entertained the Ladies' Aid society on Monday evening, July 6, at her home on Mecklenburg avenue. Sixteen members were present. This society is doing some splendid work, over $200 has been raised by the society since May 1.

The regular monthly business meeting of the Philathea class will be held at the home of Mrs. E. E. Rutledge on Chadwick avenue, on Tuesday afternoon. The Philatheas under the efficient leadership of Miss Enolia Presnell have increased their membership from seven to 18 since the class was organized a few months ago.

The annual Sunday school picnic was held on Saturday afternoon, July 4, at Stewart's Lake. A large crowd went and all reported a good time in spite of inclement weather.

Union prayer services are being held on Wednesday evenings at Independence Park during July and August. The following churches, Hawthorne Lane M. E. Church, St. John's Baptist church, Caldwell Memorial, Presbyterian, St. Martin, Episcopal, Myers Park, Moravian, Holy Trinity, Lutheran, and First Methodist Protestant, uniting in these services, manifesting a fine community spirit. Rev. R. H. Daugherty, pastor of Hawthorne Lane, M. E. church, will conduct the service Wednesday afternoon of this week.

Mrs. A. F. Love, Reporter.

July 7.

Guilford Circuit.—Fairfield celebrated children's day the third Sunday in June. Bro. J. Norman Wills came over in the morning and gave a splendid address. His coming was very much appreciated by pastor and people. The children's exercises occupied the afternoon hour. They showed good training and aptitude.

The special meeting begins at this place with Rev. D. R. Williams of Graham to assist. Plans are being worked to still further improve this beautiful plant.

Vickrey fell in line with their children's day the next Sunday. Rev. N. M. Harrison, dean of men for High Point College, captured the large audience in the afternoon. All want him to come again. Offering considerably increased over last year.

This church is looking forward with pleasing anticipations to entertaining the circuit rally August 13th.

Mitchell's Grove had children's day the first Sunday in July. The pastor gave an address in the morning and the Sunday-school had charge in the afternoon. They had only two weeks to prepare, and the successful rendering of the program is largely due to the willingness with which each one did his part and attended the meetings for practice. Only some serious hindrance prevented every one from being there every time.

Midway is planning to have children's day some time later, unavoidable circumstances making postponement necessary.

When the pastor preached at this church two weeks ago the room was lighted with oil lamps. Last Sunday night when he stepped across the threshold some one pressed a button and the room was flooded with a beautiful electric light.

The account of the children's day at Hickory Grove has already been published. I will only add that the people very much enjoyed the addresses of Mrs. Dixon, wife of our president, and the address of Rev. L. W. Gerringer, pastor of Calvary church. Thanks to both of these. Come again. Mrs. Dixon also spent the fourth Sunday in June on this charge, visiting and speaking at Hickory Grove, Vickrey, and Mitchell's Grove. All join in thanking her for her helpful efforts.

C. H. Whitaker.

BOARD OF EDUCATION ITEMS.

A report from Kansas City University informs us that there are nearly two hundred in the summer school, the largest attendance in the history of the school.

The secretary attended the commencement exercises of Westminster College, Texas, and greatly enjoyed the privilege. There is no question concerning the great interest of the surrounding community in the school. Large crowds attended all the exercises.

Several days were spent at Adrian also. Not in many years have so many former students and alumni been able to return for commencement. Metcalf Hall was crowded to its capacity for the annual alumni dinner and the address delivered by Dr. T. Alexander Cairns was one of the finest ever given at these gatherings. Although Adrian's financial needs are acute the loyalty of her friends gives promise of something substantial being done to correct that situation.

Nearly two weeks spent at High Point College attending the school of methods which was held there gave an opportunity to become better acquainted with the college situation. In spite of the fact that the deficit for the year was larger than anticipated the school was in every way a remarkable success. The enrollment reached the surprising figure of 134 and most of these students plan to return for next year. Four men are in the field for the summer canvassing for students. It is felt by President R. M. Andrews that if they can have 160 boarding students and 100 day students the school can pay expenses another year without any difficulty. The loyalty of the student body and the determination of our people to make the enterprise a success is truly remarkable. They know not the word fail.

The endowment campaign for Western Maryland is proceeding so satisfactorily there is no doubt of its success. The last reports indicate the subscriptions have now gone well over $300,000. Although the goal still seems some distance away to make it the full $375,000 in order to secure the $125,000 from the state and the $125,000 from the General Board of Education there is no disposition to stop but to work harder than ever to secure every pledge possible. Western Maryland has come to a critical moment in its life. If the campaign succeeds it will mean a bigger and better school and the privilege of continuing to rank among the best schools of the east. For the campaign to fail would be a tragedy. It would be a defeat from which recovery would be well night impossible. However, Dr. Ward, who has always made things go will not fail now. He is certain to succeed.

An interesting item of news comes to us from Kansas City. The Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, are uniting in an effort to establish a great university on the outskirts of Kansas City, not far from the Missouri line. A valuable tract of land has been donated for the cause and a campaign under the leadership of Dr. John Hancher is under way to raise $3,000,000 for endowment. The erection of the first building will be started next summer and it is planned to have within a few years the greatest denominational school in the Central West. Some Methodist Protestant people are fearful that this plan will make our efforts there more difficult than ever. Frequently, however, that is not the case. One school stimulates the other. We hope that will be true here.

That our people might become better acquainted with the new chancellor of Kansas City University we are submitting herewith a brief sketch of his life.

Rev. William O. Jones, D. D.

W. O. Jones, chancellor Kansas City University, was born in Virginia in 1874. He was one of twelve children, six boys and six girls. His father was a United Brethren preacher in the Virginia Conference.

When William was only a lad of thirteen years, his father died, leaving the responsibility of the family upon his mother and the older children.

In early childhood he felt the call to the work of the ministry. In after years he tried to get away from his consciousness of duty in this line and wanted to study law and finally did decide to take up medicine but the feeling of duty and responsibility would not down. In March, 1895, he was licensed to preach and was admitted to membership in the Virginia Annual Conference.

After graduating at S. C. I., Dayton, Va., 1895, he was assigned as junior pastor to the Berkley Springs charge. There were only thirteen appointments on this charge so the young preacher learned something of real circuit riding. Later he left the active work to pursue his school work in other schools and later entered Bonebrake Seminary, Dayton, O., from which he graduated in 1902. He was ordained at the commencement, G. Campbell Morgan assisted in the ordination.

Mr. Jones carried credentials from four of the schools of his church. He has served as pastor, evangelist, conference superintendent, and recently resigned the presidency of York College, York, Nebraska. He began his work with Kansas City University June 4, 1925.

NOT YET.

I have not seen His face—

Not yet, not yet,
But oft beside mine own

His feet are set,
And I'll no strangeness feel,
No chill surprise,
That glad day when He bids
Me lift mine eyes.

If I have felt His touch
I am not sure;
Yet, when earth's sorrow grows
Past all earth's cure,
Comes there such sense of Him,
So close, so dear,
That mine own blood and breath
Seem not more near.

I have not heard His voice;
That, too, I wait,
Yet, not so much I pray
Heaven's opening gate
And all that sings or shouts
Dark Jordan past,
As but to hear Him speak
At home, at last.

I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

Twenty-five years ago I had the honor of making a speech, five minutes in the old century and ten minutes in the new. At that day there was only one auto in High Point, the streets were mud and lighted with oil lamps. I prophesied that in this new century the wagon, the buggy, the horse, would become obsolete and relegated to disuse, that the auto would be rushing at a 240 rate on the highways, that we would be flying thru the air, eating food tablets, cooking with electricity and the heat of the sun, and walking and talking with God in the radio.

Where are we today? Only 25 years have gone, and these developments are our daily companions. What may we not expect and realize within the next 25 years? 50 years? 75 years? Imagination, only, can tell!

Let the horse, the mule, the wagon, the buggy, become an heirloom like the old spinning wheel! Let the truck and the tractor do the work on the farm! Let the auto and the bus put the express, freight and passenger trains out of business!

Let the aeroplane and the dirigible buzz in the heavens as plentifully as Ford cars honk on the earth, carrying passengers, freight and mail from town to town, city to city, and across the seas.

Verily, let "cops" hover in the air to prevent speeding, danger and collision. Let space be annihilated by long distance wireless telegraphy and the radio, so that while we walk and work we may "tune in" and enjoy with our neighbors round the world music, concerts, fireside gossip, business, politics, worship! Let science in all lines develop to that we may live on food tablets, clothe in the priestly garb of Adam and Eve before Eve bit the apple, heat our homes with stored up sun rays; milk, churn and eat by electricity.

Let there be no more sickness, sorrow, pain and death by keeping ourselves eternally well and happy by thinking that we are better and better each day. Let there be no more night here by virtue of the actinic radium rays, the eternal presence of God in the eternal waves of ether, so that we may ever live, move and have our being with God, the source of all light!

Yes, let come what may, stand High Point College like a mount of adamant for righteousness, and walk worthily of your high calling and make your election sure and become not entangled with the world. I shall stand by you and rejoice with you in your victories and in your defeats.

Again I rejoice and am exceeding glad and have come back to my "First Love" to educate my children, out of my own home, in High Point College, and to live and to die with you and among you.

And now in behalf of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, a nobler band never walked the earth, your friends, your well wishers in all things, your guard keepers, a band whose hearts and sentiments with respect to the Bible, virtue, liberty, and patriotism, are in full sympathy and accord with what I have spoken, I am elected, delegated and commanded to present to you the Word, the Foundation, the Rock, on which to build. With this charge, if you "wobble on the gudgeon" and prove recreant to your duty and let a little bullet head scientist, or gnat of evil come in and begin to murder the faith of our children, they, the Junior Order, will rise up and stand as it were with one foot on the Sheraton and the other on the pinnacle of your college and with a megaphone large enough to make a voice like an archangel, cry: "Doom! Doom!" and keep it up until you close your doors.

Let there be one college in this great state and in this great nation and in all the world that will be true, and where we may place our children and have their faith strengthened, rather than undermined, where they will be taught that God is the Author, Creator and Maker of all things, that we may become like Him and see Him as He is, rather than evolving from protoplasm to a tadpole, to a monkey, to a man, to a cosmic Christ, the Sum Total of the Universe.

Here is the blessed Book of Books, the Word of God, the Foundation of all things! Accept it as the most exact science, the profoundest philosophy, the most interesting history, the richest literature, the highest code of morals, the one true aim and conclusion of life, "Fear God and keep his commandments," for this is the whole man. Accept it as your rich inheritance and precious treasure. And walk about it, your Zion, and go round about her. Tell the towers thereof. Mark you well her bulwarks. Consider her palaces that you may tell it to the generations following."

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

I desire to introduce this article with a quotation from Rabbi Wise. Dr. Wise said: "America is infinitely more than an aggregation of 110,000,000 people. America is all that the submerged races of the world wish to be and cannot be; to me America is the realization of what the ages have hoped and labored for.

"It is a definition. It is a creed. It is a challenge. God built here a continent of glory and filled it with treasures untold. He carpeted it with the soft rolling prairies, and pillared it with the thundering mountains. He studded it with soft flowing fountains, and traced it with long, winding streams. He graced it with deep-shadowed forests and filled them with song.

"Then He called unto a thousand peoples, and summoned the bravest among them. They came from the ends of the earth, each bearing a gift, and a hope. The glow of adventure was in their eyes, and the glory of hope within their souls, and out of the labor of men, and the bounty of the earth, out of the prayers of men and the hopes of the world, God fashioned a nation in love, blessed it with a purpose divine, and called it—America."

The foundations of America were laid by men who believed in God. Three hundred years and more ago God raised up a company of people who sought a place where they might worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. They were denied this right in Great Britain where they were born, and sought asylum in Holland. But in Holland they were not accorded the privileges which they believed were theirs by divine right, and they sought and obtained permission to found a colony in the New World, to be established upon the foundation of civil and religious liberty.

Who can tell the extent of the influence of that wonderful Mayflower compact made by the Pilgrims before they set foot upon the soil of the land chosen for their colony? No careful student of history but will agree that it has been far-reaching, ennobling, and uplifting throughout all the years. All through the years, God has continued to raise up the men needed for the hour and the responsibility to be borne. What a long list of leaders must be called in the presentation of the names of the God-fearing men who have led the nation up to this hour. To begin to name them is to insure the omission of others who have made large contributions to the development of this nation chosen of God to lead the world. Others will come after them, and God's plans shall not be defeated.

There is a wide-spread assumption that the cause of man is already won in America. There is a complacency of fatalism which seems to assume a special providence for idiots and fools and for the people of the United States. Other nations may pass through periods of great distress, their destinies may hang in the balance, but we seem to think our status is secure. It can only be secure as God's purposes are wrought out in America. Other nations have defied the Almighty and have perished. Were they sinners above all others? Our destiny depends upon our obedience, our service to mankind, and our faith. America cannot continue half slave (to Satan) and half free. America must be truly Christian to endure.

Charles H. Beck.

AN OPEN LETTER FROM A NEW YORK PASTOR TO THE HEAD OF THE NATIONAL ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE.

For sixteen years I have been one of two men annually elected to membership in the Board of Trustees of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, by the New York East Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, which is one of the leading conferences of that denomination. Its territory covers one-half of the State of Connecticut; a large and populous portion of Westchester County, N. Y.; portions of the Boroughs of Bronx and Manhattan; also Brooklyn, "The City of Churches," and the most populous borough of the greater city, and all of Long Island.

For nearly four years I was a member of the Board of Directors of the League, and therefore have some little knowledge of conditions, past and present. After long and careful thought I am convinced that unless there is a change in the State Superintendency of the Anti-Saloon League in this State, I shall be obliged to report to my Conference, at its next annual session, that in my judgment the management of the League has betrayed its constituency into defeating its ideals and objectives—the destruction of the lawless liquor traffic;—thus worse than wasting the great sums of money contributed for this purpose; and shall advise that the Conference refuse to recommend the opening of its pulpits for support. But formally advise against it as long as the present Superintendent remains.

I believe that the present situation is one of extreme gravity, and, in my opinion, that the State organization, unless there is a change, will collapse long before the Conference meets in the early Spring of 1926. If that is permitted, the consequences will be serious indeed to the cause of Prohibition throughout the State and the Nation.

I am appealing to you as National Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America to intervene before it is too late. The National League is functioning. It has not violated the principles that have been the inspiration of its marvelous success. It has never deceived or betrayed its supporters by giving a victory to its enemies. It has jurisdiction within New York State.

The dry forces in New York State are sound at heart. They have confidence in the National League and its leadership. They trust the State President of the League, who fortunately is on record as trying to prevent an inexcusable disaster. They have been dazed, perplexed, irritated and angered by the blundering management which was responsible for the re-election of Governor Smith, the worst foe of State enforcement of National Prohibition in the entire country, over a man who in public utterances and personal communication, had declared for the thing the churches backing the League wanted, and supported the League to get. Conceding it was no worse than a blunder, any management capable of such a blunder is forever disqualified in the field where it made that blunder. But this is not the worst. The indisputable record shows that an effort was made to deceive the State Board and the dry constituency generally.

After such disclosures, what assurance can it give that the churches will feel safe in accepting? And how can there be any hope for the future under a management that has so treated the political leaders, without whom there is not the slightest hope of victory?

This appeal has nothing to do with the treatment of Mr. Wm. E. Anderson, which I consider inexpressibly foolish and morally reprehensible. It is based on a transaction in which he had not the slightest personal concern. The fact that he saw the situation while in prison and tried to save the cause, and even the management that was stabbing him while he was helpless is significant. I was on the Board of Trustees of the Anti-Saloon League long before Mr. Anderson became State Superintendent, and am under no obligation to him except those of fairness, good faith and Christian consideration. The treacherous conspiracy which compelled his resignation, which, with a little minority group, I vigorously denounced, has been a matter of deep grief and hot indignation. I am not trying to secure his re-instatement, how ever much I would rejoice to see it done. The League has lost his invaluable leadership forever.

The fight in this State is hard enough under any circumstances. It is trebly so now. It is hopeless if we must go on under a leadership that neither the army nor the allies can trust, on either judgment or veracity.

The present management deliberately, and some say cold-bloodedly, in excuse of a policy which, in the most charitable light, was an amazing blunder of not only refusing to be fair, but even of conniving at, or helping to discredit Mr. Anderson, said in substance: "The cause is greater than any man, no matter who he is or what he has done." For one who in fact is responsible for sacrificing the prohibition cause in the State in the effort to help finish the destruction of the man who carried that cause to victory in Nation and State, that was a fatal thing to say. The present Superintendent had the greatest opportunity offered to any dry leader in recent years to prove himself both a big man and great leader. He has most signally failed, after leading the dry churches of the State to an ignominious and unnecessary defeat—the greatest needless setback the cause of prohibition has ever suffered. He can hardly be greater than the cause. This is conclusive reason for his resignation. This is no case of unsupported assertion upon which there can be two opinions. The proof lies in official utterances for which he is responsible. That proof is now in the hands of the pastors and press of the State. It was in possession of the anti-prohibition forces before it was marshalled for the pastors. The only way to keep the enemy from using it effectively is to move first. Unless this is done the State League will have disintegrated and the liquor traffic will be back in power before the present management could regain the confidence which it has forfeited. I, therefore, believe that unless there is a change the churches will repudiate the management and will force action anyhow, or still worse will quit supporting it and let the responsibility for the death of the organization rest on the National leaders. In my judgment prompt and effective action offers the only possible way of escape from internal disruption or slow death from starvation. This is the only alternative.

All these considerations make it a duty for me to speak, and the policy and present State management of the League, with their threats of what they would do to Mr. Anderson if he exposed their short comings reveals the animus shown against him and will be correctly estimated by the public at large; and the seeming acquiescence by the National League, doubtless due to a failure to comprehend the real facts, compels me to make this letter public as the only insurance of prompt and actual consideration on its merits and as the best way to hold the dry churches of the State in line in hope of an early change. The best time of the year for such action is here. There are two full months till September. A new man recommended by the National League can start in the Fall with the confidence of the churches and give you a chance to save the Anti-Saloon League of New York in the State where it is needed the most.

In the name of the great majority of law respecting and law abiding citizens, in the name of the hundreds of thousands representing the Christian Church, in the name of the nearly five thousand ministers, in the name of truth and righteousness, and in the name of Almighty God, I urge you to send us a man who is more interested in fighting the liquor traffic than in trying to discredit William H. Anderson, and keep him from fighting it.

Most of those who are your best reliance in the State have more confidence in him than ever since the facts about his treatment have come out; and they have the more faith in his judgment because of the glaring contrast.

Very sincerely yours,

Wilbur E. Schoonhoven.

MY IMPRESSIONS OF HIGH POINT COLLEGE AS A STUDENT.

North Carolina is the best state in the Union. High Point College is the best college in the state. I do not say this hesitatingly. Persons of other denominations will quite naturally and justly disagree with me. Yet I still maintain my statement that High Point College is the best college in North Carolina.

High Point College is a college for the young people of the Methodist Protestant denomination and the other denominations; hence it is run with the interests of the young people foremost. The purposes of this institution seem to be and are threefold—mental, moral and spiritual development. There is no part of the life of the student neglected. There is a "time for work and a time for play" spirit manifested around the campus always.

The courses offered at High Point College are comprehensive and meet the needs of every student. They enable one to specialize in various subjects and obtain either an A. B. or B. M. degree.

One of the greatest points in favor of the college is its location. Situated in the outskirts of one of the most beautiful and healthful cities of the state the college has the advantages of beauty and health at the same time. The spirit of forlornness and weariness is not present at High Point College for the campus faces one of the busiest highways of the State and thus there is always a spirit of business around the campus.

Still there are two reasons that may be the real ones that makes me say that High Point is the best college. They are the efficient faculty and the convenient buildings. Even though the faculty is not as great in number as that of some of the other colleges, it is a body of high learning and capability. The buildings, especially the dormitories, are the best in the State. It is a pleasure to spend a term in them.

Yet there are many reasons that make me say that High Point is the best college in the State, but suffice it to say that there is practically no reason to make me want to hesitate upon my first two statements.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES FOR SUNDAY, JULY 12.

The Beatitudes of the New Testament.

Daily Readings.

Mon. Happy truth-finder. Matt. 16:13-20.
Tues. Happy preparedness. Luke 12:35-40.
Wed. Happy generosity. Luke 14:7-14.
Thurs. Happy obedience. John 13:17.
Fri. Happy givers. Acts 20:35.
Sat. Happy steadfastness. Jas. 1:12.
Sunday. Topic. Matt. 5:1-12; John 20:29; Rom. 4:7.

The Leader's Talk.

The Beatitudes are the blessed songs of the New Testament. They are the expression of spiritual truths adapted to practical life. The word translated "blessed" should be translated "happy," if we would understand its meaning for our day. And yet, of course, it goes deeper than happiness usually means. True happiness, soul happiness, is the goal of every Christian, and he should be satisfied with nothing less. These blessed sayings are to be translated into human experience.

A Christian should be happy above all others. He should be happy, not because his outward circumstances are better than others, but because he has something within him which makes all life better for him. Then, with this inner happiness shining through, he is bound to make everybody and everything around him happier. Hence, a study in real happiness concerns the Christian and his various surroundings.

Christian Endeavorers have always had the reputation of being the happiest of Christians. Because we are young is one explanation; but the greater reason is because we are Christians, endeavoring to do as Jesus would have us do. This meeting should certainly be bright and joyful, yet filled with spiritual power.

Some Bible Hints.

Admission to Christ's kingdom does not depend on legal acts, but upon a mental condition (v. 3).

Christ's road to happiness is the very opposite of the world's road of ambition, power, wealth (vs. 4-9).

The doubting mind is not happy. Joy belongs to faith and trust (v. 29).

The sense of sin is a gnawing misery. Happiness comes when we know it is forgiven (Rom. 4:7).

Suggestive Thoughts.

The word "blessed" means "happy." It suggests the clean happiness of goodness and of pure love.

Jesus spoke from experience when He said that they are happy who know the word of God and keep it (Luke 11:28). It was one source of His own joy.

The faithful are happy (Luke 12:43). There is joy, even in secular toil, in the consciousness that work is well done, and that employers' desires are fulfilled.

In 1 Tim. 1:11 Paul daringly speaks of "the gospel of the happy God." Yet how natural it is. God is the Fount of all true happiness. Happy Himself, He wishes to make His children happy.

An Illustration.

How beautiful, how strong that tree is! Yes, but to be what it is it has had a long struggle against wind and storm. Sometimes happiness comes after struggle. "Happy is he who has endured temptation" and come through (Jas. 1:12).

At the Point of a Question.

1. What is the meaning of the word "blessed" in the Beatitudes?
2. Why should a Christian be the happiest person on earth?
3. How is it possible for one to be happy, even though suffering?
4. Do Christians today prove their religion as successfully as did the early Christians?
5. Which is the more difficult, to withstand open persecution or insidious temptation?
6. What is largely responsible for the happiness of Christian Endeavorers?

The Lesson in Life.

Sometimes today one can not help wondering if folks have time to be truly blessed, or happy. Everybody, young and old, is so rushed with multitudinous duties and so-called pleasures that scarcely any one has time to get the right attitude towards life. But that isn't living. We must "take time to be holy," if we would be happy.

The Beatitudes taught by Jesus were revolutionary in their application. Folks had never caught such a meaning for religion as He here enunciated. This thought must be kept clearly in mind, if we would get the viewpoint of the age in which they were spoken. And, even to-day, they are just as revolutionary to the people who have never given thought to the higher and better things.

"Blessed are the humble-minded, for they will possess the land." "The words are a prophecy that meekness will have a greater power in the world than pride." Judaism meant pride of race; rabbinism meant pride of learning; Roman imperialism meant pride of power; Greek culture meant pride of intellect; but Jesus places far above all these humility of mind and heart, true meekness; for to such belong the great things of time and eternity. The world does not see as God sees now, but it must come to see that His children, obeying His will, are the ones who will enjoy true success.

"Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for goodness; they will be satisfied" (Moffat). Weymouth uses the expression "completely satisfied." Physical hunger and thirst are natural desires; we all understand them. What Jesus wishes all mankind to feel, is the naturalness for the indwelling of His spirit in their hearts; that without this they can never be completely satisfied and ready to accomplish God's will. If this desire is once awakened, nothing else but Jesus will satisfy the soul, and render the life thoroughly satisfied.

"Blessed are the compassionate, for they shall receive compassion" (Weymouth). Mercy, compassion, helpfulness to animals and unfortunate people, these are essential to real Christian living. Mercy is a divine virtue; it is a humanitarian virtue; it is a reciprocal virtue. It blesses both him who gives and him who receives. Folks have come to see the practical value of this wonderful virtue, and by that much are moving up towards Christ.—C. E. Quarterly.

S. O. S. CALL.

A notice has been sent to every auxiliary of the Woman's Home Missionary Society in response to an S. O. S. call from Dr. Woodford for the new school building at Pine Ridge, Ky. Auxiliaries, classes, and individuals are asked to make special donations toward this fund. North Carolina's apportionment is $1,400. The name of any person making a contribution of $5.00 or more will be placed in a list and put in the corner stone. Pastors of churches that have no Home Missionary Society have been asked to take a special offering for this purpose. We trust that friends will rally to this cause and help build this much needed academy building. Send money to treasurer of W. H. M. S., or direct to Dr. T. R. Woodford, Pine Ridge, Ky. Mrs. J. M. Millikan, Corresponding Secretary.

—The pioneer fathers were the first manufacturers in America. They made leather, sugar, malt, potash and soap. They were the first to press oil from seeds, the first to use dye for coloring their homespun, and the first to use the process of salting, smoking and drying for preserving food. Our present industries have grown out of the pioneer methods.

—A Boer farmer in 1863 took a number of young wild ostrich chickens, tamed them and to the surprise of many successfully reared them as he would have reared cattle. Others followed his example and they are now reared in inclosures, a couple of acres to a bird, and fed like fine stock on alfalfa or lucerne, a rich clover, easily cultivated.

"WHEN WE GET BIG."

"When I get big I'm going to be a famous general," said Ted, marching up and down the room in his little soldier suit. "I'll go out to war and help anybody that is in trouble."

"And I'll be a nurse and take care of the wounded soldiers," said Dora, pinning a piece of red flannel on her arm to look like the cross worn by a nurse she had seen a few days before.

"I'll be a great doctor and help the sick soldiers, too," said Herbert. "I guess that's about as nice as winning battles. Dr. Graves wears a sword, too."

"Children," called mamma from the kitchen, "which one of you will run to the grocery for butter for my cake?"

"You go, Molly," said Ted and Dora together. "You don't mind doing errands."

So the little girl ran off with her basket, and the talk in the sitting room went back to what the children would be when they grew up. It was a cold, windy day, and they all had to play indoors, so Herbert and Addie had come over to visit their cousins and have a good time together.

Just the week before the children had seen a great parade of soldiers, so their minds were taken up with the swords and uniforms and good braid.

"Mamma, which one has the best plan?" asked Ted when the cake was finished and they all sat together in the sitting room. "Addie wants to be a great singer, and all the rest of us but Molly are going to war to help people. Molly says she is going to stay at home and help you always, so tell us which has the best plan."

There was a queer little light in Mrs. Kile's eyes as she took the baby on her knee and said: "I think I will let you decide which is best. While I was baking cake I noticed that the Red Cross nurse was too busy to untangle baby's foot when he caught it in the rug, and the famous general never saw the puppy upset him in his rough play. You know this general said he would help anyone in trouble when he grew up, so the baby called loudly for aid. The general marched right past without ever noticing him, and the doctor stepped on his fingers as the army retreated. After that the famous singer was too busy to sing 'Rock-a-by' for the baby, and he had a hard time generally."

"You left out Molly," said Dora, when her mother paused a few moments. "You didn't say anything about her."

"I thought you all knew what Molly did," said Mrs. Kile. "She picked up the poor baby and put medicine on his bruised fingers; she ran several errands, and then had time to sing 'Rock-a-by' for this little man. You see, she is working at her plan right now, instead of waiting till she gets big."

"Molly's plan is the best!" cried all the children together. "We'll try to begin now, too."—The Herald and Presbyter.

DEACON SMITH—THE STORY OF A TROUBLER.

Deacon Smith, who was a kindly, silent, faithful, gracious man, was one day waited upon by a restless, ambitious, worldly church member who was laboring to create uneasiness in the congregation, and especially to drive away the minister.

The deacon came in to meet his visitor, who, after the usual greetings, began to lament the low state of religion and inquire as to the reason why there had been no revival in the church for many years.

"Now what do you think is the cause of things being dull here?"

The deacon was not ready to give his opinion, and after a little thought frankly answered, "I don't know."

"Do you think the church alive to the work before them?" "No, I don't."

"Do you think the minister fully realizes the solemnity of his work?" "No, I don't."

A twinkle was seen in the eye of the troubler in Zion; and, taking courage, he asked: "Do you think Mr. A. a very extraordinary man?" "No, I don't." "Do you think his sermons, in the eyes of his people, are held anything wonderfully great?" "No, I don't."

Making bold after all this encouragement he asked: "Then don't you think we would better dismiss him and hire another?"

The old deacon started as if he was shot with an arrow, and in a tone louder than his usual manner, shouted, "No, I don't."

"Why," cried the amazed visitor, "you agree with me in all that I have said, don't you?" "No, I don't."

"You talk so little, sir," replied the questioner, not a little abashed, "that no one can find out what you mean."

"I talked enough once," replied the old man, rising to his feet, "for six praying Christians. Thirty years ago I got my heart humbled and my tongue bridled; and since that time I have walked softly before God. I then made vows as solemn as eternity, and don't you tempt me to break them."

The troubler was startled at the earnestness of the hitherto silent immovable man and asked, "What happened to you thirty years ago?"

"Well, sir, I'll tell you. I was drawn into a scheme just like this of yours, to uproot one of God's servants, from the field in which we had planted him. In my blindness I fancied it a little thing to remove one of the 'stars' which Jesus holds in his right hand, if thereby my ear might be tickled by smooth flowing words, and the pews filled with those who turned away from the simplicity of the Gospel. I and the men who led me—for I admit that I was a dupe and a fool—flattered ourselves that we were doing God's service when we drove that holy man from the pulpit and from his work in the field in which God had placed him. We groaned because there was no revival, while we were gossiping about, criticizing and crushing him—instead of upholding his hands by our efforts and our prayers. Well, sir, he could not drag on the chariot of salvation with a half dozen of us taunting him for his weakness, while we hung as dead weight to the wheels. When he spoke from the pulpit of the sinful amusements in which many of his members participated, we were offended; so we hunted him like a deer, till, worn and bleeding, he fled into a covert to die.

"Scarcely had he gone when God came in among us by His Spirit to show that He had blessed the labors of His rejected servant. Our own hearts were broken and our wayward children converted; and I resolved at a convenient season to visit my former pastor and confess my sin, thank him for his faithfulness to my wayward sons, which, like buried seed, had now sprung up. But God denied me that relief, that He might teach a lesson that every child of His ought to learn—that he who toucheth one of His little ones toucheth the apple of His eye.

"I heard that my pastor was ill, and taking my oldest son with me, I set out on a twenty-five mile ride to see him. It was evening when I arrived and his wife, with a spirit which any woman ought to exhibit towards one who had so wronged her husband, denied me admittance to his room. She said (and her words were like arrows to my soul), 'He may be dying and the sight of your face might add to his anguish.' Had it come to this, I said to myself, that the man whose labors had, through Christ, brought me into the fold; who had consoled my spirit in a terrible bereavement, and who had, till designing men alienated us, been to me a brother, that this man could not die in peace with my face near him? 'God pity me!' I cried, 'What have I done?' I confessed my sins to that meek woman, and implored her, for Christ's sake, to let me kneel before His dying servant and receive his forgiveness.

"What did I care then whether the pews by the door were rented or not? I would gladly have taken his whole family to my home forever, as my own flesh and blood; but no such happiness was in store for me.

"As I entered the room of the blessed warrior whose armor was falling from his limbs, he opened his eyes and said, 'Brother Smith! Brother Smith!' I bent over him and sobbed, 'My pastor! My pastor!' Then raising his white hand, he said, in a deep impressive voice: 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.'

"I spoke tenderly to him, and told him I had come to confess my sin and bring some of his fruit to him (calling my son). But he was unconscious of all around him; the sight of my face had brought the last pang of earth to his troubled spirit. I kissed his brow and told him how dear he had been to me. I craved his pardon for my unfaithfulness, and promised him to care for his widow and her fatherless little ones; but his only reply, murmured as if in a troubled dream, was: 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.'

"I stayed by him all night and at daybreak I closed his eyes. I offered his widow a house to live in the remainder of her life; but, like a heroine, she said: 'I freely forgive you; but my children who entered deeply into their father's anguish shall never see me so regardless of his memory as to take anything from those who caused it. He has left us all with his covenant God, and He will care for us.'

"Well, sir, those dying words sounded in my ears from that casket and from that grave,

THE SPIRIT OF HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

It has been my pleasure to pass in and out among the faculty and the students of the High Point College a great deal during the first year of that splendid institution, and to watch them at work and at play. Being the first year, when it was new to us all, I watched with both anxiety and with joy. Anxiety that the very best possible work might be done, and that a fine impression might be made upon the church of which the college is a part and upon the community in which the college is located; and joy that this was all done so splendidly. While the High Point College was writing the history of its first year of existence the close observer could not help being deeply impressed with the beautiful spirit of the College.

The Spirit of a College.

The spirit of a college is something that you cannot see, nor hear, nor handle; but you can feel it. One had only to pass up and down the halls, or to drop in for a chapel service, or for a Sunday evening service, or for a meal in the college dining room, or to watch the boys on the ball grounds to feel the spirit of happiness and contentment which prevailed among the folks who made up the college community. The faculty was efficient and handled the work with that ease and grace which might have been expected in an old, established college.

The students, early in the year, formed the habit of speaking in favorable terms of the faculty, of the buildings and equipments, of the food, and of conditions in general. All this and much more makes up the spirit of this new college, and it makes one feel glad to see such a contented, happy group of young people taking the course of study under such efficient professors.

Happy Young People.

About the happiest group of young people to be found anywhere during the last college year were housed in our own college buildings in High Point. They were happy because of the wholesome, sunshiny, congenial, Christian conditions which surrounded them in the halls, in the class rooms, and on the grounds. They knew and appreciated each other. If you have kept close watch on the conditions at the High Point College for the entire year, I am sure you feel as I do, that we Methodist Protestants have great cause to lift up our hearts and sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," because of the way He has led us on, and because of the success He has given us during this the first year in the history of our college. May this splendid spirit deepen and broaden and become more and more intense until the good name of our college shall be spoken abroad throughout the entire Southland.

Faithfully yours in the Master's service,
A. G. Dixon.

ought to be our last call.

Since the middle of April we have appealed in a number of ways to our Sunday schools to send in an order for the Children's Day supplies, and to date not quite 1000 orders have been filled out of the 1902 schools reported in our church by the Financial Secretary.

That means that about 900 schools did not secure the Union Board's free supplies, and we infer have not arranged to hold a Children's Day Service, although in a few instances other programs or services may have been used.

The Sunday schools that do not hold a Children's Day Service lose a fine opportunity to create more interest in the schools themselves, and fail to share in the authorized plan of the church which calls for such a service to be held by the schools, as a means of instilling the missionary spirit, and of training the young in the work of the church which will ere long have to be carried on by them.

Any Sunday school, anywhere in our denomination still has time to arrange to hold a Children's Day service for foreign missions.

Just mail a postal to Rev. Fred. C. Klein, Berwyn, Md., and the supplies will reach you promptly, and it will not take much time or labor to prepare to hold the service in the next three or four weeks.

But mail that postal, stating how many Services you need, without delay. Do not put it off. We must give the field to the Board of Education shortly. So order the Children's Day supplies Today.

Again attention is called to the two beautifully embroidered Japanese banners to be awarded, one to the school giving the largest amount, the other for the largest amount in proportion to membership. Be sure to tell your Conference Treasurer how many are in your school when you send him the offering, and don't forget to state it is the children's day offering for foreign missions. Please do not overlook.

Then we will send to the Sunday schools that contribute $50.00 or more for Foreign Missions through the Children's Day offering a set of the large beautiful pictures, one set on "The Call of the World," the other, "India", until the sets we have are all gone.

We will not be able to give a set to each school, but in the order in which their Children's day offerings reach the general church Treasurer's office in Baltimore through the Annual Conference treasurers, to whom all offerings ought to be sent, and not to Treas. Staley, nor to me.

We are gratified at the reports reaching us of the fine services held by our schools, and the very favorable comments of the excellence of the program presented to the schools this year, with the addition of the pageant and the two large illustrated posters depicting much of the work of the church in the three countries, and pictures of all of the church's missionaries.

And we are being heartened by reports of splendid offerings made by the schools, for they are responding finely to the call to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the service, and to honor the memory of the late Rev. F. T. Tagg who introduced it in 1885.

And they are helping to carry out one feature of our church's Centennial. Celebration which is to lay upon the altar every year of this quadrennium the budget in full in gratitude for our goodly heritage as Methodist Protestants secured for us by the toils and sacrifices of our church members.

LITTLE HANS' LETTER.

I once heard of a little German boy who had come to America to live with his parents.

His father could find no work to do, so no doubt the poor child was suffering from the lack of the comforts which he would have had if his father had found work. So what do you think the little boy did? He wrote a letter. To whom do you think he wrote it? To Jesus.

Well, I expect you will say, "That was no use, because Jesus is in heaven, and a letter would not reach Him there."

But Jesus could see it as it was being written; and He could and did send an answer. This is what the dear little boy wrote:—

"Dear Jesus:

I have prayed so hard to You, but I guess You could not hear me so far off, so I am going to write you a letter. We came over a big ocean when it was summer time. My mamma has been sick all the time; can You send her something to make her well? And, dear Jesus, please send my father some work to do, so he can buy us some warm clothes, and some thing to eat. Please answer quick, for we are cold and hungry. Nobody knows I am writing to You. I thought You might send us some thing for a surprise.

Hans Brahm."

Then he folded the letter, and put it into a little envelope, which, he directed to "JESUS UP IN HEAVEN."

Now, I will tell you how it was answered. In the Post Office at Washington, where this letter was posted, the young lady who was sorting mail, came across this letter, and saw the strange address. She opened the letter and read it, and her eyes filled with tears.

"The child's faith must not be destroyed," she thought. That evening she spoke to several of her friends about the matter, and they were all anxious to help her send a box to little Hans. In it were nice warm clothes for them all, and toys for Hans, and at the very top, was a $10.00 bill.

As soon as the box was sent off, the lady wrote a letter to Hans, telling him that his letter had been received, and that Jesus had sent one of His servants on earth to help him, and a nice box was on its way to him. Before long, she received a letter of warm thanks from the little boy's father, and soon after that he wrote again, saying that he had found employment.

Thus you see, Jesus answers the faith of a little child. How good it is to trust Him, is it not? He says,

"Ask, and ye shall receive." John 16:24.

In a talk on thrift, a banker told a story about a Scotch farmer who, on frequent shopping trips in town, would hitch his horse on Main street, and having securely attached the feed bag would lift a hen from the wagon and tie her with a stout cord to one of the shafts, in such a manner that she would be able to pick up every bit of the oats the horse might drop while wrestling with the feed bag.

Please Send in Funds.

When funds are collected please send at once to Rev. S. W. Taylor, Burlington, N. C., so the cause for which the money was raised will have the benefit of it.

I happen to know of some collections which have been taken at Children's Day services which have not yet been sent to Brother Taylor. All Children's Day money is for foreign missions and the board is in very great need of funds. So send your money along so your charge will get credit in Herald, but most of all so the money will serve where it is intended to serve. Yours faithfully, A. G. Dixon.

Mrs. J. N. Johnson, High Point, fruit jars and jelly glasses. American Bakeries, bread every week. Bennett Brothers of High Point also keep up their good record by giving a good Sunday roast to the Home once a month. Going on, yes, because the good people are helping us to do so. Thank you.

E. G. Lowdermilk, Supt.

Nannie Eva Jobe, daughter of William and Louella Jobe, was born September 10, 1896, and died June 30, 1925.

She was converted in early childhood and joined Alamance Presbyterian Church, of which church she remained a consistent member until death.

On December 30, 1916, she was united in marriage to James Lacy Hardin, son of C. C. and Rosa Hardin. To this union was born one son.

Though an invalid for eight years Eva was always cheerful, patient, and hopeful, bearing her affliction with wonderful fortitude. To know her was to love her. She was a tender mother and a loving wife. She leaves a husband and one son, together with three sisters and five brothers, her parents having preceded her some years ago.

Funeral services were conducted by J. A. Burgess, assisted by Rev. Mr. Fesperman of Reformed church of Greensboro, and her body was laid to rest in Tabernacle cemetery.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

High Point.—The Woman's Foreign and Home Missionary societies held their regular monthly meeting on Monday afternoon with Mrs. J. G. Snipes on Steele street. In the home department on interesting program on Alvan Drew School at Pine Ridge, Ky., was given. Mrs. J. W. Thacker told of the growth of the school and the great need of a new building for a high school, and Mrs. J. D. Johnson told a pathetic story about "Little Ann," a mountain girl who longed so intensely for an education, and her dream of going to school was finally realized through the generosity of the Woman's Home Missionary Society. Mrs. R. M. Andrews was chairman of the program committee, and led the devotional exercises. The sum of $10 to buy bricks for the new building at Pine Ridge was contributed by the members present. In the foreign society the Question Box was conducted by Mrs. C. W. Vance, Mrs. R. T. Pickens, and Mrs. S. S. Coe. Mrs. Ben T. Moore was appointed leader of the Mission Band upon the resignation of Mrs. J. D. Johnson, who is to leave us shortly. At the close of business the hostess, Mrs. Snipes, served delightful refreshments.

The sympathy of many friends is extended to Mrs. W. C. Lyndon and Mrs. Jones Burns, her daughter, in the loss by death of the former's mother, Mrs. Jesse Hiatt, which occurred Monday morning at two o'clock at the residence of her son, Mr. Finley Hiatt, near Guilford College, where she has made her home for a number of years. The funeral services will be held at Hickory Grove church this (Tuesday) morning at 11 o'clock. Mrs. Hiatt had attained the ripe age of 80 years, and is survived by three sons and two daughters, all of whom reflect credit and honor upon a worthy Christian mother.

The Ladies' Aid society will meet at the church next Monday at three P. M. with Mrs. J. A. Gray and Mrs. C. L. Gray associate hostesses.

We regret exceedingly to learn that Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Johnson and daughter, Lela, will move to Macon, Ga., about July 15 to make their home. Since coming here two years ago, they have made a large circle of friends, who will part with them most reluctantly. Our best wishes follow them to their new home.

Dr. Brown is giving us short and snappy sermons, about 15 or 20 minutes in duration, on these sultry summer days, and the services last just one hour, a fact which is appreciated by the congregation. The attendance will doubtless be good, although the temperature hovers around 100 degrees. Reporter.

July 7.

Calvary.—Just because we have not had a report in the Herald for several weeks we do not want its readers to come to the conclusion that we have been idle, for we have not. We want you to know that we are still doing things. Our Sunday school is moving along nicely under the leadership of Brother Hester Causey, assisted by an able corps of teachers. Dr. J. F. McCulloch is making the men's class so interesting that he is getting a large number of our men together each Sunday morning. We started our Sunday school automobile race on last Sunday, by which we expect to increase our membership.

We held our Children's Day exercise on last Sunday night. The attendance was good and the collection amounted to $36.87. The children carried out their part of the program with credit to themselves and the young ladies who had charge of the training.

We have paid our annual conference and General Conference budgets in full with pastor's salary paid to date. We have organized our membership into a debt-destroying campaign, by which we expect to gradually reduce our church debt.

We held our Sunday school picnic the evening of the Fourth of July. Quite a number of our people went and all had a fine time.

Our preaching services are being well attended. Our Sunday evening services are especially well attended. Brother Gerringer is doing some fine preaching. We feel that we are fortunate in securing the services of such a strong preacher at the beginning of our existence as a church. We know that the effective work he is doing will be felt in this church for years to come. His whole heart seems to be in his work. The young people's work of Calvary is doing nicely under the guidance of Brother Gerringer. We are hoping and praying for great things for Calvary M. P. church. Pray for us. Reporter.

Welch Memorial.—We are glad to be back home again after being away for about ten days; were with Brother C. E. Phillips at Lincolnton. We enjoyed our stay with Brother Phillips and his good wife, also enjoyed being in the homes of the good people. Brother Phillips has some mighty good people on his work, and they are looking after their pastor; they seem to appreciate him very much.

We reached home on Wednesday evening and attended prayer-meeting at our own church; the folks seemed to be glad to see us back here.

On Friday we were presented with a nice wardrobe from the Marsh Furniture company. This was brought about through the influence of some of the brethren who work with this company. On Friday evening the church turned out and gave us a real pounding; we were surprised to receive such treatment from our people just because we had been away for a while. After the crowd, for it was a crowd, had marched through to the dining table and laden it with their various gifts, we tried to tell them how much we appreciated their thoughtfulness of us, and failing to find the words to express our appreciation, we just bowed our head in prayer, invoking God's blessings upon them, asking Him to repay them for their kindness to me and my family.

On Sunday we were permitted to preach to a very good and attentive audience, both morning and night. The Sunday school attendance was also good. On Tuesday night of this week the Ladies' Aid society will meet at the church. We have a good Ladies' Aid, and they are a real aid to the church. Pray for us. T. E. Pierce, Pastor.

Orange Chapel, Saxapahaw Circuit.—There will be all-day services at Orange Chapel the third Sunday in July. Children's Day exercise in the morning and preaching in the afternoon.

We will also have communion service and hold the election of delegate to conference. Mrs. Foust Thompson.

Spencer M. P. Church.—Doesn't that sound good? Sunday at 4:00 P. M. Rev. D. A. Bra well preached from 1 Kings 18:24—God Th. Answered by Fire. A good sermon to a small congregation in our home. We do not have many people here but we do have some true-hearted M. P.'s here and have lost some by not having a church. Pray for us that we may be filled with the Spirit of our Lord and that we may do His will. Mrs. A. L. Moore. July 7.

Shilch, Connelly Springs Charge.—Sunday school report for July 5: Attendance: office and teachers, 5; departments—adults 4, senior 7, junior 6, beginners 10; visitors, 1; total attendance, 33. Collection, 77c. Number of chapters read the past week, 228.

The R. C. W.'s class surprised the Sunday school with an interesting exercise pertaining to the Fourth of July. Music was rendered appropriate for the occasion by the writer.

We are moving along with our church work nicely. Class meeting was held Sunday, Mr. W. S. Miller as leader.

Prayer meeting is held every Sunday night. Rev. W. P. Martin leading the service.

"Jesus looked round about and saith unto his disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." S. Mark 10:23. Macy A. Martin, Reporter.

Mebane.—Last Sunday we had a fine number present for Sunday school, and also for church service. Dr. Johnson gave use an interesting message at this time. We are planning to have Children's Day on next Sunday.

On last Friday our Sunday school went on a picnic to Lakewood Park near Durham. A large number attended and all seemed to have a good time. When the noon hour came and we spread our lunch we found we had more than we could eat and all especially enjoyed this part of the picnic. Nice boxes were fixed for some who would have been there had circumstances permitted.

Our Ladies' Aid and missionary societies are wide-awake and we consider them a very important part of our church work. Last month our Ladies' Aid met at the home of Mrs. J. H. Payne. This meeting was largely attended and two new members were added. After the business meeting Mrs. Payne served lemonade and cake. This month we will meet with Mrs. C. C. Smith.

A very sad accident occurred here in the early morning of June 29 when Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Sykes were fatally injured as a west-bound passenger train struck the car in which they were riding. Mr. Sykes died within a hour, and Mrs. Sykes died ten hours later at the Martha Elizabeth Hospital. Other occupants of the car were Mr. and Mrs. Highf. Jobe and Hubert Sykes. Mr. Jobe was painfully but not seriously injured, while Mr. Jobe and Hubert Sykes received slight injuries. Both Mr. and Mrs. Sykes were well known in Mebane and news of their untimely death was a great shock to our town and surrounding community. Mr. and Mrs. Sykes were faithful and consistent members of Mebane M. P. church. It is hard to understand hy God took them so suddenly and in this way, but we know He is too wise to make a mistake and may we bow in humble submission to His will. They will be greatly missed on the influence of their Christian lives will never die. The funeral was conducted by Dr. Johnson, assisted by Rev. D. R. and Rev. T. A. Williams in Mebane M. P. church. It is said the largest crowd ever assembled in Mebane for a funeral was present at this one. The floral designs were many and beautiful. To the bereaved ones we extend our prayers and sympathy and may they be as faithful to the end as were their loved ones.

Mrs. J. E. Foust, Reporter.

July 7.

Bellmont, Mt. Hermon Circuit.—Since my last report a wonderful change has taken place at Belmont. About four weeks ago a few members of the Burlington Federation came over one morning and held prayer service in the mill. The interest was so great that they came to the church the next night and had prayer service, and for a week they came and held service every night. The spirit of God was with us and everyone seemed to put his whole soul into the meeting. After these brethren quit coming the Belmont people carried the services on for two weeks. During the three weeks over 50 people were converted, 20 in one night. It wasn't just children that were brought into the kingdom of God, but fathers and mothers, and gray-haired grandfathers.

It would have made your heart rejoice to hear the testimonies of fathers who had been drunkards and gamblers all their lives, and who had spent all their time for the devil and not a day for God, after they had been brought into the sheep-fold of God.

For the three last Sundays we have had a glorious Sunday school. The church was filled to its capacity and the third and fourth Sundays in June some of the classes were so large that the Sunday school rooms would not hold them. Our attendance increased to 261. And last Sunday there were 169 scholars present and every teacher except one who was kept away on account of sickness. Offering, which was sent to the Children's Home, amounted $8.57.

Our pastor, Brother Ashburn, preached two good sermons last Sunday, one at 11 o'clock and the other at night. The doors of the church were opened at both services and 27 invited with our church. This was one day that will never be forgotten in the history of our church. Everything seemed to work in harmony with God, and Mr. G. A. Nicholson, our superintendent, said that even the singing is oiled with the Spirit of God.

Cottage prayer meeting is held three times a week; on Tuesday night the men and women met separate, on Wednesday and Sunday night all meet together at the church because the homes were too small for the congregation.

At the prayer meeting last Wednesday night free-will offering was given to Mr. Wayne Artiss, as a surprise, for the great service rendered during the revival services. I am sure just what the offering amounted to, but I think it was about $50.

Children's Day service will be held at our church the fourth Sunday night in July. Everybody is cordially invited.

Since my last report another faithful family, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Smith and children, have moved from our community to Burlington. They will be missed at our church and especially Mrs. Smith, who was a great worker among the children; also Paul, the oldest boy, who was treasurer of our Sunday school. May God's richest blessings rest upon them, and may they never forget our church.

Ramah Shoffner, Reporter.

Hebron, Orange Charge.—Last Sunday was a good day for our little folks—"Children's Day". The church was crowded. The children did well. The collection amounted to something over $30. Much credit is due Mrs. F. W. Nelson and Miss Mildred Sykes for their faithful services in training the little folks, also Miss Velma Sykes, our organist. They all did what they could to make this service a success.

Our Sunday school is progressing nicely, many new members having been added recently.

Our special meeting begins the second Sunday in August with Rev. D. R. Williams as pulpit help.

In the evening of June 20 Mrs. F. W. Nelson very delightfully entertained the W. H. M. S. The regular meeting was also held. Those present were favored with a duet by the Misses Nelson, also a talk by Mr. W. B. Jones, his subject being, "How to Interest the Members." This society has ordered play books and expect to give a pageant in the near future. After the meeting delicious cream and cake were served by Miss Eva Nelson. The next meeting will be held in the church the third Sunday in this month, just after S. S. All members are urged to be present.

Our parsonage is nearing completion and we feel very proud.

We are planning to finish our Sunday school rooms and interior of the church ere long which will add greatly to the appearance.

Best wishes to the Herald.

Mrs. T. A. Gill.

July 4.

Concord, Saxapahaw Circuit.—The Woman's Foreign Missionary society met last Friday evening at the church for their regular meeting. The attendance was very good. A short program was rendered consisting of songs and readings. We decided to hold our Thank-Offering Service some time in September. Our next meeting will be held on Saturday evening, August 8, at seven P. M. at the home of Mrs. J. C. Guthrie.

The Junior Mission Band hold their meetings on Saturday evening before the fourth Sunday. With Mrs. B. S. Curl as leader of the band they seem to be taking interest in their work. They will assist us in our Thank-Offering Service.

Our Sunday school has been very good this summer, but there is yet much room for improvement.

The Christian Endeavorers have reorganized and hold their service every Sunday night.

All-day services were held the first Sunday. Brother Isley preached in the morning. Memorial service was held in the afternoon for Mr. A. M. Roberson, Mrs. J. C. Thompson and Mrs. Lacy Moore. Brother Isley made a few well chosen remarks in honor of the deceased, after which the memorial sermon was preached by Brother Harris of the Webb Avenue M. E. Church of Burlington. Most of the graves were decorated during the day.

Our special meeting will begin the first Sunday in August with Brother Millaway as help. Pray with us that much and lasting good may result.

Mrs. J. C. Guthrie,
Corresponding Secretary.

Friends of Bethel, Notice.

Children's Day exercises will be held at Bethel M. P. church, Alamance circuit, the third Sunday in July, beginning at 11 o'clock A. M. We will have dinner on the grounds and preaching at two P. M. Everyone cordially invited to attend. We are expecting Misses Georgia and Lucy Boone of Burlington to sing for us. They are fine singers. It will be a treat to hear them.

Mrs. J. M. Foust, Reporter.

Bethel, Flat Rock Circuit.—Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. On the third Sunday in June we had a Children's Day program at 11 o'clock which was very much enjoyed, after which Rev. J. C. Preston made a good talk. The collection for missions amounted to about $18, which was very good for the congregation. In the afternoon our pastor came over from the summer conference and brought Rev. Lawrence Little with him who made a good talk. His subject was young people's work and their preparation for the work. His talk was very interesting and instructive.

On the fourth Sunday in June a class of singers came over from the Good Will Baptist church and rendered a good program which was enjoyed by a large congregation. On the Friday following we started a twenty days' singing at our church which everybody in the community is invited to attend.

There will be preaching at Bethel on Saturday night, July 11, at 7:30, by the pastor.

The protracted meeting will begin on the first Sunday in August with all-day service and dinner on the ground. L. P., Reporter.

South Davidson.—The revival meeting at Mt. Carmel will begin the first Sunday in August. At Jerusalem the second Sunday in August, and at Cid church the third Sunday in August instead of the third Sunday in July, with Rev. Robert Short as pulpit help. I ask all to pray that we may have a glorious outpouring of the Holy Spirit at each place. Will announce the meetings of the other churches later.

I am for the advancement of God's kingdom.

W. L. Carson, Pastor.

Once a missionary asked an old colored man what denomination he belonged to, and the old fellow replied:

"Bress yo, suh, dar's fo' roads leadin' from hyah ter town—de long road, de hill road, de sho' road and de swamp road—but when Ah gits ter de mill dey don't ast me, 'Uncle Wash, what road did yo' come by?' but, 'Wash, is yo' wheat good?'"

Macedonia, Why Not Circuit. — We are all smiles down here. We have just finished the new addition to our church which means lots to its looks as well as seating capacity. It seats about 50 per cent. more people than before. We are poor people here in purse, but some of us are rich in grace, and we do thank God for the privilege of working for Him and the means to do this work. We are now on the campaign to paint the new house and hope to get it done by our special meeting the second Sunday in August.

We had one of the finest children days the second Sunday in June I think I ever witnessed, and some of the bright children who made us so happy that day came from homes where fathers and some mothers are not saved. And how we do beg our Heavenly Father to save them, and we ask all the readers to pray for them. Those noble-hearted people helped to build our church and they are very near our hearts. We are as proud of our new church as a little boy would be of a new pair of pants. We do not praise ourselves or boast, but we praise our Heavenly Father with all our hearts, and we thank the people for what they did to help in this work. We are expecting at our special meeting three preachers: Bro. Hulin, our pastor, and Bro. Shaw of Franklinsville, and Bro. G. A. Laughlin, of Central Falls. Bro. Laughlin has been with us eleven years and we feel grateful to him for his splendid service, and he has a standing invitation to come as long as he lives. Our doors are open to him and our homes are his home.

Here are the names of those who helped in building our church: J. H. Sanders, in cash and labor, $65.10; W. D. Moore, cash and labor, $874.41; Pearl Moore, cash, $5; Harvey Honey, cash, $10; Congressman W. C. Hammer, cash, $5; J. B. Owens of Star, cash, $5; Girls' Box Supper, cash, $55.85; Lewis Myrick, cash, $1; N. Sheffield, labor, $3.40; Henry Dennis, labor, $12.50; J. C. Sanders, cash and labor, $4.50; Jerd. Despite the backbiting and the people sitting on the stool of do-nothing, we have completed this nice church and feel grateful to those mentioned above very few of whom are members of our church and some are not members of any. And we feel more grateful to God for His goodness.

W. D. Moore.

Browsers, Richland Circuit. — June 28th was children's day and memorial services at our church; it surely was a good day for us all. Our pastor, Brother Hill, said it was the best children's day he ever attended. There were a good many there that said the children did fine. Our young people took a part in the exercises; that shows they are interested in church work. The collection was $22.50.

Our protracted meeting is the fourth Sunday in August. We want you all to pray for us.

Orange Charge, Notice!

The third quarterly conference will meet with the church at Hebron Saturday before fourth Sunday in July, two P. M., a full attendance is desired.

Children's Day exercises were held at the Effland church first Sunday night in July. In connection with the regular exercises "The Call," a pageant, was given. This and each item on the program was well rendered. Offering for foreign missions, $25.

The credit for preparing this program is largely due Misses Bertha and Pattie Crutchfield. We thank them and all who contributed in any way to the success of this program.

Sincerely,

B. M. Williams.

Asheville.—Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Beacham are entertaining (for life) a lovely new Methodist Protestant, Miss Elizababeth Gale Beacham, who arrived June 15, 1925. The mother will be remembered as Miss Helen Gale before her marriage. She, with her twin sister, Miss Katherine Gale, now Mrs. Edward L. Winslow, Jr., grew up from infancy in our church here. They first joined as members of the cradle roll. The grandmother, Mrs. Priscilla Gale, is also much beloved as a faithful member.

Mrs. J. W. Barrett recently returned from Charlotte and is a guest of her son, J. Oscar Barrett. She is in feeble health.

Other members of our church who are ill are, Mrs. M. T. Fears, Mrs. E. F. Carson, Mrs. C. C. McNeil, Mrs. E. J. Monteith, Warren Walker (S. S.)

The pageant, "The Call," was repeated at our church Sunday night. It had been given some three weeks ago. Both performances were quite good. Our pastor's wife trained the young ladies.

Miss Norvella McIntyre has returned from High Point College for the summer. Her presence in the services and her playing at the piano add much to the comfort of all.

A number of our members attended the district rally at Weaverville Saturday and Sunday. Pastor Bates had a good program arranged. President Dixon and Mrs. Dixon were present with inspiring addresses.

Reporter.

Henderson.—Although the weather was extremely hot yesterday the Sunday school attendance was 210, the best we have had for several weeks. A goodly number were present for communion service at 11 o'clock.

Next Sunday morning we will take the vote for delegate to the next annual conference, the nominees being Brothers T. J. Evans and Roy Dixon. Both of these young men are fine fellows and each would make a good delegate.

Our third quarterly conference will be held on Wednesday evening, July 15, after prayer meeting. The annual Sunday school picnic will be held the same day.

Our Children's Day service will be held third Sunday in this month at eight P. M.

J. E. Pritchard.

Mt. Zion.—Wish you all could have been at our township Sunday school convention last Saturday. We had the most successful convention we have had for years.

For the benefit of Mt. Zion members and all other people interested in Mt. Zion, here's our report for the year 1924-25 running from fourth Sunday in June, 1924, to fourth Sunday in June, 1925.

C. W. Allen, Superintendent,
Roy Stone, Secretary.

There were other good reports at convention too; Pinnacle had a good report; they are showing some improvement in increasing their enrollment and average attendance.

While I have tried to fill the superintendent's place I have had very loyal co-operation by the majority of the members. They have never failed to do but one thing that I have asked for and that is "class rooms," but I know almost that they are going to do that, in fact I am sure of it. I have faith enough to believe that this people will no the thing most needed for our church's good. We had some faces in the congregation Sunday that have been absent for five or six Sundays; we are glad they are coming back.

On the third Sunday in this month our protracted meeting will begin. Our pastor has been very fortunate in securing for pulpit help Rev. L. W. Gerringer of Greensboro. Brother Gerringer is one of the best preachers in our conference and I am sure we will have a great revival if we will do our part. Work, pray and sing. We very earnestly beg of you people your sincere prayers that we may have a real revival.

Announcement, Mt. Zion.

Next Saturday from four o'clock till 10 P. M. the missionary societies of Mt. Zion church will serve refreshments and good eats on the church ground. During these hours about eight o'clock Mt. Zion choir will give a singing concert. The proceeds of this lawn party will be for foreign missions. Come.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Robert Queen.—Robert, the son of Mr. and Mrs. B. G. Queen, was born April 2, 1923, and died at the age of two years, two mos. and 22 days. On the night of June 24 death invaded the home of Mr. and Mrs. Queen and took the soul of their dear loving child back to God who gave it.

Funeral services were conducted by the writer Thursday afternoon, June 25, 1925, at Buffalo Baptist church, near Shelby, N. C. The lifeless form of little Robert was tenderly laid to rest in the cemetery. A large congregation of relatives, friends and neighbors attended the funeral service. The little child had been seriously ill for two weeks and everything that human hands could do was done for the recovery of the dear loved one, but the Lord had need of little Robert to add to His jewels in glory and called him to Himself.

Robert was the youngest of five children. The others with their parents have the sincere sympathy of a host of relatives and friends.

May the blessing of our Heavenly Father be upon them and His saving grace sustain the bereaved family in this dispensation of Divine Providence. We commend them to the sympathetic Christ who said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of heaven."

C. B. Way.

Neal.—Mrs. Callie Elizabeth Neal, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth McNeely, of Guilford county, N. C., was born May 16, 1868, and departed this life June 12, 1925. She was married to W. S. Neal October 15, 1891. To this union were born five children, four of whom survive: Thomas, of High Point, N. C., James, of Gastonia, N. C., John, of Reidsville, N. C., and Nellie, of Reidsville, N. C.

She professed faith in Jesus Christ when she was very young and united with Center M. E. Church in Guilford County, N. C., where she was an honored member until her marriage when she transferred her membership to Midway M. P. Church and remained a consistent and faithful member till God called her to her reward. The funeral was conducted in this church by the writer in the presence of a large number of friends and relatives, after which we laid her body to rest in the nearby cemetery. Many beautiful floral designs were evidence of the esteem in which she was held by her many friends.

Sister Neal was a good woman and though a great sufferer she bore it all with Christian fortitude and gave expression of a willingness to go home to meet her Saviour.

May the Lord comfort the bereaved ones and make the memory of her beautiful Christian life an inspiration to others while life shall last.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON—JULY 19.

The Gospel in Lystra.

Lesson Text: Acts 14:8-20.

Golden Text: Matt. 5:10.

The Central Truth: The abounding grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is all-sufficient to restore all who are crippled by sin and impart to them inclination and strength to walk with God.

Scriptural Points.

1. Paul and Barnabas preached in Iconium a long time, and "a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed." But they encountered, as usual, considerable opposition, which finally culminated in a plot to stone them. Becoming aware of this purpose they "fled unto Lystra and Derbe."

2. At Lystra a life-long cripple attended the gospel services conducted by Paul. His demeanor and interest attracted Paul's attention. The gospel messages had awakened faith in his soul. For "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Paul in the exercise of spiritual vision was enabled to see this, just as Jesus saw the faith of the paralytic and his four friends at Capernaum.

3. "Stand upright on thy feet." Paul gave this command with the authority of Jesus Christ. And this command carried with it the healing power of Jesus Christ. Paul was the honored instrument in the hands of God.

4. "And he leaped and walked." His was a large faith to have claimed such a spontaneous and complete restoration. His healing was even more spectacular than that of the cripple at the Beautiful Gate of the temple, who was lifted up by Peter and accompanied Peter and John into the temple," walking, and leaping and praising God." This miracle of healing must have had a most wonderful effect upon the congregation at Lystra.

5. The inhabitants of Lystra were worshippers of the gods of the Greek mythology. This miracle led them to suppose that Paul and Barnabas were two of their gods that had just come down to earth in the forms of men. They called Barnabas, Jupiter, because of his dignified bearing and benign countenance. They called "Paul Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker."

6. The heathen priests took immediate steps to offer sacrifices to these two men. But Paul and Barnabas rent their clothes, and rushed among the people, and protested with all their might against such base and senseless idolatry. And it was with extreme difficulty that they succeeded in restraining the people from making the intended sacrifices.

7. "Certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium" arrived soon after this unfortunate episode and succeeded in turning the would-be idolaters against the apostles. Their wrath was centered upon Paul, because he was the real leader and chief preacher in this missionary campaign. They took Paul outside the city limits and stoned him into insensibility. They would have stoned him some more but they thought he was dead.

But Paul recovered consciousness and spent the night in the city. Though battered and bruised "the next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe." It must have been an exceedingly painful journey for this hero of the cross.

Practical Points.

1. Sin is the gigantic cripple of the ages. It cripples one's talents and usefulness, makes him blind to the highest privileges, opportunities, and pleasures of life, and compels him to stoop to a life of shame, loss, failure and everlasting ruin.

2. The gospel of Jesus Christ is the restorer to the paths of peace. It is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." It makes the wounded whole. It makes the lame to leap for joy. It binds up the broken-hearted. It imparts freedom to the captives. It implants into the soul "a well of water springing up unto everlasting life." And it enables the believer to "rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks."

3. It is not entirely proper to say that the day of miracles is past. It is more proper to say that the day of faith to produce miracles is past. God's ability and willingness to work miracles certainly is not past. He hates sin and disease now as much as He ever did. And miracles of healing are being performed today wherever there is adequate faith. God has not changed in the least. "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, today, and forever."

4. Idolatry has not yet gone out of the world. Millions still worship at the shrine of mammon. Millions more serve the goddess of pleasure in pursuit of countless worldly and sinful amusements. And still millions more are devotees of damnable carnality. "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

5. The message of providence is most appealing. "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." To resist such a message of lovingkindness is the quintessence of ingratitude, "not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance."

Minister.—Why do you not get a wife, Donald?

Donald.—I might get a bad one.

Minister.—Trust to Providence, an' you'll be all right.

Donald.—I'm no' so sure, minister, for ye ken Providence has to dispose of the bad as well as the guid.—London Humorist.

(Begun on page 9)

When I slept, Christ stood before me in a dream, saying: 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.' These words followed me till I fully realized the esteem in which Christ holds those men who have given up all for His sake, and I vowed to love them evermore for His sake, even if they are not perfect.

"And since that day, sir, I have talked less than before, and have helped to support my pastor, even if he is not a very extraordinary man. My tongue shall cleave to the roof of my mouth, and my right hand forget her cunning, before I dare to put asunder what God has joined together. When a minister's work is done in a place, I believe God will show it to him. I will not join you, sir, in the scheme that brought you here; and, moreover, if I hear another word of this from your lips, I shall ask the brethren to deal with you as one who causes divisions. I would give all I own to recall what I did thirty years ago. 'Stop where you are, if perchance the thought of your heart may be forgiven you.'"

This decided reply put an end to the newcomer's efforts to get a minister who could please the congregation and make more stir. There is often great power in the little word "no," but sometimes it requires not a little courage to speak it so resolutely as did the silent deacon.—Selected.

HOW THEY SPENT THEIR MONEY.

By Robert J. Burdette.

Selfishness.

I kept all my wealth—and I mourn all my loss.
For gold in a skeleton hand turns to dross;
Love, friendship and gratitude might I have bought,
But I kept all my wealth 'till it moulded to naught.

Pleasure.

I spent all my gold, I danced and I sang,
The palace I built with hilarity rang,
Plays, revels and frolics from even to dawn.
But I lie here with nothing—I spent it—it's gone!

Avarice.

I loaned my good money, at grasping percent—
'Twas I who got all that you kept and you spent;
While I counted my millions, death plundered me bare,
And this grave that I sleep in belongs to my heir.

Charity.

It was little I had, but I gave all my store
To those who had less, or who needed it more;
And I came with death laughing, for here at the grave
In riches unmeasured I found what I gave.

Two Scotsmen sat by the roadside, talking and puffing at their pipes. "There's no muckle pleasure in smokin', Sandy," said Donald. "How dae ye mak' that oot?" questioned Sandy.

"Well," said Donald, "ye see, if ye're smokin' yer ain tobacco, ye're thinkin' o' the awfu' expense, an' if ye're smokin' some ither body's, yer pipe's rammed sae tight it winna draw."

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

A DAY OF THOUGHT.

I like the way my work comes to me, one day at a time. Matthew Henry says: "Let us not put upon ourselves all at once that which Providence has wisely ordered to be borne by parcels." A longer day, I fear, would be monotonous, while a shorter one would be insufficient. I am so well pleased with this all-perfect day that I would not add to or take from it even one single hour. When I look at work by the day, it does not discourage me; it holds only what I can accomplish. But the thought of work by the month or year is a burden too great to bear. I look upon my day's work as an all-conquering factor. "Nothing," says one, "can stand before today's work." Finally, my day's work is an opportunity, which if I let slip, will occasion me misfortune in time to come; but each faithful day's work that I do brings to me its own reward. One of my happiest times is at the close of a well-spent day. Give me then my day's work by the day, and I will go singing on my road.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

WOODROW WILSON'S ESTIMATE.

"John Wesley's place in history is the place of the evangelist who is also master of affairs. The evangelization of the world will always be the road to fame and power, but only to those who take it seeking, not these things, but the kingdom of God; and if the evangelist be what John Wesley was, a man poised in spirit, deeply conversant with the natures of his fellow-men, studious of the truth, sober to think, prompt and yet not rash to act, apt to speak without excitement and yet with a keen power of conviction, he can do for another age what John Wesley did for the eighteenth century. His age was singular in its need, as he was singular in his gifts and power. The eighteenth century cried out for deliverance and light, and God prepared this man to show again the might and the blessing of his salvation."—Selected.

THE CITY OF REFUGE.

This city of refuge had round it suburbs of a very great extent. Two thousand cubits were allowed for grazing land for the cattle of the priests, and a thousand cubits within these for fields and vineyards. Now, no sooner did the man reach the outside of the city, the suburbs, than he was safe; it was not necessary for him to get within the walls, but the suburbs themselves were sufficient protection. Learn, hence, that if ye do but touch the hem of Christ's garment, ye shall be made whole; if ye do but lay hold of Him with "faith as a grain of mustard seed," with faith which is scarcely a believing, but is truly believing, you are safe.—C. H. Spurgeon.

My friends, picture to yourself this—a human spirit shut up with the companionship of its forgotten and dead transgressions! There is a resurrection of acts as well as of bodies. Think what it will be for a man to sit surrounded by that ghastly company, the ghosts of his own sins! and as each forgotten fault and buried badness comes, silent and sheeted, into that awful society, and sits itself down there, think of him greeting each with the question, "Thou too? What! are ye all here? Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" and from each bloodless, spectral lip there tolls out the answer, the knell of his life, "I have found thee, because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord."—Alexander Maclaren.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE RECOGNIZED BY STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Dear Dr. McCulloch: As there have come to me a number of inquiries concerning the admission of a student from High Point College to other colleges in the state, the letter which follows will be of interest to all prospective students at High Point College. In order that I might speak with assurance, I wrote to the President of the University, asking him if credit would be given there for the work done at High Point College by our students, and the following letter was received:

"Dear President Andrews: Your letter to me, dated July 15th, has been referred to me for answer. It is our custom to follow as nearly as possible the ratings given to colleges by our State Department of Education. I have just received from Mr. James E. Hillman a letter that gives me the impression that his department is willing at this time to recognize the work done at High Point College as far as it has gone—namely, two years.

"Therefore, our practice will be the same to applicants from your institution as it is to cases from any other college—that is, we will allow tentative credit, in the curriculum chosen by the applicant, for all work certified as completed satisfactorily at High Point College, insofar as that work applies upon the requirements of the curriculum chosen. Credits become permanent if the applicant does good work here.

"With best wishes, I am

"Very truly yours,

"Thomas J. Wilson, Jr.,

"Registrar."

It is plain from the above letter that no student who does good work at High Point College will find it difficult to get recognition at other colleges in this state, since the State Board of Education recognizes the work done there. Dr. Hillman and Dr. Highsmith visited High Point College several months ago, and their recommendation is the result of that investigation. Very truly yours,

R. M. Andrews, President.

—In the last two weeks the Scopes trial at Dayton, Tenn., has come and gone. It attracted attention out of all proportion to its importance. Such an assembly could not possibly settle the fundamental question of evolution. We all know and the world has always known that there is a certain amount of evolution in the world. But the extent of it in the domain of animal or vegetable life can only be determined by a wide-extended and prolonged investigation which is not yet completed. The court decided that Scopes had violated the new law of Tennessee in teaching that man is descended from lower animals, and the minimum fine of $100 was imposed. Appeal was taken to the Supreme Court in the hope of having the new law declared unconstitutional. But suppose the court does declare the new law unconstitutional: that will hardly end the contest. It is a troublesome question because people will be troubled by it. Aside from its bearing upon our theological conceptions, there is little of practical concern in the matter. And whatever conclusion the world may finally come to regarding the origin of the "genus homo," it is certain that men will still find need of the great Hypothesis, A Living God, to explain what they find. God cannot be pushed out at the back door.

—We confess to an admiration of Judge Raulston who presided over the Dayton court. He impresses one as a real Christian and a gentleman. We were glad to see him uphold the dignity of his court in the calm and firm way that he did, even at the risk of having to punish the chief counsel of the defense for contempt of court.

—No one should make the mistake of supposing that in order to find the way of salvation in the Bible he is compelled to believe that Eve was literally made out of Adam's rib or that Jonah was really swallowed by a great fish in whose stomach he lived for three days. These are not articles at all in what the Bible presents as the saving faith. Christ's reference to Jonah does not necessarily imply that He believed the story of Jonah to be literally true. Whether fact or fiction, it served as an illustration of Jesus' stay in the heart of the earth. And whether fact or fiction, it serves to convey a good moral to the reader. It is the extremists that are doing most to perplex religious thought at this time. No one need fear for the truth to be known, provided the whole truth is known and known in true perspective. Of course God could work any kind of miracle He chose. But the question in some cases is not, Could He? but, Did He? There is where people differ. Some demand a reason for an exhibition of the miraculous before accepting it on mere human testimony.

—If you meet a man who says he descended from an ape, don't contradict him. Just admit that perhaps he did.

—We print a sermon sent us by a friend the subject of which is "Evolution and Religion." Because we print this sermon it must not be inferred that we accept the hypothesis of evolution as does the author of this sermon. We have no objection to accepting it if it can be proved true. But the facts relied upon to prove the theory do not impress us as constituting sufficient ground for the conclusion. If evolution was God's way of bringing man into the world, of course it was the best way. It does not affect the present dignity of man; for man is just what he is, no matter what his ancestors were. Whether biology can prove evolution or not as accounting for the origin of the human body, it can do much to impress men with the thought of God as actually present and actually working in the world today. I remarked some time ago to a teacher of biology that I do not see how any biologist can be an atheist. He replied, "Did you ever hear of one that was an atheist?" I do not recall that I have. Biology introduces us to a world of wonders. The earth is surrounded by a little smear of living matter, the plant and animal kingdoms, and in this little smear or film of life the most wonderful activities are going on. The microscope of the biologist reveals to us some of the wonders of this world of living matter. Both plants and animals are found to be made up of cells. Cells are found dividing themselves, thus increasing the number of living beings. Life spreads by division of cells. But because all living bodies are cellular in structure we are not necessarily to conclude that the larger were developed from the smaller. That would be like going to a city and seeing many houses, all made of brick, some small houses, some medium-sized houses, and some large houses, and then forming the theory that the medium-sized houses must have developed by growth from the small houses and the large houses evolved from the medium-sized houses. We believe that the evolutionist has undertaken what he can never accomplish in the undertaking to prove that all the world of living beings has developed from a single cell. Evolutionists are not agreed among themselves as to what is involved in a living cell. Take, for instance, the germ cell of an oak tree. One biologist is of the opinion that there must be in this tiny cell a material part corresponding to every material part in the fully developed tree. How otherwise can you explain the form of the tree? But accept this view, and see what follows. The first germ millions of years ago had to contain a material part corresponding to every material part in every individual descendant of all the generations to follow to the end of time. Einstein says the universe might be compressed to the size of an orange and nobody would know the difference.

"EVOLUTION AND RELIGION"

A Lesson Summarized.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

The whole country is at school in these days. Lawyers, ministers, scientists, and college professors are among the teachers. Every persons who cares for the truth is enrolled as a pupil. The general subject for study is, "Evolution." The lesson for today is, "Evolution and Religion." Rev. E. F. Tittle, pastor First Methodist church, Evanston, Ill., is the special teacher. He is one of the twenty-five outstanding preachers in this country. I am concerned to get before the readers of The Herald the main ideas of a recent sermon by this interesting preacher-teacher. To economize space I am condensing and summarizing—omitting, in the main, quotation marks.

Tet—My Father worketh even until now, and I work. John 5:17.

The earth beareth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear. Mark 4:28.

Dr. Tittle's introduction is most gracious and Christian: "Please let me say at the outset that my purpose is not controversial. I am not out to attack anybody. I am not even out to convert anybody.... No boy or girl today can go to a first-class high school, not to mention a first-class college, without being introduced to at least some of the data on which belief in evolution is based. I am very sure, therefore, that there is no high school student who does not feel at least some interest in the question which we are proposing to discuss. And I am almost equally sure that there is no parent of a high school student who is not concerned with the question: What is the bearing of the conception of evolution upon religious faith?"

Evolution a Fact.

Slowly, but surely, the conviction is gaining ground that the fact of evolution will have to be accepted. There are no less than six theories in explanation of evolution. And it may be that no one of these theories can be finally accepted in its entirety. Though each of them contains valuable suggestions, no one of them may tell the whole story. But even though every theory of evolution that has yet been advanced may prove to be inadequate, the fact of evolution is likely to remain undisturbed.

Everything that is came from something that was. Everything that was came from something that was before that, and before that, and before that. No man or mountain, no lion or lichen, no fish or flower was ever created outright. Everything has evolved, higher forms of life from lower forms of life, and these from other forms lower still. That is the belief of increasing numbers of men who have devoted a lifetime to study of the evidence. And so, the conviction grows that however little we may yet know about the method of evolution, the fact of evolution will have to be reckoned with by intelligent persons.

What is the bearing of this fact upon religious faith? I venture to suggest not only that a man may believe in evolution and still believe in God, but that a convinced evolutionist may find in the conception of evolution a positive support for his religious faith.

Jesus and Evolution.

It would, of course, be utterly absurd to claim that Jesus was an evolutionist. Our Lord was no more an evolutionist than he was a republican. He was neither a scientist nor a politician. He was not even a theologian. He was a great mystic, the greatest of all mystics, who saw farther into the heart of reality than any other son of man has ever seen, and in whom, Christians believe, the heart of reality was completely revealed.

But although Jesus was not an evolutionist, there are two sayings of his which, in the light of the evolutionary hypothesis, become almost startlingly meaningful. In the fourth gospel, he is reported to have said, "My Father worketh even until now, and I work." And in the gospel of Mark he is reported to have said, "The earth beareth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear." A man who believes in evolution may say, My Father worketh even until now. By reason of the fact that he has come to believe in evolution—and not in spite of the fact—he may think of his heavenly Father as having been continually at work in the world, causing the inorganic to become organic; causing the organic to advance from amoeba to man; himself to advance from those brutish ancestors of ours who first stood erect and developed hands, to those saints immortal in whom the ape and the tiger died. And the man who believes in evolution, as he tries to visualize the process by which his heavenly Father has been working in the world, may repeat with extraordinary appreciation those other words: "First the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear."

.. Not Getting Rid of God.

The suggestion that "evolution is an invention whereby it is hoped to get rid of God" is an utterly false representation of the purpose of scientists. And it is in direct conflict with the undeniable fact that the great majority of evolutionists have believed, and do now believe in God. In one of the last letters he wrote, Darwin himself declared, "I have never been an atheist in the sense of denying the existence of God." Rendel Harris tells us that from his dear friend, Frances Power Cobbe, he learned a great lesson, namely, that "we must not cease to believe that God did anything because we have found out the way in which he did it." If only all of us could learn that lesson, how much mental pain we would be spared.

... Man Still in God's Image...

There is no ground for the charge that evolution would blot out the image of God in the soul of man. At this point we need to guard ourselves from the silly mistakes of judging the fruit of the tree by the root of the tree. Som one advances the theory that the idea of immortality was born of dreams. I do not know whether the idea of immortality originated in this fashion. But suppose it did. ought I to conclude that because it did, I can no longer entertain it—overlooking the fact that modern belief in immortality rests on far different grounds? It is written, "By their fruits (not by their roots) ye shall know them."

So it is in the case of man himself. Some one advances the theory that man has emerged from lower forms of life. Darwin declared that he bears about in his body the stigmata of his lowly origin. Walt Whitman declared that he is "stuccoed all over with quadrupeds." Some one else has called attention to the presence, in modern man, of more than fifty bodily relics which are of no conceivable use to him in his present state, but which were of use to him at various stages of his upward climb—the vermiform appendix, for instance, and the muscles with which some of us are able to move our ears. But when you have acknowledged that man had a lowly origin, must you come to the conclusion that he is altogether of the earth, earthy? How can you come to that conclusion in the presence of the prophets and poets, the saints and seers of the centuries? When a man like Phillips Brooks appears, whatever may lie back of him in a past unimaginably remote, you know that he bears, in his spirit, the image of God.

Ask any evolutionist, "What of man's origin?" and he will reply, "Man's origin was lowly enough." Ask the great majority of evolutionists, "What of man's destiny?" and they will reply: "Now is he the son of God, and it does not yet appear what he shall be, but there is at least a reasonable hope that some day he will become one with the eternal Father of his spirit."

What of the Bible?

But some one may say, If evolution be true, what becomes of the Bible? Well, there is a pleasing tradition that when Gallileo charged with teachings concerning the heavenly bodies that were contrary to the teachings of the Bible, one of his defenders remarked, "The Bible was given to show how to go to heaven, not how the heavens go." Is not that another great lesson some of us need to learn? The Bible was given to tell us how to go to heaven, not how the heavens go. It was written by men who were concerned to say that God is, and that he is able to do for tempted, troubled human spirits far more abundantly than they ask or think.

For what, then, shall we go to the Bible? For scientific information which its writers simply could not possess, living as they did in a pre-scientific age? Or for that stimulus to religious faith and that inspiration for noble living which leap from page to page of those glorious scriptures, in which many generations of questing spirits poured forth the deepest convictions of their hearts, and revealed an unparalleled insight into the heart of reality? In the light of evolution the Bible becomes, or rather remains, the greatest literary source in all the world of spiritual vision and moral power.

.. Evolution Supports Religious Faith. ..

It provides us with a nobler conception of God. Think, first of all, of the older conception of a God who dwells for unimaginable ages in a kind of splendid isolation—a God without a world. One day, about four or six thousand years ago, he decided to create a world and did create one in one hundred and forty-four hours, after which he rested twenty-four hours. Then, from his elevated position above the world, he began to direct the world's affairs, interfering from time to time h its orderly processes in order to work a miracle." A somewhat capricious God; a God, moreover, who, being thought of as dwelling "up there," could only with extreme difficulty be thought of as present everywhere.

With this conception of God, compare the conception made possible by the discovery of evolution. God has never dwelt in isolation. He has always created. The very necessity of his being has obliged him to create. Nor does God dwell somewhere above the world. He is as certainly in the world as a man is in his body — and he is as certainly more than the world as a man is more than his body. He is therefore, not far away from any one of us; in him, quite literally, we live and move and have our being. And yet, he is more than ourselves — more, far more, than the sum total of our humanity. And in what do we become aware of his existence? In occasional interferences with the laws of nature? No! In the universal order of the world; in the beauty and mystery of life; in the discovery of truth, an achievement of goodness, in the steady, sublime advance from mud to man, from savagery to civilization; and, above all, in becoming aware of God in Jesus Christ, his Son. Is not this latter a far greater conception of God?

The thought of evolution gives us a most helpful standpoint from which to view the world of the world. It enables us to look at our world, not in the perspective of a few thousand years, but in the perspective of millions of years. Ages were required to fit the earth for man, ages have passed since man began his life here. What patience has God had with the manifold imperfections of man — how patient we should be with each other as together we strive onward and upward! Better things are to come. "That is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural." First nature; then human nature; then, in the fullness of time, the nature of Christ. Out of nature came human nature. Out of human nature came the nature of Christ. Is not the character of Christ a revelation of the meaning of life, and a prophecy of its eventual achievement?

There is the dream of life after death, aye, of life in the midst of death, or of life triumphant over death. What of it?

It was none other than Darwin himself who declared, "It is an intolerable thought that man and all sentient beings are doomed to annihilation after such long continued and slow process." The evolutionist believes that the whole universe has labored to produce man: a creature endowed with memory, so that he is able to survey the past; endowed also with imagination, with creative intelligence, so that he is able to map out and, in some degree to determine the future; a creature of so rich and wonderful a nature that three score years and ten are far too short a time to enable him to satisfy his love of truth, his love of beauty, his love of love; a creature whose body links him into lower orders of creation, but whose spirit transcends all that is of the earth, earthy and enables him to commune with God.

And now, asks the evolutionist, what will the universe do with its finest product? Cast him as rubbish to the void? What an outcome that of the travail of a universe! What an anti-climax that of the whole world process! What a gigantic failure that of the Power which hitherto has so directed the course of evolution that, in the face of seemingly insurmountable difficulties, a veritable son of God has appeared? What will the universe do with man? It is an evolutionist who says, "Just as man's body has nearly reached the goal of its terrestrial development, so his spirit may just be commencing a corresponding career that will continue hereafter."

No Cause for Alarm.

Why, then, should anyone contemplate the fact of evolution with alarm? Far from banishing or even belittling the idea of God, it but adds to his glory. Far from degrading or even diminishing man, it reveals his uniqueness, his imperishable significance. Far from destroying religion, it fortifies it. And what a mighty stimulus it brings to the daring hopes of mankind. The hope that though a man die, yet shall he live again — how it kindles that! The hope that the dreams of prophetic spirits will yet be realized in a diviner civilization, the kingdom of God — what a light it throws upon that!

FIGHTING LIFE'S BATTLES.

The great souls of history, almost without exception, have been fighters. David was a man of war. Joshua "left not one of them alive." Caleb, inspired by a possible conquest, exclaimed, "We are well able to take it." Paul saw the need of putting on "the whole armor of God." About the first recorded appearance of Moses on the pages of history is noted in these words "He slew the Egyptian and hid him in the sand." He not only had "sand" in his character, but he found enough elsewhere to accommodate the Egyptian.

But what of the fighting spirit? On first thought, there is something rather repulsive about a fighter. He is not regarded as possessing the ideals of true virtue. People instinctively shrink from contact with a fighter. They feel safest when distance stands guard between. But is it not certain types of fighters that give disgust? None of these men were quarrelsome. None of them were spoiling for a fight. None went around with a chip on his shoulder, daring people to knock it off.

These men were lovers of truth and righteousness. On the altar of their hearts burned the fires of a holy zeal. They had a passion for the right that moved them to action, and prompted them to join battle in order to obtain a much desired and worthy end. Some one has pointed out three rules that should govern the conduct of every fighter: First, have a conviction. Second, take a stand. Third, have a hand in the fight.

To have conviction is to have stability. One of the greatest weaknesses of modern life is its lack of fixedness in character. Fickleness and change is everywhere evident. Men of strong convictions are rare. The world's great have been men of conviction. They have been men who have been willing to stake everything, even life itself, in support of a worthy cause. But the foundation of conviction is belief, and belief is Faith. It is the girdle of the great, and the weapon of victory! To take a stand, it is easy to "take a stand." Luther had it when he defied the pope of Rome. Lincoln had it when he issued his emancipation proclamation. Woodrow Wilson felt it when he called the nation to war against Germany. It is doing the thing the Apostle Paul was speaking about when he said: "Having done all, stand." To take a stand is to arrive at a decision. There is positive and definite action. There is a willingness to pay the price, and abide by the consequences. It means that you can be safely counted in, because of the stand you have taken. There is great need for more men of this type.

But there is an added step that is very essential. It is taken only when there is action. It is possible to "have a conviction" and to "take a stand," and yet remain very quiet about it. A further step is necessary for the fighter. He must "have a hand in the fight." This is what the Apostle James meant when he said: "Faith without works is dead." There must be evidence of action to sustain it. Our Lord said: "Why do you call me Master, and do not the things I command?" Pious beliefs on our part do not transform others. Gentle admonitions do not institute reforms. The world owes its progress to men who believed something, who stood for what they believed, and who have fought their way through to the realization of their dreams. Every star of glory in the diadem of our Christian civilization is an emblem of battle. Conflict is the builder of character.—Selected.

A WORTH-WHILE BOOK.

The "Psychology of Leadership," by Henry Edward Tralle, D.D., a book just off the press, should be read by all aspiring young people, and by others, too, who are not too old or too wise to learn. In a simple, clear-cut, and compelling manner, the author sets before his reader the indispensables of all successful leadership, and places them within the certain reach of every earnest aspirant.

The following chapter topics will be suggestive: "From Whence Leaders." "Personality Factors." "Learning to Remember." "Eyes That See." "Head Tonics." The book contains ten chapters, and 234 pages. It is a very readable book, and so worth-while that I should like to see it in our conference course. It ought to be read by every minister, and especially those who are at the beginning of their work. The book is published by The Century Co. Price, $1.75. Our publishing house in Baltimore can supply it, I am sure.

CHURCH EXTENSION NEEDS.

Brother J. Norman Wills, secretary-treasurer of the Board of Church Extension, notifies us that he will need for August obligations—salaries of our church extension pastors—$230. At present there is only a very small amount in the treasury, and unless the receipts are considerably increased this need, and other obligations will have to go unmet. If you have collections in hand, though the amount is small, please let us have it. Enough small collections will make up our needed aggregate.

man from 25 to 16, Saxapahaw from 31 to 29 and Lincolnton sent in a contribution which enabled them to hold their own, making five charges to contribute on the A. C. B.

On the G. C. B. we did better. Calvary and West End went over the top—West End reporting the amount sent in through the Missionary Societies. Randolph and Randleman raced for honors, Randolph winning by 9 cents and gaining Number 11, Randleman making 12. Orange sent in a good contribution which enabled them to hold their own. Asheville, too, because of a contribution is able to hold their own. Alamance went from 22 to 15, Guilford from 34 to 22, Vance from 42 to 24—just reversing the numbers —, Weaverville from 32 to 29, Pageland from 63 to 57. That is fine work. It is good to see this. Tabernacle enters the G. C. B. this week at 15. We welcome them. We welcome Rockingham as a new charge contributing. They enter the G. C. B. at 55. This leaves six charges not on the roll. That is not bad thus early in the year but it is worse than it ought to be even in a bad year financially. You should be honoring God with what you have even though it be small. I believe you could have shared with His needs if you had planned and worked definitely to that end, and I know that if you had He would have blessed you "more abundantly." You are beginning a new week.

Let's try very earnestly to make it unanimous for God and have our names—all our charges—on His financial roll for our Conference needs and for the greater needs of the General Church. Yours for the work,

A. G. Dixon.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Among the Churches.

For the greater part of last week Mrs. Dixon and I were with Rev. H. L. Isley on the Saxapahaw charge. We were in a splendid meeting at the Saxapahaw church.

The meeting was a good one from the beginning, many were converted, and from all outward appearances the Christian people were greatly strengthened. The Men's Federation of Graham, N. C., was going to continue the meetings for three evenings this week. I suppose a full report will be given of the meeting by some one else. It was a great pleasure to be associated with these people in this way. Mrs. Dixon made a Sunday school address at Concord church, and a missionary address at Orange Chapel while on the charge.

Efland.

On Sunday, July 19, I had the privilege of meeting with Rev. B. M. Williams and his people, and their visitors, at Efland on their Home-Coming Day. There was a large crowd of people present, and I enjoyed preaching to them in the morning service. After a splendid dinner on the grounds, we had the pleasure of listening to Rev. M. Ivey Crutchfield, one of the community boys, preach. Brother Crutchfield is pastor of Pageland charge and came back to his old home church for this special occasion. He preached well, and certainly showed that he knew when to quit when he was through.

The pastor of Orange and his family are now living in a splendid new seven room bungalow parsonage. It is a splendid new home.

Revival Services

This is our general revival season, and many of our meetings will be held during the next three months. We should all be much in prayer that many may be added to the fold of our Christ.

English Street Church.

Rev. A. M. Hamilton has been released from further duties as pastor of English Street Church, and Rev. W. M. Pike has been appointed for the remaining part of the year.

Our Great Need.

Mr. J. Norman Wills, treasurer of our Board of Education, is very greatly in need of $15,000 immediately. He is tiding over for just a few days until many of us can send in our payments. Whether you have pledged or whether you haven't please send every possible dollar to Rev. R. M. Andrews, D. D., High Point, N. C., between now and July 20th. I will do what I am asking you to do. Will you join me? Come on. Every dollar will help, so we are asking that you send in yours now.

Pay up your pledge, or any part of it soon. If you haven't pledged please send that amount you have been meaning to send.

Appointments.

1—I must help Dr. Andrews in every way possible to raise the money mentioned above.

2.—July 26th. Bethany, Flat Rock.

3—August 1st and 2nd. District Rally at Fair Grove, Why Not.

4—August 2nd. At night—Asheboro.

Faithfully yours,

A. G. Dixon.

NOTICE.

Any one wishing Thankful Boxes for the Home missionary Society work will kindly advise number wanted, and I will be glad to furnish.

Mrs. A. H. Ragan,

Sec'y. of Thankful Boxes H. M. S.
Thomasville, N. C.

ATTENTION, PASTORS, SUPERINTENDENTS.

Please send your Children's Day offering at once to your conference treasurer, if not already forwarded, and be sure to state it is for Foreign Missions.

If the offering is held, it will still further embarrass the Union Board of Foreign Missionary Administration which greatly needs funds to meet pressing obligations.

These obligations are new unless we receive the offerings raised by the Sunday schools for Foreign Missions, and we depend upon you to see that your school's offering is sent without delay.

Yours in the work,

Fred C. Klein, Executive Secretary.

Mt. Moriah, Cleveland Ct.—We are still doing things. Our Sunday school is moving along nicely under the leadership of Bro. R. C. Waters, assisted by a fine corps of teachers. Mr. Alfred Brockett is making the Bible class so interesting that he is getting a large number of our men and women together each Sunday morning. We are planning to have a Sunday school picnic next Saturday and are expecting quite a number and a good time.

Reporter.

Community Church, Thomasville.—We have had very interesting and good services all this month. Received three people into the church, Brothers Jim Perry and Banner Pierce, coming to us from the First M. P., and Mrs. Marley from her church in the country (M. E.) We are so glad to have these good folks unite with us.

We observed communion the second Sunday and yesterday we had such splendid services. Brother Williams preached a splendid sermon to a large congregation. We had so many visitors from the M. E. and Baptist churches (those pastors are away on a vacation). We enjoyed such a splendid solo by Mr. Roy Bethune.

We now have an assistant pastor in the person of Mr. Dwight Foust, a fine young man and one of our very own town boys, attended our graded school and this year graduated from Duke University. He has worked in our Sunday school during his vacations at home and had become familiar with us and our work. He gave us a splendid address last evening on "The Church and Education a Concrete Task." Several visitors were out to hear his first attempt to preach in our city. The duet by the Misses Perry was fine.

We have furnished a house for pastor's family and they are now at home in a new bungalow just back of Mr. C. F. Finch, until a parsonage is built, as Brother Finch intends to do.

The Sunday school is moving on with interest under the leadership of Superintendent Finch, a faithful and untiring worker. The Ladies' Philathea Class had 16 members present last Sunday; all are mothers too and busy women.

We are planning Children's Day to be held on the first Sunday in August. The committee on entertainments asked three of our college girls to train the children for the service, so Misses Margaret Perry, Sybil Williams and Ruth Boyles have begun the work, with Edith Myers at the piano. We are expecting a good program.

The orchestra director, Professor Jolly, has quite a large class now. Soon we expect to have a large orchestra to furnish music for Sunday school.

Superintendent Finch has called a teachers' meeting for Wednesday evening at the close of prayer meeting.

Reporter.

P. S.—I must tell about the pounding. On last Thursday evening quite a number of our members visited the pastor's new home, carrying groceries to start him off to house-keeping. Brother Williams gave a splendid talk and after prayer we left feeling glad to have gone there.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

Lord Bryce, that great Englishman who recently passed into the "Great Beyond," and who perhaps understood the strength and weakness of American civic life better than any other foreigner, and possibly better than many of, the native born Americans, said America's greatest weakness, and greatest danger is her cities. One hundred cities dominate the world, dictate its policies, direct all great movements of trade, and exercise almost a controlling influence upon all developments of science and religion.

In fifteen states of the American Union, more than half of the people are grouped in cities. In 1800 there was only six cities in the United States with a population of 8,000 or more. In 1910 there were 778 cities having a population of more than 8,000. In 1920, 51 per cent. of entire population of the nation lived in towns and cities of 2,500 people or more. More than half the population of the State of New York lived in New York City, one-tenth of the entire population of the United States lived in three cities, New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia, and one fourth of all the people lived on one four hundredth part of our land surface.

The city has been called Pandora's Box, with its mixture of good and evil. With in three urban areas are the wealth and the poverty of the nation. Here are her ideals and idealists, but here are also the centers of crime and disorder. At no other point in our national life do right and wrong come into sharper conflict.

The railroads have drawn the factories and other industries to common centers for ease, convenience, and economy in manufacture and distribution. Everything is brought to these centers, raw materials, food supplies, and men and women to man the ships and carry on the commerce. The day of the hand worker is gone forever. Machinery does everything—almost—and some one is working to eliminate the necessity of the few remaining tasks of the toiler whose work must yet be done by hand.

There are other advantages in the city. There are superior educational facilities, better opportunities in the professions; in art; in music; in technical training; and in many other ways the city presents an appeal to the progressive elements of our population. The problems of the city are very numerous and very difficult. We have allowed the land speculator to build our cities with narrow and oftentimes crooked and irregular streets; with limited transportation facilities; with schools taxed beyond their capacity; and with parks and other forms of public recreation far out of proportion to the needs and demands of the people.

The overcrowding of the city lowers moral standards, as well as the power to resist disease. Often in the poorer sections every room is a sleeping room, with boarders in addition to a family already too large for the house, crowded until sanitation and morality are well nigh impossible. We will discuss the city problems further next week.

OF VITAL IMPORTANCE NOW.

Every Children's Day offering ought to be sent without delay to the annual conference treasury, because the Union Board has loans to pay this month, and depends upon the offerings from the Sunday schools for its income at this time of the year, to pay its heavy monthly expenses abroad.

The offering was contributed for the foreign missionary work of the church, and it can best serve that purpose by being placed in the Union Board's treasury at once.

If a church or Sunday school has pressing needs it ought not to use the Children's Day offering even temporarily, but all such needs ought to be provided for in some other way.

Nor ought pastors to hold the Children's Day offering in order to take to annual conference, because the conference treasurer's receipt is all that is needed in making up their reports.

Those who hold the Children's Day offering for church or Sunday school purposes, to take to annual conference create very embarrassing conditions for the Union Board's loans at six percent interest, have to be secured while waiting for the money, given for its works, is sent in.

Churches and Sunday schools can obtain loans for their needs easier than the Union Board can secure large loans which are made necessary by so many offerings being held, as has been the case heretofore.

Treasurer Staley reported for the month of April, 1925, that three conferences had sent in Children's Day offerings, one sent in over $2300.00, and all that money had been contributed way last summer, and the Union Board paid interest on borrowed money because those Children's Day offerings had not been sent in.

It is assumed that some do not appreciate the conditions, but if pastors did not get their salary until their delegates took the money to the annual conference, the pastors would be seriously embarrassed.

Our missionaries, native pastors, teachers, etc. need their money every month on which to live, as do pastors here.

Again we urgently appeal, Brother pastor, that you see to it that the Children's Day offering from your Sunday school is sent in at once, if it has not been forwarded, to your conference treasurer, and be sure to state it is for Foreign Missions.

The Union Board's Report.

It was decided at the annual meeting that the annual report of the Union Board should be published in the July issue of "The Missionary Record" in addition to the usual matter published therein, as the proceedings of the Executive Board of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, etc.

It was also decided to send a copy of the Record to our pastors, so far as their names and addresses could be obtained, with the compliments of the Union Board, and an appeal for them to subscribe and to secure the subscriptions of others to the only missionary publication in our denomination.

Any one wishing to be informed on the foreign missionary work our church is conducting, with the latest news from the three fields, Japan, China and India, should send seventy-five cents to Mrs. H. E. Amos, Cambridge, Ohio, or to the Branch's agent, for a year's subscription.

You will not regret doing it, but rather wonder how you got along without this missionary magazine. Better sit down now and write that note for "The Missionary Record" to Mrs. H. E. Amos.

JUMPING JEHOSEPHAT.

"I know Dicky is a little rascal, but he is so pretty!" sighed his doting mother.

The eldest daughter of the new neighborhood looking sideways at little Dickey, and thought: "Well, they say love is blind."

"You know, dear," went on Dicky's mother, "he was a very delicate baby. Ever since night we used to have to carry him around on a pillow until he went to sleep."

"Is it possible!" murmured Estelle, to the new neighbor's daughter. She was looking at Dicky's wide shoulders and red cheeks and his black hair cropped close which made him look much older and huskier than was. "He seems quite healthy now," said.

"Oh, yes," agreed the mother. "He is so strong, a real boy, he has 'boy' written all over him, anybody could tell he was a real boy."

"I should say so," said Estelle.

"A real boy is full of life. Dicky is really very good," went on Mamma.

"I'm sure he is, Mrs. Stevens," agreed Estelle heartily.

She rose to go, and just then Dicky came bounding toward her. He dashed up to the porch and flung himself on Estelle, who he adored, and using both hands and feet he scaled right up her slender form until he perched triumphantly on her shoulder, steadying himself by holding on to her cap fully waved hair.

Estelle kept giving cries of dismay. In fact, she almost lost her balance. His mother tries to repress her indulgent smile and said: "Now, Dicky, dear, that will do. You're getting too big to jump on people that way!"

"Getting!" repeated a voice. "He is too big!"

The owner of the voice was a tall strong looking young man, Dicky's young uncle who lived with them. He now came hastily out of the house and tried to pull Dicky off the girl. Dicky held on to her hair for a moment, but Uncle Bill gave him a sharp slap with the back of his hand and Dicky let go.

"Don't be rough with him, Bill," said the mother. "You taught him that jumping trick yourself."

"Yes, I know," said Bill, putting the little fellow down. "But I didn't realize then that he would do it to ladies. Besides he's five years old now and a buster."

As soon as Dicky was put down, he squirmed away from his uncle and made a dive for his mother. He flew at her, took a jump and landed on her, arms outstretched, then he clasped her tight around the neck and hung there while the poor lady gasped for breath.

"Get down, Dick!" she said angrily. "You're awful! None of my friends like to come here any more you maul them so!" "Here, you rascal!" said Bill. "Snap out of that!"

He picked the boy off, stood him on his head and whistled with him. Dicky loved that. He would have adored wrestling and rough-housing with grown-ups all day and all night. His mother examined her torn collar, frowning a little. Somehow it was not so lovely having such a "real boy" when he became too real with her. Pretty Estelle escaped hastily to her home next door and locked the door behind her.

"Say!" exclaimed her brother Paul, who was ten years old, six years younger than his sister. "You look as if you'd been in a fight."

"I have!" said Estelle, a little tearfully. "That dreadful boy next door! Every time he sees me, he jumps for me like something out of a bush! I hardly dare to poke my nose out of the door. He meets me when I come home from school and nearly knocks me down."

"I'll knock him down!" threatened Paul, squaring his jaw.

"No, no!" said Estelle. "He doesn't know any better. He's only a little fellow, besides his mother would be awfully angry with you, and we don't want to be fighting with the neighbors."

"Well," said Paul, "I'll cure him somehow or other."

Paul hadn't a notion in his head as to how he was going to cure Dicky, but you know how things happen sometimes. There are such things as coincidences.

Estelle had been sneaking home and sneaking out to school for a week, afraid to show her nose on the porch on account of Dicky, and one day Paul might have been seen going over next door with a smile on his face, or rather, a grin on his face.

"I have a present for you, Dick," he told the little fellow as Dicky made a rush at him.

"What is it?" inquired Dicky, grabbing Paul and wrapping his arms and legs around him.

"A nice pup," replied Paul, digging his thumbs into Dicky's fifth rib. "The mother of the kid who owns him won't let him keep him and says I can have him. I'm going to give him to you."

What boy ever lived that didn't want a dog? Dicky yelled with joy and dashed into the house to ask his mother if it would be all right. His mother was sitting at the sewing machine. Dicky rushed in and jumped on her back, leaving marks of his hands all over her clean dress. But "boys will be boys," said Mrs. Dicky.

There was quite a scene on the street when Paul brought his present to Dicky. No wonder! He had his express wagon and a skinny red-headed boy helping him with it, for in it being pulled along was a large wriggling sack. They stopped at Dicky's house, took the sack out of the wagon. Dicky ran expectantly up, forgetting in his excitement to jump on anybody. They put a rope coming out of the mouth of the sack into his hand.

"Better tie it to your wrist," advised Paul. "Here, I'll do it for you. The pup is lively and might run off, since this is a strange place to him."

"All right!" agreed Dicky. "Quick, tie it, I want to see my dog."

Paul had a hard heart and he tied the rope tightly to the little fellow's wrist. Then the skinny boy opened the sack. Dicky crouched to leap on his pet the way he was used to doing to folks, when suddenly out of the sack leaped the dog and beat him to it. The first thing Dicky knew, he was on his back yelling with the dog on top of him nearly licking his face off. It was a large bristling dog, very peppy and muscular and affectionate. Dicky shoved the dog off and tried to get to his feet, but his pet jumped on him again pushing him over. Then he made a dash at Paul, but he was tied to his new master and nearly pulled Dicky's wrist in two.

"Well, good-bye!" said Paul hastily. "Hope you will have fun with him."

Dicky's mother rushed out of the house and grabbed the dog and his father untied the rope. As soon as he was free, the animal turned with a joyous bark and jumped on Dicky again, throwing him down.

"I—I don't like this dog!" sobbed Dicky, struggling with his affectionate pet.

His mother looked thoughtful.

"You know, Dicky," she said. "I believe that dog is just the one for you. There's something about it reminds me of you. He's affectionate and he jumps on people."

"I don't jump that way!" said poor Dicky. "I don't want him!"

"You do jump that way," replied his mother, a twinkle in her eye. "I believe this dog was given you for a purpose, and you have to keep him!"

It was the first time she had said "have to" to her darling, and Dicky knew she meant it.

A few days later Estelle walked slowly and boldly along the street and stopped in front of Dicky's porch to say "how do you do?" to Dicky's uncle. She no longer feared Dicky the jumper. He was cured and he was busy trying to cure his dog whom he had named "Jumping Jehoshaphat."—Selected.

THE QUIET PLACES.

What a picture of quietness and beauty is the lily. There is no noise, no fuss, no worry. Did you ever visit a busy manufacturing plant, with its whirl and noise of machinery and the incessant activities of the workmen, and then walk out into the fields or the quietness of the hills, where the ferns and flowers grow and bloom in silence and sweetness? What a contrast! Our life has too much of the motion and din of machinery, and too little of the quietness and impressiveness of the fields and the fragrance of the flowers. "They toil not, neither do they spin." Our Lord resorted to the solitudes of the mountain for prayer. Our prayer meetings sometimes savor of the mills rather than the hills; too much of man and too little of God. Oh, the inestimable privilege, protection, peace and provision of being shut in with God. The world and its worries shut out, living and rejoicing in "the secret place of the Most High." Why not? "For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things."—Anon. Anon.

COME AGAIN.

Once again the earth is waking
From its slumber deep and long;
Once again the air is ringing
With the glad bird's happy song.

Once again new life is springing
From the soil that seemed so dead;
Once again we toil with gladness
To obtain life's daily bread.

Once again our hearts are singing
With a joy that's ever new;
Once again God's love eternal
Doth our daily lives renew.

Once again then let us praise him,
From whom all our blessings flow;
Once again we bow, adoring
Him who maketh all things grow.

NOT YET.

I have not seen His face—
Not yet, not yet,
But oft beside mine own
His feet are set,
And I'll no strangeness feel,
No chill surprise,
That glad day when He bids
Me lift mine eyes.

If I have felt His touch
I am not sure;
Yet, when earth's sorrow grows
Past all earth's cure,
Comes there such sense of Him,
So close, so dear,
That mine own blood and breath
Seem not more near.

I have not heard His voice;
That, too, I wait,
Yet, not so much I pray
Heaven's opening gate
And all that sings or shouts
Dark Jordan past,
As but to hear Him speak
At home, at last.

GO WORK TODAY.

"Up, and be doing. The time is brief,
And life is frail as an autumn leaf.
The day is bright, the sun is high,
Ere long 'twill fade from the glowing sky;
The harvest is white, and the fields are wide,
And thou at thine ease may'st not abide.
The reapers are few and far between,
And death is abroad with his sickle keen.
Go forth and labor! A crown awaits
The faithful servant at heaven's high gates.
Work with thy might ere the day of grace
Is spent, ere the night steals on apace.
The Master has given his pledge divine,
Whoso winneth souls, like stars shall shine."

—Pastor Gerringer is away again this week preaching in a meeting of days. He secured the service of Mrs. A. G. Dixon as prayer-meeting leader on Wednesday night.

THE "SEA SHADOWS."

Some recent history-making aerial voyages across the Atlantic recall to us that great heroic adventure of the middle ages when a small fleet of frail sail boats sailed from Europe in 1492 with the hope of finding their way safely across an unknown and uncharted ocean.

The American continent had been found previously by Norse vikings, who had landed, in approximately 1000 A. D., about where Massachusetts is now.

But the news of their discovery never reached southern Europe, and Columbus knew nothing about it. Had he known of it he would probably have set a more northerly course, rather than toward the southern part of the Atlantic where he sailed into the unexplored ocean called the "Sea of Shadows," then supposed to be populated by demons and monsters.

According to accurate historians, this, in brief, is what led to the voyage:

There had grown a great and profitable trade between southern Europe and the Orient. In 1453 the Turks captured Constantinople and over-ran the Mediterranean with their pirate ships.

Thus the trade routes to the east were cut off, and Venice and Genoa found that new routes would have to be discovered if this trade was to be maintained in safety.

The first expeditions in the effort to find such a route to the Orient and the Indies went southward along the west coast of Africa, in hope of finding a way around that continent.

Columbus went on one of these voyages as pilot.

About this time Toscanelli, an Italian astronomer, became acquainted with the writings of Ptolemy, an Egyptian astronomer and mathematician, who had in 150 B. C. advanced the theory that the earth was round, and had made a map of the world as he conceived it to be.

Toscanelli made a map based on Ptolemy's which showed Asia as a huge continent, extending so far to the eastward that its coast fell where our Atlantic seaboard lies. Japan and the Indies he placed in the Gulf of Mexico.

According to his map, Japan lay only 3000 miles west of Europe. So he urged that navigators sail west instead of searching for a route around or through Africa, arguing that when Japan was reached, the travelers would be in familiar waters, and the trip from it to the Indies would be an easy matter.

Toscanelli furnished Columbus with a map and a set of sailing directions, and in several letters told him of the proposed westward route. These letters are still in existence.

Columbus carried the map on his voyage, pasted in his log book. This log, with the daily course marked off, and with notes in Columbus' handwriting, is also in existence.

When Columbus finally landed at one of the islands in the Bahama group, he of course believed he found the Indies in the vicinity of Japan, as shown by Toscanelli's map.

He died in ignorance of the fact that he had discovered a continent. It was not until 30 years later, after many voyages by other explorers, that the idea of a new world began to dawn on the minds of men.

Grammar school text books to the contrary, Columbus was not the first to conceive of the idea of a round earth, nor did he first advocate reaching the Indies by sailing to the west.

He may have thought of the possibilities of such a westward voyage before his correspondence with Toscanelli, but there is no evidence of it.

Columbus was, however, a man of remarkable strength of character and individuality.

He was a scientist and an experienced navigator.

He was enough of a dreamer to grasp this visionary project, enough of an adventurer to attempt such a daring and dangerous voyage, and enough of a man of action to get financial backing and to put the scheme through in spite of difficulty and discouragement.

Columbus is described as a tall man of graceful, stalwart build, whose ruddy complexion, white hair, and piercing black eyes made him noticeable everywhere.

He was 52 years old at the time of his historic voyage. The venture was financed by the queen of Spain, and the contract under which he sailed provided:

First, that he should have for himself during his life, and that of his heirs forever, the office of Lord High Admiral in any lands he might discover, holding the same powers as the High Admiral of Castile.

Second, that he should receive a royalty of one-tenth of all the gold, jewels, and net revenue of any kind derived from such lands.

Third, that he should be viceroy and governor-general of such lands, with full power to govern them.

When the death of Queen Isabella deprived Columbus of his only friend at court, various political enemies, jealous of his successes, caused to be taken from him all the honors and privileges to which he was entitled.

Accumulated hardships and disappointment broke him down.

The last eighteen months of his life were spent in sickness and poverty, and he finally died in an almshouse. — Imperial Type Metal Magazine.

MOTHERS THAT I HAVE HAD.

A Talking Doll Talks

By Anne Charlotte Darlington.

I am a perpetual infant because I have long clothes (hand made). I open and shut my eyes and say "Mama" when I am punched. But I am nearly four years old and experienced. In all, I have had nine mothers, — three real and six adopted.

I looked down upon my first mother from the branches of a gorgeous Christmas tree. It had a hundred colored lights and mechanical birds that sang. I danced with joy on my high branch especially when I saw my little mother. She was like an exquisite doll herself, with her yellow curls and lace dress.

"How happy I shall be with her," I thought, "and how happy she will be when she sees me."

"Look, Gwen, darling," said my mother's mother, as she took me down from the tree.

"Mama," I squeaked ecstatically as soon as Gwen touched me. She laid me down and I shut my eyes. When I opened them again I looked into hers. They were big and gray, but cold. So was her voice when she spoke. "A baby doll!" she said scornfully. "You are getting a Hawaiian dancer. You press button and she dances the hula. That's so thing funny!"

I stayed in that house a year and I should have died of loneliness if it had not been for the other dolls. Gwen had twenty-five. Her governess had to arrange us in neat rows on the nursery shelf. One December day, Gwen came in with her mother.

"I don't see why I should give my baby away," pouted Gwen. "Why should we send a box to Oakville?"

"They are your cousins, dear, and they are not rich. Your father insists that we give them really nice presents. Those books that the older boys were very expensive. We must economize by sending to the others some of your toys, nothing you want of course. This is that doll you got Christmas. You never play with it and it looks quite new. Peggy would be delighted."

Gwen shrugged her shoulders.

"You may take it if you will promise to get me one of those French dolls that grow up women play with. I think I'll select it myself."

So I was packed up in the Oakville box, and my second Christmas was a happy one. Peggy and her brothers were a jolly lot. She and I were boxed and played ball with them and they were nice to her, nice even to our dolls. They used to let her take us to ride when they pulled her about on their sled. Peggy always wanted to take us with her. She treated us as if we were alive. Dolls like that. There were only three besides me at Peggy's. Susie, a dilapidated rag doll she had had as a baby. Little Joan, who was all china and could be bathed and have her clothes made out of scraps, and the Lady Imogen who was bisque, prim and very grand. Imogen wore hoop skirts and had belonged to Peggy's mother and also to her grandmother.

I, too, was given a name. — Isabella, after the queen who helped Columbus discover the new world. Peggy loved history. She told stories and read her lessons aloud to us when she had to study. So I became educated. Geography was my favorite. I loved to talk about the great earth and all the different peoples that live on it. I used to wish I could travel. I little dreamed then — but I must anticipate.

Peggy used to wheel us about in an old carriage which was very shabby and crowded for four of us.

"Never mind," she would say, "I am saving my money for a new one. Meantime I ought to be glad you can go out and see sights."

Oakville was a small place, but there were always the pictures to look at. In front of the movies posters showed you scenes of Russia one day, and of ancient Rome the next. In the grocery window were colored views of China and India where the tea and coffee came from. One day in December we stopped before another card in that window. It was a picture of a sad-looking child in rags. "Does not ask for toys, only for bread," read Peggy. And she stood still looking at the child for a long time.

"Well, dears," she said to us at last, "you won't get your new carriage this year. We'll have to help."

Later she told us that her Sunday school class was going to adopt an orphan for Christmas. We wondered if the orphan was coming to live with us, but she explained that they sent the money and he was taken care of for a year in a home over there in the Bible lands.

The next Christmas they raised enough money to take him another year, and they decided to send a box for the other children. They went all about asking their friends and families for warm clothes. All the little woolen sweaters and mittens and caps that Peggy and her brothers had outgrown went into the box. It was packed in our nursery.

"Such a lot of nice, warm things," said Peggy's teacher. "Won't the children have a happy Christmas!"

"But I can't imagine a happy Christmas without toys," Peggy said when she was alone. And she looked at us as we sat in our old carriage.

Suddenly she caught me up and hugged me tight.

"You will have to go, Isabella," she whispered. "I just can't bear to have you leave me, but I must send one of you to cheer up an orphan. Joan's too little, and Imogen is a family doll that has to be kept for my grandchildren. No one would love Susie except me. So it has to be you."

"Mama," I wailed protestingly.

"Oh, cheer up and do your bit," said Peggy bravely. "It's for your own good anyway, Isabella. In a few years I'll be too big for dolls and you are the kind that needs good care all the time. You'll get it in that Home while there's a shred of you left. And perhaps you'll have adventures! So good bye, and don't forget me."

She kissed me, wrapped me up in a middy suit that her mother had said she might send and I was put into the box. I felt miserable, but as she laid me down my eyes shut and I went to sleep.

I suppose I slept a long time, for when I awoke Christmas had come again. The first thing I saw was a big tree. It was lighted but there were no singing birds or expensive ornaments. It was hung with chains of colored paper, such as children can make. There were little bags of candy and some cheap toys.

"Another doll," said the lady who held me. "I'm so glad. We have only 350 dolls and twelve hundred girls. You know every one of the little ones wants a doll. Can't we possibly buy a few more?"

A man writing cards at a desk shook his head.

"You know our orphanage money cannot be spent for toys. All these came in the American boxes, or from some Greek ladies of this town. And I think we are doing well to get a cake, an orange, candy and some sort of gift for every child."

"They will be happy," said another lady who was tying cards on the presents. "They get so much pleasure from little things even the pictures they cut out of magazines. I found little Araxie jubilant over a colored paper soap wrapper yesterday."

Just then my lady happened to touch my talking spot, and I said, "Mama."

"Who gets the trick doll?" asked the man who was writing cards.

"Give her to Demetra Pelopides, Doctor," said the lady.

"Good idea," the doctor answered. "She's a game kid and I like the way she helps with the others."

"Yes, she's brave. But her eyes are so sad sometimes. You know she saw her house burned in Smyrna and she lost her whole family. Perhaps it would help her to have something of her very own, even a doll."

So Demetra's name was tied on to me and I was put in a big basket with the others. There was a party that afternoon. Thousands of children. I had never seen such happy excitement.

They sang carols and some of them gave a little Christmas play. Angels, shepherds, the wise kings and the sick and the poor, all came to bring their praises and find their happiness before the manger of Bethlehem.

At last, one of them said:

"Ye may not on this Christmas day
Perceive with mortal eyes
The little Babe of Bethlehem
Who in the manger lies
But in His place you see the gifts
That earthly love provide
In memory of that Greatest Gift
Of the first Christmas tide."

And then the angels gave out the presents to the children. My new mother was so surprised and delighted when she saw me. "O you darling!" she cried, and ran to show me to her friends. But then came the first cloud of the marvellous Christmas. Her six special friends who had been happy a moment before, with their candy and hair ribbons, became suddenly sad. One of them began to cry. Not one of the six had gotten a doll. Demetra herself looked sad for a moment,—then she smiled. "We can all play with my doll and you can be her adopted mothers. There are seven of us and seven nights in the week. We can take turns in taking her to bed."

Well, I have lived now nearly a year in this big Home in Greece and I sleep every night with a different mother. They all love me and I love them all, but Demetra, my real mother, I love best. Like Peggy she tells me stories, when she takes me to bed—old stories that her mother used to tell her and her little brothers and sisters in the rose garden of their beautiful house in Smyrna. And she sings to me very softly the Greek lullaby her mother sang to her when she was a baby.

Then she goes to sleep to dream of her mother in the rose garden, and I shout my eyes to dream that Peggy and Demetra are friends and that they are playing together with me. Last night I had a funny dream, but a very nice one. I dreamed that a whole army of American dolls were coming to us this Christmas.

Other Gifts.—Mrs. J. N. Johnson, High Point, coats, sweaters, dresses and shoes.

Wednesday of last week a large number of the good people of Reidsville came over and brought a big picnic dinner and fed us all beautifully. The dinner was tiptop both in quality and quantity. The day was indeed an enjoyable day and will no doubt be long remembered as such. Come again, good people. The High Point Missionary Circle of the First Baptist Church came and gave us a good enjoyable program one night last week. They also furnished each member of the Home with a frozen sucker. Such kindness from good Baptist friends is much appreciated. To them we also say, Come again. A class from the Home rendered a program at each of the following places: Bethesda, N. Davidson, Greensboro, and Friendship, Haw River. All seemed to enjoy our program, and the figures in this report will show what they did for us financially. Tables loaded down with abundance of good things were found and enjoyed in our rounds.

Many thanks for the very great kindnesses received in so many ways from so kind and good people. E. G. Lowdermilk, Supt.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, JULY 26.

The Council at Jerusalem.

Lesson Text: Acts 15: 1-11. ..

Golden Text: Acts 15: 11.

The Central Truth: Christianity is not the destruction, nor enlargement, but the fulfilment of the ceremonial law. Jesus said: "I am not come to destroy but to fulfil."

Scriptural Points.

1. The large ingathering of the Gentiles into the church had stricken the Jerusalem element with surprise, uneasiness, and even consternation. They saw evident danger to the sacred ordinances and customs handed down by Moses. And they got busy to prevent their being cast into discard. They went everywhere declaring that there could be no salvation without circumcision. They were sincere and conscientious in so doing; but they lacked the larger vision. They failed to see that circumcision and the other ordinances were meant for the dispensation of the law, and must end with the close of that dispensation. They led to Christ, and were fulfilled in Him, and could go no further.

2. A controversy over this question started in the church at Antioch of Syria. Paul and Barnabas contended with these Judaizing teachers for the larger liberty for these Gentile Christians. They held that salvation by faith alone could not be weighted down with a set of ordinances that could mean nothing in the new dispensation. They boldly defended the simplicity of the gospel and the larger liberty of the Christian church.

3. But the Antioch church could not settle this question. An appeal was taken to the mother church at Jerusalem. A general conference of apostles and elders met to consider and decide this important matter. Paul and Barnabas, and certain others, were sent as delegates to this conference. Along the three hundred miles' journey these men of God proclaimed to the churches en route the conversion of the Gentiles and thereby won many adherents to the larger freedom.

4. The general conference met. The contenders for Judaism were given the first inning. They had their say. Peter was the first to reply to them. He related the second pentecost at the house of Cornelius. God saved the Gentiles without circumcision, and would continue to do so. Circumcision could not be a condition of salvation. The Holy Spirit had decided that question.

5. Paul and Barnabas spoke next. They gave account of the wonderful ingathering of the Gentiles to Christ. They told of the many miracles wrought in attestation of this work of grace. God Almighty had actually saved uncircumcised people. He had completely disregarded the line of cleavage set up by the advocates of circumcision.

6. James, a natural brother of Jesus Christ, and the presiding officer of the general conference, spoke next and announced his decision, which we understand was the verdict of majority present. James quoted the prophets in support of the Gentile ingathering. He decided against the handicap of Jewish ordinances. He prescribed four church rules for the Gentile believers. They were enjoined to "abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood."

In a word, they must keep themselves entirely free from idolatrous worship and practices.

Practical Points.

1. The forms of godliness are immaterial. It is the power thereof that counts with God, and wins the everlasting prize. "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature."

2. The liberation of conscience is one of the most significant triumphs of Christianity. "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

3. Freedom from the dominion of sin and the unholy customs of the ungodly world is a prize of superlative value. "Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."

4. The Holy Spirit is the agent of liberation. He opens the prison doors and sets the captives free. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

5. Christianity has discovered the worth of the individual, and has conferred upon him manifold privileges and responsibilities. Self-government is a most valuable by-product of the truth of Jesus Christ. World-wide democracy will eventually prevail as one of the triumphs of the teachings of Christ. "But Jesus called them unto him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: and whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all." Mark 10: 42-44.

—The Word of Life.

THE HIGHER FRIENDSHIP.

Only through Jesus do we know God, his interest in us, his desire for us, his purpose with us. He not only shows us in his own example the blessedness of a life in fellowship with the Father, but he makes it possible for us. United to Jesus, we know ourselves united to God. The power of Jesus is not limited to the historical impression made by his life. It entered the world as history; it lives in the world as spiritual fact to-day. Luther's experience is the experience of all believers: "To me it is not simply an old story of an event that happened once; for it is a gift, a bestowing, that endures forever." We offer Christ the submission of our hearts and the obedience of our lives, and he offers us his abiding presence. We take him as our Master, and he takes us as his friends.—Hugh Black, M. A.

CHRIST ON CALVARY.

The strangest thing in all the history of the universe is the cross, and yet the divinest thing. It pours contempt over the glory of material things. It makes the glory of God in the heavens and in the firmament, which are his own handiwork, pale away into insignificance. Yet it was a cross, a bloody cross; it had all its sorrow, yet God was on it. It is through Christ crucified that God is known. He is the power of God and the wisdom of God; and if ever the demonstration of the truth that God is a Spirit was furnished to the world, it was by the Christ on Calvary. If the opposite were true, that God is not spiritual, then we should have wanted pomp and state and ceremony to accompany the Son of God. But such was not, and is not the case. The crucified and risen Saviour is the supreme revelation of God.

He breaks down every barrier between us and God and leads us into the holy of holies. All may come near in full assurance of faith, and they that come shall find that God is nearer than they ever dreamed, nearer than anything else in the universe, so near that, if they will but hold on to him, he and they will grow together into one—"they all shall be one"—perfected and cemented in eternal union with him, now and hereafter, even forevermore.—Bishop A. W. Wilson.

THE MARKS OF THE LORD JESUS.

No one who is at all familiar with the story of Paul's hardships, sacrifices, and sufferings endured for the sake of his divine Lord, will accuse him of boasting or of self-glorification when he declares in his epistle to the Galatians, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." His devotion to the cause of Jesus, whose disciples he had bitterly persecuted, was complete, intense, and aggressive, and one of its natural results was that the former persecutor should be numbered among the persecuted. But persecution was only one of many things. This left its mark upon him; but if it was indelible, so were the marks made by the afflictions, necessities, distresses, stripes, imprisonments, tumults, labors, watchings, fastings, evil reports, dishonors, chastenings, sorrows, shipwrecks, journeyings, perils, and weariness, of which he writes—a dreary but glorious category—and to which he appends this note of exultation, "I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake."

"For Christ's sake"—this is the holy principle that governs the lives of the true disciples of Jesus. It was so among those whom He called to be His close comrades and apostles. It has been so through the intervening centuries. It is so to-day among the multiplied thousands who, having accepted His marvelous salvation, have become new creatures in Him.

Could we know the self-sacrifices, self-denials, and sufferings made for Christ's sake and borne for others with sweet patience by those who love Him, we should behold many a humble follower, glorified into sainthood, and beholding, we should understand the peculiar significance of Paul's expression, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus," for then every line in the care-wrinkled face and every hair whitened by sorrow would be recognized as a "mark of the Lord Jesus."—Exchange.

THE ONLY SAVIOUR.

Not my works, my prayers, or tears,
Not my inward joys or fears,
Not my conduct—good or bad,
Not my feelings—grieved or glad,
But the Son of God who came—
Died for me and rose again,
Lives above at God's right hand,—
Is the Christ in whom I stand.

SERMON TO CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE.

Text: "Then said his sister to Pharaoh's daughter, Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee? And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went and called the child's mother. And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child and nursed it. And the child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. And she called his name Moses: and she said, Because I drew him out of the water." Ex. 2:7-10.

Moses was a goodly child. He came into the world to face a death-sentence. For Pharaoh, King of Egypt, had commanded that every male child should be cast into the river. But his mother determined to save him from such a fate. So she "hid him three months. And when she could no longer hide him, she took for him an ark of bullrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and she laid it in the flags by the river's brink." His sister Miriam stood afar off to watch, so that no harm might come to the little one. And one day while she was keeping watch, the daughter of Pharaoh came down to the river where the baby was hidden. And when she saw the ark she sent one of her maidens to bring it. The crying, helpless babe so won her heart that she made up her mind to adopt the child as her own son. Right here the sister spoke out, "Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women that she may nurse the child for thee?" With her permission Miriam went and called the child's mother. "And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Take the child away and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages." This is likely the first mother that was paid for nursing her own child.

The sister was a faithful watcher. A precious life was at stake. The ark contained a treasure worth more than all the world. The little baby was destined to become one of the greatest and best men of all time. She watched lest any evil might come to the little brother. She watched for an opportunity to restore the little one to the mother and the home. Miriam was a faithful little watcher and the world owes her a thousand thanks. She helped her mother to get the baby back into the home. She helped her brother to a noble chance in life. And she helped all mankind to a better knowledge of God and duty.

Now every boy and girl can help mother. By helping mother, you are helping to make the home, you are helping to make the world better, and you are helping God.

First, to help mother is to help make the home. A good home is the best place this side of heaven. Home is love's kingdom, where love reigns and brings its choicest blessings. Home is the child's nursery, the youth's training school, the lover's paradise, and the haven of rest for old age. Mothers are in the main the home makers. A child was once asked where his home was, and he replied: "It is where my mother is." How true is this. Home is where mother is. Mother makes the home by her unselfish love. Her love is the greatest and the purest in all the world. She is queen of the kingdom of love. When God came to make a comparison of His everlasting love He compared it to the love of a mother. "Can a mother forget her sucking child? . . . Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee." A mother's love is next to that of God, in its beauty, strength, and constancy. Mother makes the home by making great sacrifices. She gives her thought, her time, her toil, her health, and her life to the making and keeping of the home. True homes come high but they are worth all that they cost.

Every boy and girl can help mother make the home by being good, by obeying father and mother, and by being kind to the brothers and sisters and everybody. They can help make the home by doing good, by helping in the work, and sharing the heavy burdens that fill the mother's heart and hands.

In the second place, to help mother is to help make the world, and make it a better world than it has been. Almost every mother plans a good, clean, and honorable life for each of her children. She cherishes these plans in her heart, breathes them in her prayers, and works night and day to bring them to pass. O children, how well and nobly you can help mother by carrying out her plans in building a strong character, and living a clean, straight and useful life.

And you can help mother make this a better world by giving your heart and life and all to Jesus, the Saviour of the world. To be a true, loyal and faithful follower of Christ is the greatest achievement in the world. To be a Christian is a greater honor than to be king, emperor or president. Always be true to your mother's God.

And lastly, to help mother is to help God. For God and mother are partners in making men and women. And these two want co-workers in this the greatest of all businesses, that of making true men and pure women. Each one of you children can help God and mother in their task of making a good man or a good woman out of yourself. For, try as hard as they will, they can't do much without your help. With your help they can do a work that will extend its influence into eternity.

God needs a great army of brave boys and pure girls to help bear the burdens that weigh so heavily upon the mothers' hearts and hands. You can help just by being brave and pure and good. For a mother's heaviest and most heart-breaking burdens consist in the waywardness, the disobedience, and sins of her children. You can help by trusting, loving, and serving mother's best Friend, everybody's best Friend, the Friend Christ Jesus, the Saviour of the world.

"A BOY IN THE WELL"

"A boy in the well!" This was the cry that sounded through the streets on a bright summer's evening. The day's work was done, the sun had gone down in purple and gold, the busy workmen rested after their day's labor. Some asked, "Whose boy was it?" Others, "Had not the lid been laid over the well opening?" or, "had it been taken off?"

But a young man sprang quickly forward, threw off his coat, and asked help of the bystanders in these words: "Never a word about the cause of the mishap, but let us see how we can save the child. That is the question?" "That's it" was the answer of a dozen voices while the well winch was set going, and many pale faces peered over the edge of the well. One after another called out to the child; some asked if he was frightened; but to all the advices and questions no answer was heard, not a sound came forth.

"The weather has been dry, and there is little or no water in the well," said one.

"O dear," said the boy's mother, "it was only yesterday that I grumbled because there was so little water."

"Let us have a lantern," said the first man and a lantern was lighted and brought there, but in the same moment the boy's father was seen pushing his way through the crowd. A way was made for him. He had been at work at a nearby farm, and returning at dusk to his home, was surprised to find the room empty, the street deserted, and all the people gathered round the well.

When he heard what had taken place, and saw his wife wring her hands, he turned very pale. But recovering himself as much as possible he said: "Stand back, leave the child to me."

Then he carefully examined the winch and the rope, and tied to the latter a couple of sacks rolled up hard. Having done this he let it down till he felt it touch the bottom of the well.

"Now be quite still," he said, looking around. And lying down, with his face to the well opening, he called out softly and distinctly: "John, take hold of the rope!"

This time a faint pull was felt on the rope.

"Pull up, men," said the man, "steady, mates, steady."

And again leaning over the well, he said down into the dark: "Hold fast, my child."

All the time the winch was wound, but the well was deep, and it seemed a very long while.

At last there sounded forth a right good cheer.

"He is saved," said the crowd. "Thank you, mates," cried the father, as he lifted the boy in his arms, and carried him down the street.

The child was saved. The father's voice had reached him. He had learned to obey, and when the well-known voice had told him to take hold of the rope, the child understood and did it. The command was a plain one, and brought salvation to the child.

God has sent His only begotten Son down to this dark world. He has given a way of salvation. Christ is the way.

"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

This is His command. If you obey you are saved. Will you do as the little boy in the well? Will you take hold of the rope today?

"Seek ye the Lord while He may be found; call ye upon Him while He is near." Isa. 55: 6.—The Word of Life.

—The Building Committee of High Point College recently had a meeting with the contractor and agreed to accept the buildings (dormitories and heating plant) on the promise of the contractor to make some minor repairs.

A BRIGHT CONFESSION—"CHRIST FOR ME."

He was a gallant young sailor, and knew what it was to plow the stormy deep. Wandering listlessly along the streets that November evening, he was attracted by the sound of singing, and coming into the place where a few young men were testifying the Gospel, and telling of the power of Christ to save, the young sailor received Him, and was then and there converted.

Standing in the middle of the circle, his face beaming with his new-found joy, he sang "Christ for me."

"Nail it to the mast," said one, "and make it the flag under which you sail everywhere and always."

And he did. Amid scoffs at first, and for many years after as captain of his ship, he sailed under the royal flag of "Christ for me," adorning His doctrine and owning His claim.

Can you say, "Christ for me"? If not, what? There is no half-way course, no neutral zone. It must be Christ or the world, God or the devil, sin or salvation, heaven or hell. And your present choice will fix your future destiny for glory or woe. Which?

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." John 3 36.

"I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life." Deut. 30 19.

—Of the three great modern beverages—chocolate, coffee and tea—chocolate was the first to reach western countries. Tea followed in 1588, and coffee in the following century. Cortez found cocoa in Mexico in 1519, where its use by the natives dated from time immemorial. The people of Abyssinia have used coffee from the remotest times and, according to Chinese traditions, tea was drunk in that country three thousand years B. C.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

High Point.—We are grieved to note the passing of one of our oldest and most highly esteemed members, Mrs. Sarah Welborn Sechrest, who was one of the charter members of the church. She was the widow of the late Squire J. M. Sechrest, and had lived in High Point practically all her life. She was born here December 17, 1849, and was married to Mr. Sechrest October 14, 1869. About four weeks ago she suffered a stroke of paralysis at the home of her son, Aloah Sechrest, at Trimity, and succumbed to this illness on Thursday, July 16, at the age of 75 years. The body was removed to the home of her daughter, Mrs. Arthur J. Wilson, at 805 Lindsay street, and funeral services were conducted at the First Church on Saturday afternoon at three o'clock by her pastor, Dr. Geo. H. Brown, in the presence of a large crowd of sorrowing relatives and friends. Her grandsons, Messrs. Hubert, Claude, Ernest, Raymond, Homer and Ralph Sechrest, and Paul and Alton Wilson, carried her body to its final rest, and the floral offerings were borne by her granddaughters. Interment was made in Oakwood cemetery. She is survived by two sons, Messrs. Aloah and Mallie P. Sechrest, and a daughter, Mrs. Arthur J. Wilson, to whom our hearty sympathy is extended. Mrs. Sechrest was a woman of beautiful Christian faith and character, and her passing will bring sorrow to a large circle of friends. "She hath done what she could."

The Ladies' Aid society met at the church Monday afternoon, July 13, with the following associate hostesses: Mrs. J. A. Gray, Mrs. A. L. Ellison, Mrs. C. L. Gray, Mrs. J. B. Spencer, Mrs. H. C. Fogleman, Mrs. A. L. Cecil, and Mrs. Reuben Allred. After the business session the hostesses served delightful refreshments appropriate to the warm weather.

The new pulpit furniture which is the gift of Mrs. Ben T. Moore, Messrs. Richard and Brooks Reitzel and Miss Elizabeth Reitzel has arrived and been placed in position. The set consists of a pulpit desk and three large chairs of mahogany, and is very handsome and chaste in design, a most appropriate memorial to the parents of the donors, the late Dr. and Mrs. James R. Reitzel. This elegant gift is greatly appreciated by the pastor and congregation.

Quarterly conference will be held Wednesday evening, at which time reports from all societies and activities of the church will be heard, and the delegate to the Annual Conference will be announced.

The Men's Club will hold its monthly meeting at Tar Heel Inn on Thursday evening, July 23, and will have guests from Thomasville and Greensboro. Supper will be served at seven o'clock.

Mrs. Nat Alexander and two children of Charlotte have been guests of her sister, Mrs. J. A. Gray, for a week.

Misses Rosalie, Alma, and Dorothea Andrews have returned from a visit to their grandmother, Mrs. S. R. Harris of Henderson Dr. and Mrs. Andrews and Master Robert went over and remained for a few days, bringing the girls home with them.

Mrs. J. D. Davis of Yadkin College is a guest in the home of her nephew, H. U. Oakes.

Mrs. George Sparger of Mt. Airy and small son and daughter are guests of her sister, Mrs. Lester Peacock. She is pleasantly remembered here as Miss Lucille Oakes.

Miss Annette Pickens has had as her guest her little cousin, Alice Armfield of Concord, and accompanied her home on Monday for a week's visit.

Miss Annie Robbins has been the guest of her cousin, Miss Elizabeth Long, in Graham.

Mrs. A. L. Ellison and daughter, Miss Myrtle, have returned from an extended visit to relatives in Toccoa, Ga.

Miss Blanche Wagner, who has taught in Selma, N. C., for the past two years, has been elected a teacher in the city schools.

Mr. and Mrs. Ben T. Moore have gone to Florida.

Reporter.

Hobbs' Chapel, Greenville Ct.—We are glad to report that Pastor Powell is much improved and able to make his "rounds" again. Although he has been unable to preach he has sent a speaker to conduct each service, which shows his heart was in the work. Bro. J. B. Clements filled the appointment on the second Sunday in June. His subject was, Sin and its Remedy. We are fortunate to have a man of so fine a Christian character on this charge as Bro. Clements who gladly speaks for his Master when called upon to do so.

Bro. Powell was on hand the fourth Sunday and secured pledges for Our College (those two words should begin with capitals, Bro. Editor!) After that he read a psalm of praise and commented upon it. This was a very impressive service. Yesterday, second Sunday in July, Bro. Harrison of High Point College was with us. He told many interesting things about the college—namely, buildings, how furnished, something of the work accomplished there during the past year, and what eminent men are saying about the architecture, and the grade of work done there. We are proud of Her and glad that we could do a little to help make Her possible! He said that was what prayer and work could do. Then he made a short talk on Prayer, which was very helpful and encouraging to us.

Come again, Bro. Harrison, if we are a "sleeping giant" perhaps there is a possibility of an awakening!

Our special meeting begins the first Sunday in August. Bro. Powell doesn't know yet who will be his help. Pray that God may bring about a revival in the church—that each member may get a new vision of service, also that sinners be brought to Christ.

Matthews Chapel, Greenville Ct.—On Sunday morning, July 12, the Woman's Home Missionary Society met at church. Our president, Miss Gertrude Bowen, had charge of the meeting. The meeting opened by singing "To the Work." Prayer was offered by Mr. J. B. Edwards and the 23rd chapter of Proverbs was read by the president.

Sixteen members responded to roll call with Scripture verses. Many visitors were present also. The story of Ruth was read by Mrs. Wreford Bowen. Also reading by Mr. Eddie Lee Edwards. Song, I Walk with My King, was sung. Collection, $1.20.

Our next meeting will be held at Matthews Chapel on the second Sunday night in August at 8 o'clock.

Orange Charge.—Children's Day exercises were held at Chestnut Ridge Sunday, July 12, 11:00 a. m. A large congregation was present. The children rendered their parts well. They were trained by the following ladies: Mrs. Thos. P. Cheek, Mrs. David M. Sykes, Mrs. John Howard and Miss Irene Williams. Offering for foreign missions, $35. We wish to thank all who had any part in these exercises.

At 2:00 P. M. Rev. D. R. Williams preached for us. He is no stranger at Chestnut Ridge, this being his home church. He preached a splendid sermon. Come again, Bro. Williams.

Moved, not from Orange Charge however, but from a rented house into our new parsonage. This is one of the neatest parsonages the writer knows of. It is a credit to Orange charge. We congratulate the charge on the erection of so splendid a building.

Yesterday was a splendid day for Efland "Home Coming Day." Dr. Dixon preached, 11:00 a. m. Dr. Dixon was at his best. A large congregation heard him. Dinner was served from a large table which had been prepared for the occasion. After which the afternoon services were entered into. These consisted of special music by a visiting choir, sermon by Rev. M. Ivey Crutchfield, address by Rev. T. M. Johnson, D.D.

Bro. Crutchfield acquitted himself well. This being his home church we are naturally pleased with him and pray that he may have a successful career as a minister of the gospel.

We are always glad to have Dr. Johnson with us. His instruction is always worth while.

We thank all these brethren for their presence and timely messages. Also people of the other denominations for their presence and help in these services. To all we say, "Come again."

Sincerely,

B. M. Williams.

Whitakers, Whitakers Charge.—Quite a good many things have happened since a report has gone from our church. A few Sunday nights ago the Intermediate C. E. society had charge of the service except preaching the sermon. Wilma Hull was pianist for the occasion. Helen King sang a very sweet solo. "This is My Task." Prayer by Spencer Cutchin, Scripture reading by Ruth King and announcements made by Jesse Johnson. The pastor then preached a sermon, mainly to young people, though good for all.

Our pastor with three others attended the Young People's Conference and we are proud of the fact that they brought back a banner. Last Sunday the pastor was away helping in a revival service, so the appointment was filled with a "Children's Day" service. To Spencer Cutchin is due the credit for this service. Notwithstanding the extremely hot weather, she and the children met every morning and worked hard to get it up in one week. Of course being a morning service and the weather so extremely hot, the crowd was not so large as when we have a night service. All went off fine. The music was wonderfully helped by having Mrs. Warren Woodard accompany the piano with her violin, and she knows what to do with a violin. The offering was $25.

Our third quarterly conference convened at Speights Chapel week before last. We are pretty well up with our finances. On counting the votes it was found Mr. J. M. Cutchin, Jr., was elected delegate to the Annual Conference.

Our Ladies' Aid society are at work trying to keep up our payments to the building and loan. We have taken 30 shares for the purpose of heating our church, and making some other much needed repairs.

The next thing we are looking forward to is our Sunday school picnic.

Best wishes to all readers.

July 20.

Alleghany, Davidson Ct.—Brother Ridge preached us another good sermon the second Sunday and administered the Lord's Supper. Sunday school is doing fairly well. We have had a good singing and a nice children's day. The protracted meeting will commence the second Sunday. T. E. Pierce is expected to help in the meeting. We ask all of the Christian people to pray that we may have a good meeting and that sinners may be converted and that our church may be built up.

Abigail Coggin, Rep.

Pine Grove, Kernersville Charge.—Our series of meetings began yesterday. Rev. C. W. Bates of Asheville preached two excellent sermons. In the morning his subject was The Recipe for a Revival, and in the afternoon it was, The Concord of Prayer. May this meeting result in a great revival.

Rev. and Mrs. R. A. Hunter of Winston-Salem were among our number of welcome visitors Sunday.

The Sunday school had a very enjoyable outing and picnic at Guilford Battle ground on July 11.

Mrs. Eliza Weisner of Durham is spending the week with her sister, Mrs. Flora Crews, and other relatives.

The third quarterly conference will be held at Ai church next Saturday afternoon at two o'clock. All official members please come.

Since our last writing we have been unfortunate in the fact that two of our oldest and most valuable members have passed to their reward, viz., Messrs. R. L. Dwiggin and R. H. Ingram. They are greatly missed, but we feel that our loss is their gain and we humbly submit to the will of God who doeth all things well. Mr. Ingram lived nearest to the church and was present in all its services. It is an inspiration to see old men never graduate from Sunday school but attend every Sunday. We pray that we may have younger people to step in and carry on the work of the older ones who are stepping out of the ranks.

Best wishes to the Herald and all its readers.

—There is one art of which man should be a master—the art of reflection.—Coleridge.

Asheville.—Our church was distressed at the passing of Mrs. Ellen Monteith, Saturday night. Funeral services were conducted by our pastor, Brother Bates, Monday morning. Brother Bates in a separate communication will express our sense of loss, and our appreciation of Mrs. Monteith.

Thursday of this week the missionary societies will meet at the home of Mrs. L. M. Joiner, in Gracelyn.

Saturday of this week Pastor Bates will leave for High Point. He will help Brother Suits in a meeting at Piney Grove, commencing next Sunday. Rev. Homer Casto will preach at our church Sunday morning. In the evening the Christian Endeavor Society will have charge of the service.

A number of visitors attended the services last Sunday. Both services were blessed with splendid messages by our Pastor. The morning subject was, "What It Means to Be a Christian;" the evening subject was, "the Beauty of the Lord." One of the Sunday School classes is studying Dr. Lewis' handbook.

A recent visitor to Asheville was Miss Miller, a member of Rev. N. O. Gibson's church at Chestertown, Md. Miss Miller spent a few days here on her vacation. She is engaged in the millinery business in South Carolina.

Mrs. O'Brien, nee Miss Willow Miller, recently returned from New York City, and is now a patient in the Meriwether Hospital here.

Mrs. Boyd, one of our faithful members, is also in the Meriwether Hospital.

Mrs. Mary E. Fears was able to attend Church last Sunday for the first time in many months.

Mrs. George Bates is a patient in the Mission Hospital, this city.

Mrs. York and Mrs. Stafford, of Greensboro, worshipped with us last Sunday.

Shiloh, Connolly Springs Charge.—Sunday school report for July 12: Attendance: officers and teachers, 5; departments—adults 8, senior 9, junior 7, beginners 13; visitors, 1; total attendance, 42. Collection, 66c.

Rev. Raymond Gertner filled his regular appointment for us Sunday morning at 11 o'clock. We all enjoy his sermons very much.

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

Calvary News.—The work at Calvary is holding up well under the stress of hot weather. The summer slump has not hit us very hard yet. Quite a number of our people have been visiting their old home churches near by but not enough go at any one time to make a very noticeable showing in our attendance here.

The Sunday school is increasing a bit in numbers and in interest, I think, since we started our "Southern Highway Auto Race Contest." Quite a number of new members were added to the school last Sunday.

The Children's Day Service which was held two weeks ago was of a very high order and the offering was good. We asked for $25 and got more than $36. When people do more than you ask them to do there is no room for complaint. The young ladies who trained the children did some fine work. This kind of work is doubtless the most difficult of all church work and yet the most important.

Both the General and Annual Conference budgets have been paid in full. We are now conducting a debt-destroying campaign. The membership is divided into two groups with a captain over each group. The hope is to create some friendly rivalry and thus hasten the liquidation of our debt.

Our people were delighted to have Brother J. A. Burgess preach at Calvary Sunday night July 12th. They were also pleased to have Brother Little preach on Sunday night of the Young People's conference.

The people continue to remember the preacher's family with substantial donations. Since our last report Mrs. A. E. Causey gave us half gallon berry jam, Brother T. F. McCulloch's people strawberries, Brother and Sister J. C. Andrews cherries and other fruits, Mrs. Hardin canned peaches and strawberry preserves, Mrs. Amanda Hanner peaches, Mrs. Campbell apples, Miss Velna McCulloch a dress for the wife and a pair of shoes for the preacher, Mrs. J. F. Williams and Mrs. J. A. Cox a dress for the wife, Mr. Ingold steak and fish. There have doubtless been other gifts that I do not recall just now. All have been appreciated. They have been worth while because they help to make ends meet for the preacher folks on a small salary and because they represent a fine spirit on the part of those who contributed them.

L. W. Gerringer, Pastor.

Glen Raven.—Our special meeting closed. Shelby.—The pastor and family are enjoying a two weeks vacation which was granted by the church on Sunday, July 12. We thank the church for the vacation extending over two Sundays. We will return to Shelby in time to resume the work on the first Sunday in August. The vacation is being spent with relatives in and near Burlington.

This writer wishes to express his appreciation to the Shelby church for their consideration of his temporal needs. A purse of $16.00 was donated for the purchase of needed clothing. We are now the possessor of new shoes, a new hat and a new shirt, which were made possible by the gift mentioned. We thank every one who contributed in the donation.

We express our thanks to others for their kindness shown in gifts for our table. Among the givers were Mrs. J. T. Ramsey, nice mess of sauer kraut; Mrs. William McSwain, peaches; The Blanton Dairy, weekly supply of sweet milk.

Rev. W. H. Wall, of the Baptist denomination, was engaged to preach at both services of the Shelby church last Sunday. No services are to be held next Sunday except the Sunday school and Christian Endeavor Society. Preaching services will be resumed by the pastor the first Sunday in August, with the Lord's Supper at the morning service.

C. B. Way, Pastor.

Dulins, Mocksville Charge.—Our Sunday school is progressing nicely, we having as many people attending Sunday school now as we used to have at monthly meeting, and most of this honor is due our pastor, Rev. J. T. Sisk. This spring he visited the homes of the people in this community and got the people interested in the Sunday school. Brother Sisk filled his appointment yesterday morning with a very interesting and helpful sermon. We were sorry to hear of Mrs. Sisk being sick. It is thought that she might have appendicitis. We hope that she will soon recover.

The revival meeting will begin the first Sunday in September with Rev. D. A. Braswell as pulpit help. We are glad to have the promise of Brother Braswell's help. He has helped here twice before. We want all the Herald readers to join us and pray that we will have a good meeting. Best wishes to the Herald and its many readers.
Leona Hendrix.

English Street, High Point.—Our Christian Endeavor is doing just fine with the help of our president, Rev. W. C. Hall.

Every Sunday evening he brings to us many new thoughts.

We hope more people will co-operate with us and make our Endeavor more interesting.
Reporter.

Corinth.—Our reporter has not reported in some time on account of sickness and death in her home.

Our Sunday school is moving on real well, but we need more of our young people.

Pastor O'Brian filled his appointment here on the first Sunday and gave us a good sermon.

We meet at Mrs. B. D. Carter's every Friday night for choir practice.
Mrs. B. F. Morris.

Bess Chapel.—On July 1st there was a meeting of the women called at the parsonage to organize a home mission society. The society was organized with the following officers:

Mrs. J. C. Beam, president; Mrs. D. H. Bess, vice president; Mrs. T. L. Beam, 2nd vice president; Miss Virgie Beam, recording secretary; Mrs. Blanch Heafner, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Z. M. Dellinger, treasurer.

We hope to have a lively society, one that will do things.

Rev. E. A. Bingham is conducting a Bible class at the church, more especially for the children, but all are invited to attend. Bro. Bingham is a consecrated man and we feel he is doing good for our community; he has about 60 members enrolled in the Bible class.

Prof. H. C. Jenks will begin a singing school for the community July 21st. We have a number of bright little children in our Sunday school that are splendid singers already.

Bro. Bingham held a service at Bro. J. C. Tower's on the 19th of the present month. Brother Tower has been an active member at Bess' Chapel, but is confined to his room, has not walked for over a year. Prof. Jenks sang some old-time songs and Bro. Tower seemed very greatly pleased with the service.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

July 8, 1925, Mrs. Lydia Glasgow Barnes passed away in her home near Littleton, N. C., aged 82 years. About 57 years ago she was married to Mr. George L. Barnes, and to this union was born one son, Mr. George Barnes, Jr., of Newport News, Virginia, and three daughters; Mrs. Laura Powers and Miss Fannie Barnes of Littleton, N. C., and Mrs. Birdie Butts who preceded her mother to the glory world.

Sister Barnes was converted and joined Corinth M. P. Church when quite a child and was a faithful and devoted Christian all her life. Her sweet, jovial disposition made her a favorite among all, young and old. All who knew her loved her. The writer has known her for about four years and visited in her home often, and while she was afflicted and very feeble much of the time, she manifested a sweet spirit all the while. She was her pastor's friend and it was a benediction for any pastor to know her and be in her presence, and we have no doubt that every pastor who served Littleton charge during her day remembers her pleasantly.

July 9, 4:30 o'clock P. M., funeral service was held at Corinth Church by her pastor, assisted by Rev. R. C. Stubbins of Enfield, N. C., and Rev. Francis Joyner of Littleton, N. C. Her body was laid to rest in the shady burying ground at Corinth church and the mound that marked her resting place was covered with beautiful flowers which is evidence of the high esteem the people of the community had for her.

Her husband survives her but is quite feeble. He is fully resigned to the Lord's will. As we bade him goodbye on yesterday and noted how well he bore his trial it was so convincing of the power that our Saviour has to comfort those who have grief and sorrow, if they trust Him. He and all the bereaved family have the love and sympathy of the entire church and community. J. B. O'Briant.

July 9th, Mrs. Susan Jordan died in the home of her son, Louis Jordan, near Pleasant Hill, N. C. Mrs. Jordan had been sick for a year or more, was 80 years of age. Therefore her strength was not sufficient to build up and get well. Some time in her young days she was converted and joined the Methodist Protestant Church at Spring church. She in her last days told her son that she was ready to die, that she saw the way open and it was a beautiful road.

Funeral was held at the home of her son and then her body was taken to the old family burying ground near by and laid to rest. She leaves behind three sons, one daughter, seventeen grandchildren, and three great-grandchildren. The writer conducted the service. We were her pastor for years and she was our friend. May God richly bless the bereaved family. J. B. O'Briant.

—Dr. Daniel Poling succeeds Dr. F. E. Clark as president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. Dr. Poling is a man of force. How he will measure up in comparison with Dr. Clark in the peculiar position to which he has been called can be determined only by trial, but he enjoys the confidence of those who have known him long and well.

THE LITTLE STREETS.

"Tomorrow I'll do it," says Bennie.

"I will by and by," says Seth.

"Not now—pretty soon," says Jennie.

"In a minute," says little Beth.

O dear little people, remember

That, true as the stars in the sky,

The little streets to Tomorrow,

Pretty-Soon and By-and-By Lead, one and all,

As straight, they say,

As the King's Highway,

To the city of Not-at-all.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.

Two young men returning from a meeting where they had heard the Gospel, and had been warned of their danger in neglecting it, parted at the street corner, one saying to the other:

"I'll see you to-morrow night at the meeting."

The other, who was deeply convicted of sin, said:

"To-morrow is not ours, Jim."

The night following, Jim was carried to his lodgings dead, killed by a fall in the shipyard. "To-morrow" found him in the eternal world. There are no "to-morrows" with God.

"To-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your heart." To-day He calls:

"Come, for all things are now ready."

To-morrow is not yours: there is no certainty that you will be in life to-morrow. To-morrow's sun may shine upon your lifeless clay, your soul gone to its account. Be wise and settle the great matter of your eternal salvation, your relation to God and eternity, to-day.

To-day is God's day of grace, and your day of opportunity; to-morrow you may be beyond the reach of grace, and enduring God's righteous judgment.

"Behold now is the day of salvation." 2 Cor. 6: 2.

To reject it is to perish. To procrastinate and trifle with grace is to court eternal judgment.

SO BUSY.

A busy woman entered her own room as twilight shades were falling—went directly to her desk, turned on the light, and began to write. Page after page she wrote. The solitude became oppressive. She wheeled her chair around, and with a shock of joyful surprise looked squarely into the face of her dearest friend lying on the lounge at her side.

"Why, I didn't know you were here," she cried; "why didn't you speak to me?"

"Because you were so busy; you didn't speak to me."

So with Jesus—here all the time. The room is full of him, always ready to greet us with a smile—but we are so busy. But when the solitude grows oppressive we suddenly turn, and, lo! he is at our side. We speak to him and he speaks to us, and the soul's deepest yearnings are satisfied.—Selected.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

Last week we discussed some of the problems of our American cities. This discussion will be continued in this article. It is a surprise to most people to know that New York is more densely populated than London, Paris, or Rome, and that its density is rapidly increasing.

In 1910 there were 60,000 unattached women in New York below the professional standard, and large numbers in the professional classes. Night after night long lines of them move into the cabarets, the movies, and the theaters seeking diversion. The loneliness of the city is worse than that of the desert. Personality is lost. Life denied its proper expression must find an outlet. The city streets are pulpits for strange doctrines, and its studios are breeding places for new cults, old paganisms, and vice. Small wonder that some of these women go astray.

In the poorer quarters often whole families live in one room, there are no playgrounds for the children, no place for them to play except in the streets, and the juvenile courts are full of delinquents. It is hard for children to grow up into pure manhood and womanhood under conditions like these. High rents compel this over-crowding, poorly planned and poorly constructed tenements add to the unhappy situation and the result of it all is the city slum.

It is in the city that the social unrest has its strongest hold. The door for propaganda is open on every side. Street meetings, labor union meetings, and other occasions, offer an opportunity for the professional agitator to spread a message of discontent, which, however it may be justified at times, is often used to foment strife, develop discord and class hatred.

The American city is always in a state of flux. In New York City 88 per cent of the homes are rented; in the Borough of Manhattan (New York City proper) 97.1 per cent of all the homes are in rented properties. In the country as a whole there were 20,255,555 families in 1910, 46 per cent of whom owned their own homes. In a certain district in Chicago, 50 per cent of the population changes every six months. One pastor in New York, after serving in the same church for thirteen years reported that more than three thousand people had come into the church, and had withdrawn from its membership in that period.

Vice conditions are always worse in the city, than in the rural community. Here the forces of evil concentrate, organize, and commercialize the weakness and vicious inclinations of the people. This great government of the people, for the people, and by the people, had displayed its greatest weakness in dealing with the vicious habits of the people themselves. Not only must higher standards be established, but good laws must be enacted and enforced. It is reported that seven American cities are the most flagrant violators of the eighteenth amendment, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, and St. Louis. The Canadian "Backsliding" will make it more difficult for all the Lake cities, but the law was made to be obeyed, and it should be enforced to the letter. We shall discuss the challenge of the city next week.

A VALUABLE ECONOMIC LESSON

A young college boy was visiting me recently and I was pleased to learn of an experience which had taught him a most valuable lesson in economics, as valuable in fact, as anything he will learn during his last year in college.

At the beginning of his vacation period he took a job, selling women's aprons. He went from door to door. By working seven hours he found he could make $11 a day, notwithstanding his inexperience. At the end of two weeks he quit this job and took another, at a desk in an automobile factory, which paid $90 a month. He now had to work eight and a half hours a day.

"I could make more than twice as much money selling aprons," he explained, "but I couldn't stand it. Doors were slammed in my face, dogs were let loose on me. To make twenty sales I had to call at 200 homes."

This boy, in a few years may become an accountant, a writer or an engineer and make only half as much as another young man, who never went to college, but who is willing to go out every day and butt his head against the doors of hard-boiled buyers. Yet I do not think my young college friend will complain. Remembering his summer experience he will admit that the salesman is earning all he gets.

So with those who would like to write romances, and who envy the wages of bricklayers. A few days' experience at the trade might convince them that the bricklayer is worth what he is paid.

I was led to these observations by a paragraph of Emerson's, which I shall now reprint: "The only safe rule is found in the self-adjusting meter of demand and supply. Do not legislate. Meddle, and you snap the sinews with your sympathy laws. Give no bounties, make equal laws, secure life and property, and you need give no alms. Open the doors of opportunity to talent and virtue, and property will not be in bad hands. In a free and just commonwealth, property rushes from the idle and imbecile to the industrious, brave and persevering. Wherever there is failure, there is some giddiness, some superstition about luck, some step omitted, which Nature never pardons."

In Memoriam.

It was an accident sad beyond description that removed from our midst Mr. and Mrs. Wilkes Sykes. The whole town grieves for these two worthy citizens, snatched away in the prime of life, but most keenly are they missed in the church and Sunday school circles of the church of their choice, the Mebane M. P. Church.

Mrs. Sykes and I were members of the same class in Sunday school, and I can testify to her loyalty and faithfulness. It is here that I miss her and shall continue to miss her. I grieve for a friend and classmate gone, whom I shall see no more on earth. She cannot come back to us but—glorious thought—we can go to her! Therefore, let us set our eyes on things eternal and watch and pray, for we know not the day nor the hour when the summons shall come. Let us be also ready.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

ence if the reduction was everywhere proportional, including our sense of magnitude. But this biologist would reduce the living world to an invisible speck, and in that speck would be the wound-up power that would unwind itself and produce the world as it is being produced. The biologists of this school have gotten John Calvin beaten with his conception of the degrees held in the mind of God necessitating the unraveling of history just as it is and must be. There is so much uncertainty, so much ignorance about the origin of man, that it is rash to assume that you know much about it. I have no quarrel with the man who believes that man came by a process of evolution from inferior orders or species of being, though I may have little respect for his logical judgment. But when a man says that Jesus Christ was evolved from human nature, as Mr. Tittle does in his sermon, I take serious objection. This lowers the Christ whom I adore as the Son of God. Can God evolve out of man? Absurd. It is equally absurd to suppose that man could evolve out of the brute. From nothing, nothing comes. I used to know a woman who believed that worms are produced in apples by spontaneous generation. It did not trouble her at all. There are equally thoughtless evolutionists. The serious thing about evolution is its theological implications in the minds of many people. It perhaps does not matter so much what we think about man as it does what we think about God. It took God a long time to make Himself known to man in His unity. Men were prone to see gods many. In the present state of thought there may be little danger of lapsing into polytheism, but does not Mr. Tittle's sermon reveal the danger of falling into a fatal pantheism? Mr. Tittle says that God is more than the world, but does he not make it easier for others to reduce God to the dimensions of the material universe?

—Rev. W. F. Ashburn reports a fine meeting at Mt. Hermon. The meeting continued after he left to go to another appointment, some good brethren coming from Graham to continue the work. This seems to be a continuation of the work Mr. Ham did in Burlington and Graham in arousing laymen to greater activity.

—Rev. A. D. Shelton assisted pastor Reynolds last week at Pleasant Grove up to Saturday night. Such was the interest that Brother Reynolds phoned for Bro. Shelton to return this week and continue the meeting. Bro. Shelton went back on Tuesday.

—The W. H. M. S. of Calvary Church had a very pleasant meeting on Tuesday night at the home of Mrs. J. F. Williams. A number of friends were invited for a social hour after the business meeting which hour was enlivened with a number of comic recitations and some games. Dainty refreshments were served to all by Mrs. Williams. One feature of the meeting was the presentation to Miss Margaret Hartsel of $25. in gold as a token of the congregation's appreciation of her services as organist.

—The Board of Education had a meeting in Greensboro last Monday. The following members were present: Dr. F. R. Harris, Dr. W. R. Goley, Dr. T. M. Johnson, Prof. J. H. Allen, Rev. C. W. Bates, John Pickett, and the three members who reside in Greensboro. This board is carrying a very heavy responsibility for the college just now, one that every business man can appreciate.

—J. H. Bowman was one of the jurors in the Dayton, Tenn., trial, but not our Rev. J. H. Bowman.

—Dr. Spahr has returned from his vacation and is now actively engaged as pastor of Grace church.

—The walls of the new Grace church continue to rise, beginning to reveal the grace of the architect's design.

—Brother R. F. Williams, who was for years an undertaker, reached the conclusion that the principal cause of premature death is improper diet. Men have not yet learned what to eat nor how much. They eat what they ought not, and they eat too much of admissible food. He referred in a recent talk to Dr. Rankin's saying that the way to use a ham is to leave it hanging in the smokehouse and look at it once in a while—never cut or try to eat it.

—The sudden illness of Dr. Ira Landreth's wife which prevented his coming to the Young People's Conference terminated in her death. She was buried in Tennessee on June 25th.

—William Jennings Bryan died suddenly last Sunday afternoon. He ate a hearty dinner, remarked that he never felt better in his life, lay down for an after-dinner nap, and a few hours later was found dead in bed. Apoplexy was the cause assigned by physicians. The report of his death brought a shock to the world. He had just gone through the trial at Dayton, Tenn., and was preparing to continue the battle against the evolutionists. Fortunately he left ready for the press the speech that he would have made in the Dayton trial had there been occasion to hear it. This has now been given to the world through the newspapers and will no doubt help greatly in moulding the thought of those who will take Bryan's place in the further trials that will be necessary to dispose of this case. Some have tried to laugh Bryan off the witness stand because he was not a specialist in the natural sciences. While he was not that and did not claim to be, he was well qualified to sit in judgment on the reasoning employed by scientists to make their observations lend support to the evolutionary hypothesis. Bryan was quick to see the fallacy, the absurdity, the inconclusive character, of much that has been written. If evolution is true in the wide sense claimed for it, it certainly has been unfortunate in many of its advocates. The world owes Bryan a debt for calling attention to the weakness of the argument advanced for evolution. After his wide investigation of what has been written, he calls the evolutionary hypothesis "a million guesses strung together." Bryan was an orator rather than a great thinker, yet as a thinker he was a man of no mean ability. At his death he was one of the widest-known men in the world. Twenty years ago Judge Douglass of Greensboro remarked upon the amazing popularity of Bryan. He compared him with Henry Clay, saying that Clay was equally popular for a while, but his popularity soon began to wane, whereas Mr. Bryan's popularity continued, unabated. At his death he still remained one of the idols of the people. The people believed he was their friend. In political life he was a progressive, leading in the advocacy of a number of reforms. In the religious world he is to be classed with the conservatives. His legal training and his connection with the most conservative Presbyterian church help to explain his difficulty in keeping pace with progressive movements in the church. The Christian church believes in the Bible because the Christian church is alive. Mr. Bryan seemed to believe that the Christian church is alive because it believes in the Bible. It is too soon to take an accurate measure of the man, but certainly he was one of our greatest and best men, and the good he did will live after him.

CONCLUSION OF BRYAN'S SPEECH PREPARED FOR THE DAYTON JURY.

The world needs a savior more than it ever did before and there is only one "name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." It is this name that evolution degrades, for, carried to its logical conclusion, it robs Christ of the glory of a virgin birth, of the majesty of His deity and mission, and of the triumph of His resurrection. It also disputes the doctrine of the atonement.

It is for the jury to determine whether this attack upon the Christian religion shall be permitted in the public schools of Tennessee by teachers employed by the state and paid out of the public treasury. This case is no longer local; the defendant ceases to play an important part. The case has assumed the proportion of a battle royal between unbelief that attempt to speak through so-called science and the defenders of the Christian faith, speaking through the legislators of Tennessee. It is again a choice between God and Baal; it is also a renewal of the issue in Pilate's court. In that historic trial—the greatest in history—force, impersonated by Pilate, occupied the throne. Behind it was the Roman government, mistress of the world, and behind the Roman government were the legions of Rome. Before Pilate, stood Christ, the apostle of love. Force triumphed. They nailed him to the tree and those who stood around mocked and jeered and said, "He is dead." But from that day the power of Caesar waned and the power of Christ increased. In a few centuries the Roman government was gone and its legions forgotten; while the crucified and risen Lord has become the greatest fact in history and the growing figure of all time.

Again force and love meet face to face, and the question, "What shall I do with Jesus?" must be answered. A bloody, brutal doctrine—evolution—demands, as the rabble did nineteen hundred years ago, that He be crucified. That can not be the answer of this jury representing a Christian state and sworn to uphold the laws of Tennessee. Your answer will be heard throughout the world; it is eagerly awaited by a praying multitude. If the law is nullified, there will be rejoicing wherever God is repudiated, the Savior scoffed at and the Bible ridiculed. Every unbeliever of every kind and degree will be happy. If, on the other hand, the law is upheld and the religion of the school children protected, millions of Christians will call you blessed and, with hearts full of gratitude to God, will sing again that grand old song of triumph:

"Faith of our fathers, living still,
In spite of dungeon, fire and sword;
Oh, how our hearts beat high with joy,
When'er we hear the glorious word.
Faith of our fathers—holy faith:
We will be true to thee till death."

FOR HIS MOTHER'S SAKE.

The florist's boy had just swept some broken and withered flowers into the gutter when a ragged urchin darted across the street. He stooped over the pile of mangled flowers, and came upon a rose seemingly in better condition than the rest. But as he tenderly picked it up the petals fluttered to the ground leaving only the bare stalk in his hand.

He stood quite still, and his lips quivered perceptibly. The florist's boy who had been looking at him severely, felt that his face was softening. "What's the matter with you, anyway?" he asked.

The ragged little fellow choked as he answered: "It's for my mother. She's sick, and she can't eat nothing, and I thought if she'd a flower to smell it might make her feel better."

"Just you wait a minute," said the florist's boy as he disappeared. When he came out upon the sidewalk he held in his hand a beautiful half-opened rose, which he carefully wrapped in tissue-paper; then he said, "take that to your mother."—Selected.

BATTLING FOR THE BIBLE.

The following article from the Pentecostal Herald, by the Editor, Dr. W. C. Morrison, is so pertinent, so accurately and fearlessly descriptive of the situation as it is at the present time, I am glad to commend it to the readers of the Herald. The devil and his crowd are becoming defiant. It is the spirit of Anti-Christ, the "Man of Sin," the Lawless one. The same spirit that ridicules and defies the 18th. Amendment. Prating about liberty and freedom, when they themselves are the very embodiment of tyranny. J F. Dosier.

The interesting conflict between Christianity and infidelity becomes more intense at Dayton, Tenn. The line-up is very suggestive. No two men in the country could be more unlike than Darrow, the great criminal lawyer, and Bryan, a great Christian statesman.

The forces of good and evil, of faith and doubt, are falling into line in their proper places. The daily papers of this country are certainly not noted for the piety and devotion of their editors and reporters. You may count on most of them to stand for the things that are skeptical and worldly; a large per cent. of them have little understanding of true spirituality and are given to the ridicule of genuine salvation and will always champion interests of modern liberalism, and rally around the banner of skepticism. It is an interesting fact that motley mixtures of news reporters have gathered under the banner of evolution. Those Methodist ministers and college professors who are the disciples of Darwin and the champions of modern liberalism, certainly are not very select in their company; they find themselves associated with a very motley group of all sorts and sizes of infidels and skeptics.

The pastor of the M. E. church at Dayton, a Rev. H. G. Byrd, invited Rev. Charles Frances Potter, a Unitarian skeptic from New York, to speak on Evolution in his pulpit on Sunday morning, July 12. It seems that this preacher has lined up with the evolution forces. A large group of his members met and informed him that the Unitarian skeptic would not be permitted to speak in their pulpit. Thank God for some people with sense and religion enough to stand up and stand together for the Bible and their convictions.

We wish a host of church members throughout the nation would inform their pastors and the authorities that they have some rights, and the skeptical preachers will not be permitted to preach doctrines entirely contrary to the teachings of the Bible and the church in their pulpit. The people who build the churches and support the preachers have a right to say something about what shall be taught in their churches and what the men preach to whose support they contribute.

The reporter for the Cincinnati Enquirer says: "Another carpenter preacher was crucified upon the cross of fundamentalists' public opinion here today." He also tells us that Dr. Potter, the Unitarian skeptic from New York, sent a set of books to Rev. Mr. Byrd, inscribed, "to the bravest man I know." It is a little amusing to see how these skeptics are hunting for heroes and are ready to pay tribute to any cheap fellow who meets with any sort of opposition as he zealously sows the seeds of infidelity among the people.

Mr Byrd has shown no evidence of bravery, nor has he been crucified. He very unwisely and irreligiously, called for this Unitarian skeptic to preach in his pulpit on Sunday, and his congregation very wisely and properly refused to let him into the pulpit, upon which Mr. Byrd resigns his pulpit and says he will seek a position as an electrician. My guess is that he will find enthusiastic supporters among his skeptical friends, and they will try to make a hero of him and find him a place and support in the church. Why not join the Unitarians? No doubt they would make him good company. Of course, their skeptical cigaret-sucking reporter will throw dust into the air and call it persecution when devout people refuse to turn a Unitarian skeptic loose in their pulpit. I would God that a host of Methodist people of this same type at Dayton, Tenn., would tell a good many upstart preachers that they do not own the church, and shall not turn their pulpits over to Unitarian infidels.

CONDITIONS IN CHINA.

Concern has been expressed in some quarters as to conditions in China, especially if our work at Kalgan and the outlying sections have been affected, and it is deemed wise to indicate the situation as presented through various channels at this date, so as to allay apprehension on the part of our people.

It was to be expected that the large cities would be the first to feel the force of the agitation carried forward by inflamed students, and fanned by Soviet agencies, but nothing serious has developed at Kalgan.

On the other hand the latest news is reassuring as it indicates that the leaders and their followers in that section, beyond the great centers where trouble arose, and the fires of opposition to foreigners and Christian education burst forth, are calming down.

In the region dominated by Kalgan it has been called a patriotic movement, where Soviet elements have not operated as in other sections but it is feared that there may remain in many places a degree of distrust and dislike, as facts have been misrepresented to such an extent that the actions of foreigners are viewed as an insult or injury.

Considering the causes operating it is not surprising that Christian education should be assailed, and that meetings to protest against Christianity and the schools it supports should be held, and charge made that they tend to weaken the patriotism of the students, and make them subservient to the sinister designs of foreign nations, but that is the expression of gross ignorance or of wilful misrepresentation.

Under and back of all causes at work is a desire to "put religion in its place," in other words do away with it as far as possible.

There can be no compromise with such extremists, for they hold religion is a disintegrating force to the individual and the nation.

We have every reason to believe that it is the only force which ultimately unifies personality and enables a nation perfectly to realize itself, and for this reason, among others, we support mission schools to provide children of Christian communities with an education which is throughout distinctively Christian, and to teach and train heathen children to become followers of Christ and workers in the upbuilding of His Kingdom.

China is becoming more and more a united nation, the spirit of nationalism is rapidly growing, her great resources are being developed, the wrongs inflicted on her still rankle, her rights she is claiming ought to be recognized, she faces a new era in which a stable government is an essential and in which the character, abilities and resources of her people will yet lift her among the foremost nations of the earth.

Her most critical time is now, and never were the prayers, workers, money of God's people, and the good offices of our Government more needed to help her to the acceptance of Christianity, and to a full appreciation of America's purposes, friendship and help on her upward way.

Must Be Insistent.

The Union Board needs to have at once all the money contributed by our Sunday schools on Children's Day. Please send the offering to your annual conference treasurer, and state it is for foreign missions. If you hold it, you will embarrass the Union Board. It ought to have now all funds that were contributed for its work.

WHY I, A STUDENT, LIKE HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

Personally, I prefer High Point College to any other institution of this kind I have ever attended because, for one reason, it is so homelike. The student body was not so large that it prevented the students from knowing each other personally. The dormitory students, especially, learned to know each other well, and each is interested in the others as he is in a real sister or brother. Just as the members of a family help solve each other's problems, so the students, likewise, helped each other with their problems.

Not only was the contact between students very personal, but also that between faculty and students. In a large college this is not possible, but in one like High Point College this can be a great help to both students and faculty. The faculty here have helped many students with their personal problems. They help the students find their places in life and help them to select the courses that will meet the needs best. There is much that one can get from personal contact that he cannot learn from books, and this is true at High Point College where the faculty and students are so well acquainted.

In every college there are a few officers whom the students as a rule look upon as being hard to understand and not interested in the students. But in High Point College these officers, among whom are the President, Deans, and the Supervisor of the Dining Room, are, without a doubt, exceptional. Those officers in many colleges do not have the time or are not so inclined to give the students the attention that those at High Point gave us. They showed an unusual personal interest in the welfare of all the students.

Then, because they understand young people so well and wanted to share their joys and sorrows, they have done every thing they could for us, advising, encouraging, and in-iring many times. Indeed they have made happy many times. A great variety of courses is offered to e students, and I think it is a very great umber for a new college. There are eeven oups from which one may choose his mar-. During a student's college career here e can find many subjects to take which he ll thoroughly enjoy. The faculty members ve made their work so interesting and prac-al that we cannot help but wish we could ke many more courses than it is possible to ke.

The outside organizations of the students re not numerous this year but were those at the young people most need. Valuableles- on of co-operation, obedience, and participa- on were learned while the students were be- g trained for workers or leaders One out- ide activity or course that the students want- l and which proved very beneficial to the udents was the one of social leadership un- der the direction of the athletic coach. Those ho took advantage of this course feel that ey are better able to direct the social life of e community.

The College is living up to its motto, "Noth- ing Without Divine Guidance," placed its stu- dents in a religious atmosphere. Every move- ment that was put forward was for the devel- opment of the students in a religious way. So ow could we, as students, fail to like High- point College, an ideal place of learning?

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

Hurrah for Concord and Henderson. These churches responded immediately to our appeal or free will offerings to aid us in our efforts o meet the first refunding payment on the efferson Standard loan. Concord sent us $145. 00, Henderson sent us $105.00 Let others fol- ow this lead. Such response helps greatly. We re expecting good results from other churches a the near future.

We are busy at the college registering new udents, laying out walks and drives on the ounds, putting new equipment and in many ther ways getting ready for the students who ill be coming in September the fifteenth. We re not taking a vacation this summer, ours, ill be taken next year; but we are encouraged ith the responses from both pasture and peo- le in our campaign for students and for unds. We are getting inquiries as far north as ichigan and as far south as Louisiana. You an see that already High Point College is be- coming known. We had some visitors from ilmington, Del., a few days ago and today e had a little visit from Rev. Mr. Shell from eaver Falls, Pa.; they were passing but came o look over the buildings. The most unstint- d praise comes from all visitors.

The Reidsville Sunday school picnicing at he Home made a visit to the college recently nd today several cars from Saxapahaw harge, Salem Church S. S. desiring to picnic topped at the college. We have a table for the ining and a spring with good water, shade nd room for cars. And with all this you are ordially welcome. The college is yours, we ant you to visit us whenever you are in the omunity.

Faternally yours,
R. M. Andrews.

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT.

Mrs. J. M. Stone, Editor.

Members of the Home Missionary Society of Grace church, together with their husbands and friends, motored out to the Odell Club House last Tuesday evening. The regular monthly meeting was a most enjoyable occa- sion; first came the bountiful picnic supper where there was an abundance of everything good to eat and friends exchanged greetings. Later we heard lovely music inside the Club rooms, so everybody went in to listen to this charming music by an orchestra of young men from the city who were kind enough to go out to entertain us.

Then came time for the meeting to be called to order. Our President, Mrs. Millikan, took charge and dispatched business in her usual clever way. Dr. Spahr led the devotionals.

Reports from all the chairmen of the circles were called for. Miss Annie Jobe pleased all with a beautiful solo, after which the principal address of the evening was heard. This was by Mrs. W. C. Hammer, of Asheboro, our beloved State President. She spoke interestingly of our various Home Mission activities and told of the progress so noticeable along all lines.

Mrs. Hammer explained the present needs of the school at Pine Ridge, Ky. This school must have a high school building since they have outgrown present quarters. All Method- ist Protestants in North Carolina are asked to help Dr. Woodford by giving to this cause.

We were happy in having Mrs. Hammer with us at this meeting. She always adds in- spiration and her talk to us was very helpful.

Next on the program was a talk by Mrs. C. L. Whitaker, the Secretary of Education, who urged us to remember to contribute to this fund the ten cents per member, which is a small thing for us to do but it can help some girl very materially in being educated for missionary work.

Then a reading was splendidly given by Mrs. Jarvis, of Norfolk, who was visiting Mrs. B. W. Terrell.

Mr. Bynum Clapp sang for us in his usual happy manner. He was accompanied by Miss Mary Clapp at the piano. We are always pleased to have Bynum and Mary with us.

The fun was saved for the last. There was a clipping party announced for the porch and much merriment prevailed in buying a bag which contained some article unknown to the purchaser until he opened the bag. For the benefit of any society that wishes to have a similar party may I explain here what the clipping party was? Buy anything you wish. Wrap it up in any way you like or put in a box so its identity is concealed in the paper bag. Put the price on the bag, then these bags are all tied to a clothes line, ready for sale. Get everybody you can to give a bag. The price must be the real value of the article. If you get material and make some article or do embroidery work fix a suitable price. A nice sum was realized, and heaps of fun. The buyer paid the price, clipped the string, and proceeded to see what the purchase was. Great anxiety to see what that bag held!

The meeting was a great success. Just try combining the picnic with your regular meet- ing during a hot month, you will have better attendance.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES FOR SUNDAY, AUGUST 9.

The Benefits of Wholesome Play.

Daily Readings.

Mon. Health. 1 Tim. 4:8, 9.
Tues. Self-control. 1 Cor. 9:19-27.
Wed. Team-work. 1 Cor. 3:1-9.
Thurs. Friendship. Prov. 18:24.
Fri. Joy. Isa. 65:17-25.
Sat. Fellowship. 1 John 1:1-10.
Sunday. Topic. Mark 6:31, 32; Luke 2:52.

Some Bible Hints.

"Come ye yourselves." We need to sepa- rate ourselves from the business of life that we may be refreshed (v. 31).

Play is rest, if it is not too strenuous. It changes the current of thought and action, and makes for health (v. 31.)

A little boating excursion would do most of us good, for its quiet, its solitude, its relief from strain of toil (v. 32).

Jesus, a healthy boy, not only played, but enjoyed play. Play is a part of God's plan for the making of strong bodies (v. 52).

Suggestive Thoughts.

We must be players and not mere specta- tors if we are to benefit from play. We do not need to be "stars" to be helped by recreation.

Youth is the time in which to store up health and vigor for the later strain of life. Play helps in both directions; and that is one aim of it.

Play teaches us team work. No one plays "solitaire" in the arena of life. We must play with others, and rub off our rough corners, if we want to win the game of life.

Play shows us that to win we must not only practise hard but also play hard. Victory comes in every line only when we exert our powers to the utmost. The boy that learns that on the playground will not forget it in business.

A Social Meeting.

Ask the young people to come and bring their friends to a dignified fellowship hour preceding the regular prayer-meeting. Re- freshments may be served if deemed wise. In- stead of opening the meeting in the usual man- ner, ask all to gather around the piano for the song service. Appoint a "Shake 'Em Out" Committee to shake hands with every one at the close of the meeting.

Lessons in Actual Life.

Recreation is the main purpose of whole- some play for young and old alike. This word means just what it says, to re-create. Our bod- ies run down through strenuous work, our minds become tired, our spirits become de- pressed; and these all must be created over again. If they are not, something will snap, and probably a breakdown will result.

Idleness is not recuperation. We rebuild ourselves by activity, different from that in which we are usually engaged. Our minds must be shifted, our bodies directed to some- thing different, so other muscles and nerves will be employed, and the activities carried on in such a way as to cause us to forget our usual occupation.

There are times, however, when rest—just rest—is needed. A person engaged in stren- uous work should find a little time each day when he can relax, be quiet, get everything out of his mind so far as possible, and take it easy. If everybody would practice this, in our strenuous day, people would live longer and accomplish more.

"Twilight Leagues" for the playing of baseball, "Interchurch Leagues" for playing basket-ball, and other organizations in the name and under the influence of the church, have done much to encourage clean athletics in many towns and cities. Fair playing, under proper influences, will go a long way towards influencing our young people in the right direction.

In the summer-time tennis is a great game for many, and the physical exertion is such that anybody can engage in it. And a person playing it energetically will find plenty of exercise for his mind, and plenty of need for skill in his muscles. It has come to stay, and will always have a large and important part in our recreative life.

Endeavorers can accomplish a great deal during the summer, in many localities by offering themselves as supervisors of public playgrounds. Children in the cities, who have no other place to play, can gain great good from public playgrounds, but they must always be supervised. The playground is a great teacher of democracy in our country, if the influence surrounding it are right.

Social contacts through parties which have in them nothing objectionable are mighty helpful to young and old. We need the intercourse with others to make life worth living. Such things are not a waste of time, unless the things done are positively harmful. And Christians should be more careful of their influence than to engage in questionable affairs, such as dancing, card-playing, and the like.

Outdoor playing is much more beneficial than indoor. The fresh air, no matter what the season of the year, is invigorating and helpful to the entire man. Just a walk, sometimes, is of more value than anything else. Nature has many smiles for us, if we are looking for them. There is no premium upon God's fresh air, and we need to get plenty of it.

The Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Boy Scouts, the Girl Scouts, and other organizations which are surrounded by Christian influences and proper direction, have accomplished untold good along recreational lines. Always boosting wholesome play, yet always insisting upon honest and pure surroundings, they have helped Christianity mightily in this respect.

The summer camp has grown to be quite an institution in our country. Many boys and girls, who have no other vacation away from home, can save their money and go to camp. And they always come back built up in body, mind and spirit, and ready for school or work in the fall.

Things to Pray About.

1. Thank God for making us as He did, so that the physical, the mental and the spiritual have proper avenues of service.

2. Thank God for the improved methods of play for children, so they can improve their bodies as well as their minds.

3. Thank God for the privileges of play for grown folks, which enable them to keep their bodies fit.

4. Ask God to help you to see that both work and play should be carried on in a Christian manner.

5. Ask God to show us that play which is bad morally is not wholesome spiritually.

6. Ask God to help you to play games fair and square, to be good losers as well as good gainers.

The Church Should Direct the Play Life.

The church should have a program of recreation for young folks, because recreation is a part of the natural desire that should be satisfied. If the church leads youth will stay by it.

Play trains in self-control, initiative, and in leadership. It is a school of expression, training us by giving opportunity to do things.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

It is delightful to hear of the good revivals being held this summer. Again I call upon all readers of the Herald to be very much in prayer for the continued success of all the evangelistic meetings to be held in all the churches between now and conference.

Last Sunday it was my privilege to be at Midway Church on Haw River Charge, and at Bethany on Flat Rock Charge.

At Midway Brother Reed and his people were beginning revival services, and it was my privilege to preach the opening sermon to a very appreciative audience. This is the church of my childhood days, and I never have a more appreciative audience than here. Rev. C. E. Phillips was expected on Monday to help Bro. Reed in this meeting. We are trusting that they will have great results.

At Bethany they were holding Children's Day, and though this church is only about six miles from Midway, they had a splendid congregation, and it was a pleasure to preach to them. Pastor Trogon was announcing revival services for Bethany to begin on the second Sunday in August.

An Urgent Call.

An urgent call will be presented to every Methodist Protestant congregation within the Conference during the next few weeks. Those who have unpaid pledges to the college are being asked to pay up as much as possible by August 20th., and those who have paid and can pay some more are asked to do this, and those who have neither pledged nor paid are asked to pay something at this time. The immediate need is $15,000. It is hoped that this much and more will be paid in by Aug. 20th.

Don't lay this aside until you mail to Dr. R. M. Andrews, High Point, N. C., whatever amount you can send him for the college.

Be sure to give your name and address and church and charge. This will very greatly help in keeping the records.

Appointments.

August 1st. and 2nd. District Rally, Fair Grove church, Why Not charge.

August 4 to 7—Edwin, Halifax Charge.

Report is short this week, but every contributor has our many thanks. Faith in the many friends and kind people back of this institution helps us to look for larger and a greater number of offerings to follow.

E. G. Lowdermilk, Superintendent.

State Street, Lexington.—All our work is going forward at a very encouraging rate regardless of the hot weather, vacation time, etc.

Two new members were added to the church Sunday. When two others come in who are coming soon the membership will have doubled this conference year.

Sunday school and C. E. society also are alive and growing.

Next Sunday night the Children's Day program will be given.

We are all looking forward with delight to the coming of Mr. Lowdermilk with a class of children from the Home next Sunday morning. Our pastor will take his vacation next month. We will all miss his good sermons and the cheerful helpfulness of him and Mrs. Bethea while they are away, but are glad for them to have a well deserved rest.

The new bulletin board is attracting much favorable comment from passers-by in general. One gentleman remarked recently that Mr. Bethea was preaching some fine sermons on that board, and it is quite true, for some new and helpful thought is suggested on it almost every day.

July 28, 1925.

Mitchell's Grove, Guilford Circuit.—We were delighted to have Rev. A. G. Dixon and wife with us fourth Sunday night. Mrs. Dixon preached a splendid sermon, after which she talked about the circuit rally which will be 13th of August and we sincerely hope every one will help to make this a success. To do that the entire circuit must do their best. Shall we not hold up the banner of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ to help not only our own lives but that the unsaved may be helped and that we may attract their attention to a higher plane of living? We believe one great fault in our church is that we do not advertise the church work by talking up the church work. If we enjoy the church so much, then why do we not talk about it more? Let us talk much about the work and especially tell the people about this rally. Brother Whitaker and Mitchells Grove invited the Children's Home to join us and we think they will be glad to go and also take some part in the rally. We hope to have a great time. Let us all go and get together and become better acquainted with each other.

Second Sunday at 11 o'clock our pastor preached a good sermon, telling us we could do all things with Christ to strengthen us. We must go on until we shall, we trust, come to perfection and not become weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.

We now will say a few more words about the rally. We hope the committee will see or write Mrs. Dixon about your plans and have everything ready for a good time. We also will take the privilege of inviting all our former pastors to come and spend the day with us. You all know who you are, so come on and you will be welcome.

Martha Parsons.

Pleasant Grove.—The Sunday school is progressing nicely. The school is going on a picnic July 30, to the Yadkin river. We are expecting everybody to have a nice time.

The Christian Endeavor Society meets every Friday night. They are going to put on a campaign for new members.

The third quarterly conference meets with Pleasant Grove Thursday night; hoping for a good attendance and good reports.

The Ladies' Aid Society will have their regular monthly meeting August 5, at the home of Mrs. Shelley Murphy in High Point.

The special meeting closed Wednesday night, July 22. Brother Shelton arrived Sunday night, July 12. He went home on Saturday night and Doctor Brown from High Point with Brother Reynolds did the preaching while he was gone. Brother Shelton returned on Tuesday and stayed until the close of the meeting. We had a great meeting and the church was greatly revived, with 19 conversions and reclamations from whom twelve joined the church. We greatly appreciate having Doctor Brown and Brother Shelton with us; we hope to have them with us again.

Walter Burton. Reporter.

High Point.—A pretty wedding was solemnized in the First Church on Monday, July 20 at seven o'clock A. M., when Miss Lucy C. Oakes and Mr. Leigh J. Harper plighted their troth in the presence of relatives and a few intimate friends. The church was beautifully decorated with ferns and tall baskets of gladioli and trailing ivy. Immediately preceding the ceremony, Miss Elizabeth Oakes, sister of the bride, sang "Because," accompanied on the pipe organ by Miss Elizabeth Welch. "To a Wild Rose" was softly played during the ceremony. The groom and his bride entered together, while the beautiful Lohengrin's Wedding March was played. Dr. George R. Brown, the bride's pastor, was the officiating minister, and read the impressive ceremony which united the hearts and lives of the young pair. Mendelssohn's March was used as a recessional. The bride wore a handsome model of amber with accessories to correspond and carried a prayer book used by the family for generations. Her only ornament was a platinum bar pin, the gift of the groom. The bride is the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. U. Oakes, and was reared here, the family moving to High Point from Yadkin College, Davidson county. She is a most attractive and popular young lady, possessing a large circle of friends who will be interested to learn of her marriage. The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Harper of Conway, S. C., and has made many friends since coming to High Point two years ago. The happy couple left after the ceremony on the "Crescent Limited" for southern points, and upon their return will reside for the present with the parents of the bride, M. and Mrs. H. U. Oakes, on Euniss street. The hearty congratulations and good wishes of a host of friends are extended to this popular young couple.

The third quarterly conference was held last Wednesday evening in the Sunday school assembly room with a goodly number of official members present. Dr. Brown presided, and gave his quarterly report, showing active progress along all lines of church work. We have been unusually favored with fine sermons by visiting ministers in June. Dr. R. L. Shipley of Salisbury, Md., delivered the first commencement sermon of High Point College, and Dr. H. L. Elderdice of the Westminster Theological Seminary and Rev. Mr. Baylis, president Illinois Conference, occupied the pulpit during the Young People's Summer Conference. Mr. R. H. Shaw, Superintendent of the Sunday school, reported a substantial increase in collections, although the attendance during the summer months has fallen off, owing to the heat and the absence of the College students. Mr. Ralph Vance is the newly elected president of the Christian Endeavor society, Miss Mary Sheppard, who has served faithfully for three years, having resigned. Mrs. C. L. Gray, treasurer Ladies' Aid society, reported a substantial balance in treasury after making some repairs and improvements at the parsonage. Mrs. W. P. Pickett, treasurer Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and Mrs. R. T. Pickens, secretary-treasurer Home Missionary Society, reported that all meetings have been held, some new members have been added, and money for the various interests is being collected and sent in regularly. Money for a scholarship in the College and for the new school building at Pine Ridge, Ky., is being subscribed and paid. An increased effort to organize the young people and children of the church for missionary work is being made, notably by Mrs. R. M. Andrews, who has organized a Junior Mission Circle of 16 boys and girls between the ages of six and 12 years. Mr. A. M. Rankin, Sr., made his report as treasurer of the board of stewards, and Mr. J. S. Pickett as treasurer of building fund, both of which were gratifying and encouraging.

As is our custom, following quarterly conference, the celebration of the Lord's Supper was observed Sunday morning, and a large number joined in the sweet and solemn communion.

Last Tuesday evening the members of the Men's Club motored to Tar Heel Inn, and held a delightful meeting with Dr. Spahr and the Men's Club of Grace church, Greensboro, as honored guests. Dr. S. S. Coe was in charge of the barbecue, and proved himself to be unusually expert in this line.

It is a singular coincidence that the first funeral held in the new church, which was that of Mrs. J. M. Sechrest, occurred on Saturday afternoon, July 18, and on the following Monday morning, July 20, the first marriage was solemnized, that of Mr. Harper and Miss Lucy Oakes. Thus joy and sorrow are closely mingled in this life.

We regret to note that Mrs. George T. Penny is in the Guilford General Hospital, where she is taking treatments. The best wishes and prayers of a countless number of friends are expressed for her early recovery and restoration to vigorous health. She and Mr. Penny have lately returned from Cleveland, Ohio.

Mayor and Mrs. H. A. Moffitt will leave today for a business and pleasure trip to New York and points in Canada.

Mrs. Weaver M. Marr and two children, Master Weaver, Jr., and little Miss Helen, arrived last Friday from Jacksonville, Fla., for a visit to her parents, Dr. and Mrs. George R. Brown, at the parsonage. Mr. Marr will follow later.

Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Shields spent Sunday in Greensboro with relatives.

Miss Lucille Pickens has returned from summer school at N. C. C. W., Greensboro, and has as her guest Miss Pauline Moore of Wadesboro.

Wyatt A. Pickens went to Washington city last week on business connected with the Pan American Highway Commission.

Mrs. Minnie P. Harrell, who is spending the summer in Tampa, Fla., will not return until the latter part of August. Reporter.

Bethel, Alamance Circuit.—Burlington Federation came to Bethel June the 30th and held a series of meetings at night lasting 15 nights. The church and surrounding country were much revived. Seventy-one were converted during the meeting and two in the Sunday school.

We appreciate very much the untiring efforts of the Burlington Federation and hope they will come again. We are going to organize a Federation at Bethel.

We had Children's Day the third Sunday in July, embracing the morning service. The children did well, rendering a very interesting program. Collection amounted to something over $14. Brother Holmes gave us an excellent sermon in the afternoon. Doors of the church were opened and we are so glad to welcome those who joined. Are expecting more to join soon.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE AND STUDENT ACTIVITIES.

College has a certain high class inspiring life for young men and women to share. This is the reason the youth is so enriched by college experience though bare knowledge and information won there may be, in many cases, poorly remembered. College is a life. And the student goes to college to share and live that life. Hence it is a process, not only of learning facts, but a process of growing—of becoming matured and seasoned; cultured. The educator, Munroe wrote: "The question to be asked after any educational step is not 'What has the student learned?', but What has the student become?'. To aid the young in "becoming" is the work of college. Education is more than head-filling material. It is, as the name suggests, a growing liberalizing, socializing, refining, cultural life, separated from the engrossing affairs of the highly mixed worldly environment.

At High Point College you will find this life. It is a life of consistent work, recreation and development. I have made a rather close observation of class work and requirements at High Point with the conclusion that the work there is second to none. So, in the first place, we are certain the grade of instruction will not suffer in comparison with other institution.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the College is the best in the city of High Point. This is evidenced by the fact that the local society won the banner at the city union last year. Students enter into this religious organization with zest and spirit. Expression is given to the religious impulse freely; an experience which means spiritual satisfaction and the development of religious leadership.

Literary Societies hold an important place. It is usually so in a small college as compared with the big universities. At High Point there are two societies, one for the young men known as the Thalean, and the girl's society named Artimesian. These organizations have their own government and rules of order. They have debating, musical numbers, results of research work, reading, oratorical development and other fine upbuilding opportunities. Students love to do this type of work. In fact it takes on the nature of play in its interesting appeal.

Social life at college is wholesome, refining, above the courser inclinations of social temptations in the world at large. Friendships formed at college are both lasting and superior. Perhaps it would be well to say that often the companionship made in college days means more life happiness than all the time, cost and sacrifice could possibly have brought in any other direction. In college the whole group—your environment, is looking upward, strengthening your own ideals and stimulating that longing for the best in friendships. And from among the great number, the best—the soul's companion is found.

We ought to speak of athletics. Recreation is necessary. And spirited contests are necessary for the life of sports. This leads to the organization of teams to play the games. Sports are not encouraged at the expense of scholarship. But High Point College does provide the sports, and already the local teams have met the other regular colleges on the fields of friendly sport. Their record is splendid. In a very large sense High Point College has known no infancy, for during its very first season of existence it took a manly stand with the old schools of the state. Our collegiate banner is already unfurled and High Point College will march on in company with the other best schools of the land.

Next year there will be added attractions. A series of entertainments of musical and lecture numbers has been arranged. This lyceum will be welcomed by every one, and is open for all students of the college. Care has been exercised to secure only real artists to appear in this series.

A band will be organized also soon after the opening of the coming term. A college band has been termed "The Campus Joy" and surely it is so. Music makes glad the atmosphere. Free and frequent campus concerts will bring the note of gladness, making happy the college home.

There are other student activities filling the college life with constructiveness. There is the Life Recruits Band consisting of persons dedicating their lives to specific Christian aims. These students receive special instruction in their enterprise and find strength in the unity of the group. They exert a religious influence on the entire school life.

Outings, banquets, picnics, socials are given in sufficient numbers to foster fellowship with students and faculty. All is planned to contribute to the well ordered life. There is hard work at the college of course. But the delightful conditions under which it is done, and the inspiration, the friendly expressions, the romance of college days, make life there rich and expanding. The students of High Point College will tell you so. Just the other day one said: "I certainly love to live there." During the vacation another said: "O, I am wanting to get back."

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN...

The greatest challenge to the church of Jesus Christ in America today, is the rapidly developing American city. If America is to fulfill her place in God's plan she must save her cities unto righteousness.

The city is remarkably strong in people of active productive ages, and has relatively fewer children than old people. There is more life, more enterprise, more radicalism, more vice, and more crime, and more impulsiveness from many angles. These are the elements which make the city a greater force for good or for evil.

There is a story of a Christian mission worker, and an infidel, who were passing thru the slums of a city together. The infidel confidently said to the Christian, "Here is a place where the religion of Jesus Christ has failed." The ready response of the Christian was, "Here is a place where the gospel of Jesus Christ has not been tried."

There is the challenge presented by the poor of the city. The filthy slum, the dark tenement, the unsanitary factory, the long hours of toil, the lack of a living wage, the inability to pay doctors' bills—always higher in the city than in the country—the pessimistic outlook on the future, the poor and insufficient food, the lack of leisure, the flood of unemployment, the swift approach of age—God pity the city's poor! Many have forgotten how to smile. To many no hell is worse than the one in which they now live. What attraction does the polished, fictive sermon present to the poor of the city? But who need the gospel most? The rich who have everything that money can procure? Or the poor who have so little in the way of comfort and opportunity? Is it not time that special attention should be given to the poor? When John sent his disciples to Jesus to inquire as to his ministry, one of the signs of the Messiahship given was the fact that "the poor have the gospel preached unto them." But now what is the force of the story of the Fatherhood of God to their poor, starved bodies and souls. "Where is God when they ask, and 'What does He care?'? The poor do not have the gospel preached unto them.

The program of the churches has been that of an elaborated country church program. The membership and the ministry come mostly from the country. They think in terms of the country. They are alert and alive to the business requirements of the city, but in religious matters they think in terms of the needs of the people "back home." The approach to the foreigner has been weak, and in many cases positively unchristian. We have almost confessed by our actions that the gospel is only effective for the foreigner in his native land, and must be exported by missionary board or society, and that we have no obligation to him, or that our message is ineffective if he should come to America. When he moves into our community, we must go out, and if he comes in considerable numbers we take our church with us. There are many normal, genuine people of the city who are not being reached by the church. It is a fact that the workingman is not spiritual minded. Jesus was a carpenter. Most of the apostles were fishermen. Samson was a great fighter. That Peter, the fisherman, became a great evangelist and preacher, and that he received the same baptism of the Holy Spirit. We must not be content to allow the workingmen of the city to remain outside the church. He must be held to the church where he has not already broken, and brought back where there has been any sort of alienation.

We cannot save America and continue to neglect our American cities.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, AUGUST 2.The Epistle of James.

Lesson Text: James 1: 19-27.

Golden Text: James 1: 22.

The Central Truth: Religion is more than a good sentiment; it is purity of heart, correctness of life, and efficiency in service.

Scriptural Points.

1. The author of this epistle is supposed to be the brother of Jesus Christ, the one who presided over the council at Jerusalem and gave the decision as recorded in last Sunday's lesson.

2. His epistle has been called "The Gospel of Common Sense." It deals with practical Christianity. It is a string of precious gems of truth regarding the duty of daily conduct. It is didactic rather than doctrinal.

3. "Swift to hear." The religion of Jesus is the religion of the ear. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Keen anxiety to hear the truth is the first prerequisite of salvation. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

4. "Slow to speak." The tongue is an unruly member and must be held in check. Hasty, unwise, and corrupt speech reveals an undisciplined mind and an unregenerate heart. The tongue is the signpost of the soul.

5. "Slow to wrath." An ungodly temper is a most dangerous foe to correct conduct. It must be subdued and kept under control. For anger is the fire that consumes the moral acquisitions of the soul. Nought but the power of Christ can administer sufficient and complete control. "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath."

6. "The engrafted word." This is the gospel of Jesus Christ, which is the "power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." It imparts life from the dead.

7. "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only." Good information alone cannot save. Millions still "hold the truth in unrighteousness." Obedience to the commands and principles of the gospel is imperative. Full exercise of penitence, faith, and holy ideals will yield sweet experience, upright conduct, and immortal destiny.

8. "Not a forgetful hearer." Such is like the seed sown by the wayside, which were devoured by birds. Satan steals away the truth by means of a treacherous memory.

9. "Shall be blessed in his deed" or doing. This is the blessing of a good conscience,—"a conscience void of offense toward God and toward men."

10. "Seem to be religious." A religion of mere profession, "a form of godliness without the power," either to restrain the passions or direct the life. It is a vain religion, a hypocritical manifestation of commendable ideals. It is worse than vain, a standing falsehood before Almighty God.

11. "Pure religion and undefiled." A pure heart and a clean life sums up the apostle's ideal of real Christianity. In purity there is power to keep pure, "to keep himself unspotted from the world." And in purity there is impelling inclination to serve God and mankind.

Practical Points.

1. "Take heed how ye hear." "Take heed what ye hear." These are vital admonitions from the life of Jesus Christ. There is so much of immoral speech and literature in the world to poison the mind and heart that utmost care must be taken to avoid them. Soul poison is infinitely worse than bodily poison. The word of God is the safe food for the soul.

2. Keep the door of the lips. Allow no "filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness" to escape therefrom. "Keep thyself pure."

3. Christian morality is supremely important. It is the stream flowing from the fountain of a renewed heart. Worldly morality is the make-believe substitute that springs from a corrupt soul.

4. Soul purity is the work of the Holy Spirit. It enables its possessor to love God with all his heart and his neighbor as himself. "Blessed are the pure in heart."

The report for the week is good. Several moved up and this moved several down. Find yourself and see if you moved up or down.

I note from Mr. Staley's report that several Sunday schools have sent their Children's Day collection direct to Mr. Staley. I am sorry for this as I know you wanted it to count on the budget but for it to count on the General Conference budget it must go to Rev. S. W. Taylor, conference treasurer.

When money is collected for either budget please be prompt in sending it to Brother Taylor as it is greatly needed in the work.

Yours in His service, A. G. Dixon.

Shiloh, Randolph Charge.—Our pastor, Rev. A. O. Lindley, has regularly filled his appointments. We feel grateful in having such an inspiring leader. He comes to us with extra good sermons.

The annual Children's Day exercise was held yesterday at 11 o'clock. The church auditorium was well filled and many were not able to enter because of the limited seating capacity of the church. The following program was rendered: Song, "All the World is Singing"—choir. Prayer—Rev. A. O. Lindley. Welcome—Fay Johnson. "They Plead for Light"—Jewel Coble. Song, "Youthful Lives for Jesus"—choir. Favorite Missionary Hymns—class of girls. "Heed Christ's Command"—class of boys. Recitation—Nove Gale Jordan. "Little Workers"—Rose Staley. Quartet, "Since Jesus Came"—Kime, Garretts, Hinshaw (accompanied by F. Garrett). "Two Colors"—Rudy and Ruth Capps. "Flowers and Children"—class of girls. "Children's Day"—Mattie Jordan. "In Our Father's Keeping"—class of boys. Song, "Song of the Sowers"—choir. "What Are You Going to Do?"—Ethel Burrow. "Japanese Girls"—class of girls. "Gifts of the Kingdom"—Margaret Pickett. "Worth-while Work"—dialogue. Quartet, "The Land Beyond the Sea"—Kime, Garretts, Henderson (accompanied by F. Garrett). Recitation—Flavius Kime. Duet, "Face to Face"—Henderson and W. Garrett (accompanied by F. Garrett). Offering. Talk—pastor.

The children showed excellent training, due to Miss Whitaker, Miss Pickett, Mrs. Pickett and Mrs. Kime. The offering amounted to $40.

At 12:30 a picnic dinner was served on the church campus. This was one of the greatest events of the day.

We reassembled in the auditorium at 1:30. Mr. A. M. Fentriss, who has been teaching a singing school, had prepared to give the audience some good singing. The community class (Monett's) was present. The two classes sang together. Many quartets, choruses and duets were sung.

Our Christian Endeavor society has been a success. We meet at six o'clock each Sunday evening.

The special meeting begins the first Sunday in August.

The Junior and Senior classes have been collecting money for the College pledge, by giving a basket party and a lawn party.

We hope to begin work on the cemetery this week. It has been neglected for several months and is in great need of work.

A Reporter.

Bethany, Flat Rock Circuit.—Our work is still moving along nicely. Pastor Trogdon always brings inspiring sermons. We think he is the man for this work. The Sunday school attendance is increasing.

Sunday was a good day for us. At 11 o'clock we held Children's Day service. At two o'clock Dr. A. G. Dixon preached a most forceful sermon.

The special meeting and also Home-coming-Day begin here the second Sunday in August. We are hoping and praying for a good revival. We will welcome our friends and old acquaintances back home again.

Best wishes to the Herald. Reporter.

Martha Young Fry.

On Monday morning, July 20th, just as the first ray of sunshine shone upon the earth then it was that God called little Martha to join the angel band.

Martha was a bright, attractive child of four years and was the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Fry.

Funeral service was held Tuesday afternoon at Welch Memorial Church conducted by Rev. T. E. Pierce and J. H. Moton. Then the little body was laid to rest in Oakwood cemetery amid many floral designs.

Farewell, darling, thou hast left us and our hearts are sad and lone, but we know that Thou art dwelling with the savior and his own.

Thou we miss thee here, our darling, and there's nought can fill thy place we shall meet thee over yonder and again shall see thy face.

This sweet thought shall linger with us and shall make our pathway bright, we shall meet thee in that city where the savior is our light.

Oh how sweet the thought we'll meet thee over on the other shore where with angels we shall greet thee and shall dwell forevermore.

Mrs. C. R. Mickey.

Hollister, Halifax Charge.—We are still at work. Our Sunday school is progressing nicely. We held our Children's Day service fourth Sunday in June. Much credit is due to Misses Van Lee, Carrie Knight, and Lucille Williams for training the children. The program was well prepared and enjoyed by all. On Wednesday of last week we had our Sunday school picnic which was very much enjoyed. We sold icecream, lemonade and barbecue. We are trying to get our church clear of debt. It seems money is hard to get. It seems some people thing preachers can live on air. If some people thought as much of their preacher and church as they do of the dance hall I am sure they would do better.

Broter Spencer gave us another one of his helpful sermons yesterday. We enjoy hearing him preach, his sermons are so plain and helpful. May the good Lord be with him in all of his work. We are expecting a great revival in our church which will begin fourth Sunday in August. Let us all pray and work for it and I know our prayers will be answered.

We have bought gas lamps for the church so we are in hopes of having everything bright and shining. Will all please pray that the outpouring of the Spirit may be in our midst?

We were delighted some time ago to have Brother Bethea, his wife and little Vance back to see us. It always does us good to see their bright, smiling faces. Reporter.

July 27.

MY IMPRESSION OF HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

My impression High Point College is expressed in the word "High," not only in name but I think in all of the activities, the various organizations and the faculty. The best is always named last, the faculty could not have been better, they were liked by the whole student body.

The co-operation of the student body and faculty was splendid. Where there is co-operation a school, college or any organization will prosper. The splendid co-operation of the students in the Student Government Association made it possible for the students to have many privileges as a whole.

The deans, where could we find any better ones than Miss Mary Young, dean of women, and Rev. N. M. Harrison, Jr., dean of men? I think they are the finest and best Christian deans that our High Point College could get, no matter where we tried to get them. I do not think we would find any deans who would show as much interest and co-operate in the activities of the college as Miss Young and Rev. N. M. Harrison, Jr.

Dr. Andrews, our president, is fine. We could not have a president that is more interested in the growth of the College and show the personal interest toward the student body than Dr. Andrews.

The literary societies have been a great help to us, especially do I speak for the girls (Artemesian Society). The purpose of this organization was to promote literary ability and to afford entertainment for the members.

The Christian Endeavor society was a help to the students in knowing the students better and getting better acquainted with the great world-wide organization.

The buildings, Roberts Hall, Woman's Dormitory and McCulloch Dormitory, are all well equipped with modern and up-to-date equipment. The dining hall was one that we all liked to visit for there was always plenty of good eats for us. Mrs. Whitaker, wife of Dr. C. L. Whitaker, was supervisor of the dining hall.

I cannot begin to tell you all about our college activities, the various organizations and about the class work. If you are planning to go to college you cannot find a better one than High Point College. Be a loyal Methodist Protestant and support your own College by attending it. Come on to H. P. C.! You cannot find a better college to attend.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Jackson.

Alton Jackson, age 41, died July 14 and his body was laid to rest in New Salem cemetery the following day. Mr. Jackson had been in declining health for a long time. His church membership was at Level Cross. He leaves his devoted wife and eight children. The two oldest are sick at this writing. The going of Mr. Jackson was an intense shock to the community, and especially to the home. The bereaved family has our sympathy and deserves our prayers.

Wm. H. Neese.

In Memory of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Sykes.

Our whole community was first shocked, then grieved, and is still sad at the tragic death of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Sykes. It was vacation week for the men at the furniture factory. Mr. and Mrs. Sykes, their son Hubert, their daughter and son-in-law, Mrs. and Mr. A. H. Jobe, were starting for an outing at the seashore, when their automobile was struck by an incoming train at the station here. Mr. Sykes died in a few minutes and Mrs. Sykes in a few hours. The other members of the party were painfully bruised and scratched and shocked, but have practically recovered from their wounds.

The double funeral, the only one of the kind I ever participated in or witnessed, was conducted by the writer and Rev. T. A. and Rev. D. R. Williams. That the whole community was deeply moved was evidenced by the throng of people that filled the church and occupied the grounds around the church, enough to have filled the building several times over. That the community was deeply sympathetic was evidenced by the very large number of beautiful floral designs.

We read of and hear of fatalities by accident, but it is when it comes so close that it leaves you dazed for days to come. My own personal impression was intensified by the fact that Brother and Sister Sykes were attentive worshipers in our Sunday morning congregation, less than 24 hours before the fatal occurrence. I wondered and do now whether I would have conducted that service differently, whether or not I would have been more earnest, if I had known. On the church grounds some one said to Mr. Sykes, "Why, I thought you would have been well on your way to Norfolk by this time." "Not on Sunday," was his reply.

They both have been life-long Christians and consistent members of the Methodist Protestant Church, he a member of the Barata class in the Sunday school, and she of the Philathea. As neighbors and friends they were kind and accommodating. Brother Sykes, with others, left his work and came to help move my household goods from the depot into the parsonage, when I moved to Mebane as pastor. This without pay, just to help. Their going is distinct loss to our church and to the community.

Our hearts go out in deep sympathy for the family and loved ones, and up to Almighty God in prayer that He may comfort and keep them,

T. M. Johnson.

A RANGER TO THE RESCUE.

They were very sorry that Uncle Bob was going. He was such a kind fellow and always tipped his godson Dick half a crown on leaving. He gave Baby Clover nice things, too. Just the day before that of which I write, this noble uncle had visited a baker's shop, and to big Emmy, the eldest girl, he had given a packet of rock, and for Clover he had bought a plum cake all for her very own.

I am sure you would like your uncle to give you a cake for your very own, wouldn't you? Not many uncles would think of it. Clover was delighted; she was only five, and there were several plums in the cake, though not too many.

Uncle Bob's kindness had not ceased there. He had given to his brother, the children's father, a present of two lambs, which were to graze in the orchard. The children were all excitement over "This" and "That," as the lambs had been called.

When Uncle Bob left, the children's mother and father went up to London with him to spend a day, and Emmy, the Girl Guide daughter, aged twelve, was put in charge of eight-year-old Dick and little Clover. "Keep them happy and good, Emmy," her mother said, and Emmy felt responsible, I can tell you. Luckily it was a fine day, and Dickie went to the station and couldn't help hoping for the half-crown tip.

Then trouble began. It always seemed to when mother left. Emmy couldn't find Clover anywhere! At last she saw a glimpse of blue pinafore in the orchard. There stood Clover by the lambs, and the lambs were just finishing something she had given them.

"They liked the cake awfully," she said, turning up her round, rosy face to her big sister. I heard Uncle Bob tell daddy they must have a little cake; so I gave them all my plum cake what uncle gave me to show 'This' and 'That' how much I loved them!"

"Oh, my precious child, my naughty, silly one!" cried Emmy excitedly. "Uncle meant a special sort of cake that's used for feeding sheep. Not your lovely plum cake. Why, we were all going to have a last-summer picnic on the downs to eat it tomorrow." Emmy scolded, and poor Clover cried, and "This" and "That" looked approvingly at Clover, as they had really enjoyed the plum cake exceedingly.

While this was happening, Uncle Bob had, by mistake, drawn out a penny from his pocket to give to Dick instead of the usual half-crown. He never looked at it, and, of course, Dick didn't like to say anything.

But it was a bitter blow. He returned to the garden as cross as two sticks.

"What am I to do with them both?" sighed the elder sister. "None of the Girl Guide books tell you how to cheer disappointed children up!"

Emmy went indoors and left her brother and sister—just to think. She passed through the kitchen and told Elizabeth, the new young cook, what had happened. "They're both crying and squabbling," said Emmy, in despair. "They say nothing will make things right unless Clover gets a cake again and unless Dick gets a half-crown!" Elizabeth thought for a minute.

"See here, miss. This afternoon I shan't be very busy; we could make a little easy, home-made cake for the girlie. I'm sure the mistress wouldn't mind. I could show Miss Clover how to do it. And does Master Dick know anything about peppermint creams? I could show him how to make them. I've been going to do some myself for ages, as I promised some for the Guide sale sweet stall, and I've bought all the materials myself. I can make them this afternoon, and your little brother can have some, and we can make them the size of half-crowns!"

"Oh, what a glorious plan, Bessie! But you're too old to be a Guide."

"I'm a Ranger, Miss. A Ranger is an old Guide."

"Oh, how splendid! Did your leader tell you how to amuse children?"

"I've got a lot of brothers and sisters," answered Elizabeth, "and it's always being rubbed into us Rangers that we must be good to the little ones."

So that afternoon was spent happily after all. A simple cake was made, and Clover allowed to stir it herself. Peppermint creams were constructed, with white of egg and sifted sugar and peppermint essence. (Scrumptious!)

"And I have got a cake, and still dear 'This' and dear 'That' have had their cake," crowed Clover after tea in the orchard, watching the lambs peacefully resting in the October sunshine.

"And I have six peppermint half-crowns in a box," said Dickie cheerfully; "and Uncle Bob has got the half-crown he meant to give me, and no doubt is buying something for himself with it like a pipe, or things men do buy."

"I will be a Brownie and then a Guide and then a Ranger when I grow up," continued Clover, "just like clever Bessie, who thinks of everything, and just like Emmy, who rinds it we're sad."—Betty Nevill, in British Weekly.

MOTHER.

Mother of the smiling eyes,
Love-illumined, kindly wise,
Heaven's goodness shines straight through
Those clear orbs of softest blue;
To your deeply furrowed face
They impart an angel's grace.

Mother of the helping hand,
There are few in all the land
With so many friends and true;
Those who know you, love you too.
Poor folks, rich folks, all agree
You've a heart of sympathy.

Mother of the silver hair,
You have borne a weight of care,
But have never lost your zest
For the game of life, possessed
Of that gift of childhood joy
Which no hardship can destroy.

But, to sum it up, no other
Takes the place of you, our mother.

A BLACK BOY'S HEART.

They were the prettiest pair of ponies at the fair, and their groom was a Negro boy, who ran by their side as they went round and round the ring, obeying every word or motion of his. When they stopped before the grandstand, the ponies rubbed up to Cato as though they loved him.

"What is their price?" asked a horse dealer.

"Five hundred dollars," said Cato.

"Stuff and nonsense!" said the horse dealer. "I'll give three hundred dollars cash for them."

Cato shook his head; but though every one admired them, no one wanted to buy.

"There," said the horse dealer, "you see no one wants them. He will be glad to take my offer."

"Dey belong to my young missus, an' she ain't goin' to sell 'cept she get five hundred dollars for 'em," said Cato.

"Humph!" said the horse dealer. "A young girl owns them, does she? Well, if you will swear that one of them went lame I'll give you fifty dollars for yourself and will buy the ponies at three hundred dollars. You never had fifty dollars in your life, did you now?"

Cato gave such a start that the ponies started, too. Then looking up, he said, "Reck'n ye think dat 'cause de Lord give Cato a black skin he give him a black heart, too. 'Tain't so; he ain't goin' to blacken it dat way, nuther."

"Cato," said a gentleman standing by who had overheard the conversation, "why does your young mistress want to sell her ponies?"

"De plantation, it bound to be sold nex' week," he said, "if me and Miss Helen can't raise de money. Master, he got all but five hundred dollars, an' he took sick, an' de barn burn down. Dat. how come Miss Helen sell de ponies."

"Well," said the gentleman, "you take them back and tell her they are sold for five hundred dollars. My man will go with you and take the money. Tell her I am going to Europe for a year and would consider it a favor if she would use them while I am away. If she can buy them back when I return, I shall be very glad to sell them to her."

"If Cato ever kin serve you, Sir, he jes' boun' to do dat thing."

"You have done it already, Cato."

"What, sah? I ain't never seen yo' befo'."

"True, but you have given me an opportunity to help another in trouble. You gave it to me just now when I overheard you refuse to blacken your heart for that man's money."—Herald and Presbyter.

HOW RALPH GOT A BIBLE.

After Ralph had learned to read he longed for a Bible. He had heard a great deal about that good Book. His father read a passage aloud from it every day. His Sunday-school teacher said it was the best of all books. But Ralph's parents were quite poor, and in those days Bibles cost much more money than they do to-day. So the little boy did not get the Bible.

One day two strange men came to Ralph's house. They were riding horses from one city to another, for there were no automobiles and no trolley cars in those days. They were weary and hungry, and the next town was a long way off. So they stopped to ask for dinner for themselves and their horses.

As the men were eating they noticed that Ralph looked quite sad. One of them asked what he wished, and he said, "I want a Bible."

His mother said: "Never mind, Ralph. Don't fret, and next week I will take you to see George Washington."

One of the men was much pleased at hearing Ralph's answer, and said, "I hope, dear boy, that you will always be fond of the Bible."

A day or two later the postman brought Ralph a handsome Bible. On the flyleaf there was written, "From George Washington."

A few days later Ralph learned that one of the stangers to whom he talked that day was the kind-hearted George Washington.—Selected.

PAT AND PATTY TURN PLOWMEN.

"Come, Patty," said Pat. "Let's go out and watch Uncle Jim plow with the tractor. Maybe he'll give us a ride."

"I don't think I want to ride; it's too big and dirty—and—well, there is only room for one, besides Uncle Jim, to ride, anyway. You can ride and I'll walk behind."

"Pshaw! You're 'fraid. All you have to do is to stand by Uncle Jim and not fall off."

It was a self-guiding tractor, one wheel following along in the track made by the last furrow turned. So Uncle Jim knew that it would go to the end of the field without any help from anyone, and he got down and offered both a chance to ride.

"Be game," whispered Pat to Patty. And he quickly climbed up and mounted the seat. Patty meekly followed and stood beside him, hanging to the seat with both hands.

Uncle Jim showed Pat how to stop the tractor when he got to the end of the field, and then he started up the machine and let them go on alone. He got busy picking up some stones which the tractor had plowed out.

"How fine," said Pat, after they were nicely started; "to think that we are really doing the work of three grown men!"

"And six horses," added Patty, just beginning to enjoy her queer ride.

"You watch and see that the plows are going all right," said Pat, "while I drive."

Patty looked back and watched, and the furrows were just as straight as though Pat had plowed all his life, so she told him.

A robin was hopping along one of the furrows, picking up worms, and Patty wished that it would call two other robins to work in the other two furrows they were making.

All this time the tractor was chugging right along, just as if Pat were not up on the high seat as driver. The field that Uncle Jim was plowing was beside a field of wheat nearly half grown, and there was no fence between the two fields.

"We're most to the end," said Patty.

"Yes," said Pat, "I know it." He was now wondering to himself how Uncle Jim had said to stop the tractor. He had just forgotten and was afraid to do anything for fear it would be the wrong thing and would make the machine turn or back or r away or do something awful.

"Stop!" cried Patty. "You're running in the wheat."

"Whoa!" shouted Pat.

"You don't 'Whoa.' You do something the machine," warned Patty.

"For pity's sake, tell me what!" exclaimed Pat, now frightened.

"You press something," said Patty; "don't know what."

Pat pressed the first thing that came under his hand. It happened to be a part of the frame; so pressing did neither harm nor good, and the tractor chugged on as before.

"You're going through the wire fence at going to run over the cattle in the pasture," shouted Patty. "Dear! I'll never ride with you again."

"Stop us, stop us!" shouted Pat to Uncle Jim, seeing that something was bound to happen, for they were almost at the end of the wheat field, and he did not want to go through the wire fence and among the cattle any more than Patty did.

Uncle Jim, who had all the time been watching the runaways out of the corner of his eye, now ran and overtook them and stopped the machine just at the end of the wheat field. "It's all in knowing how," said, laughing as he moved the lever that stopped the tractor at once.

"We've spoiled your wheat, haven't we?" asked Pat as soon as he got straightened after his scare.

"I guess," said Uncle Jim, "that it will make a pretty good place for your popcorn. He added, with a twinkle in his eye, "You're not the first ones who have found it a great deal easier to start something big than stop it after it got started."—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

THREE GINGER CAKES.

Ella and Joey and Gene looked at each other in a worried sort of way. They were alone at home that day with only Katy in the kitchen.

"Katy says we may go to the picnic, but she can't cook anything for us to carry, because it's washing day," said Gene.

"Folks musn't go unless they can carry something to put on the long tables at dinner time," added Joey.

"Then let's take our ginger cakes," cried Ella. "That will be something. Anyway, it's all we've got."

Mother had given the children a penny apiece that morning before she went away. It was to spend as they pleased, so they had just bought three ginger cakes of the baker when he stopped with his cart at the back door.

"I'm glad we haven't taken one bite of them yet," said Ella. "Look, here's a dish to put them in, so we shan't forget and eat them up."

She put her own ginger cake in the bottom of the big dish, and the boys put theirs in, too. Then she set the dish as high as she could reach on a shelf, and they ran to get ready for the picnic. When they had found caps and sweaters, they put the ginger cakes in a paper bag and climbed on board the trolley car at the corner. On the car were ma-boys and girls from their own school, all going to the picnic.

Ella pulled Joey's sleeve, and Gene looked worried when they saw that every child was carrying a big basket.

"Every basket is packed full of good things to take to the picnic, and we haven't anything but these ginger cakes," whispered Ella.

"We can't go, that's all!" growled Joey. "We must get right off the car and make believe we hadn't started for any picnic."

Ella looked ready to cry at this, and Gene's lip drooped as he thought of all the fun they had expected to have at Oaktree Hollow. That was the place where the picnic was to be held, and Ted Loring had told him that there would be icecream for everybody, besides the good dinner.

"But it wouldn't be right to go and eat up other folks' good things when we've only these to give toward the dinner," whispered Ella, hiding the little bag of cakes under her sweater.

So before the car came to Oaktree Hollow the three children slipped off and sat down by the side of the road, while all the others, with well-filled baskets, went on to the picnic.

"We shall have a picnic of our own and eat our ginger cakes right here," said Joey, sitting down in the shade of a tree.

"I don't call that a picnic," grumbled Gene; but he took a big bite of his cake and kicked his heels in the air as if he liked it.

They had just eaten their cakes when they saw a woman waving her hand at them from a garden near by. When they ran to see what she wanted, they found her standing in front of a tall trellis, where great bunches of ripe grapes were hanging down.

"I'm too lame to climb the ladder to pick the bunches at the top," she told them. "If you children will pick them for me, I will pay you for it."

When they had picked all the grapes, there was a great heap of the beautiful, sweet fruit on the grass at the foot of the trellis. Joey looked at it as he came down the ladder. Nobody would have anything nicer to carry to the picnic than those grapes.

"Would you let us take our pay in grapes instead of money?" he asked.

"To be sure I will, and lend you a basket to carry them in," agreed the woman.

They explained about the picnic as she filled the big basket with the sweet fruit. Oaktree Hollow was not far away, and they carried the basket between them, stopping only twice to rest. Their teacher, Miss Wells, spied them as they came tugging that big basket of grapes down into the Hollow.

"Why, you children have brought something that's nicest of all," she said. "Sit right right down here, and I'll bring you some ice cream."

Joey looked at his brother and sister as they began on those big dishes of ice cream. "Let's never tell how we started for the picnic with only three ginger cakes."—Selected.

WHAT THE TEAPOT SAID.

By Alice Garland Steele.

Dorothy shifted uneasily in her chair. She knew she had been naughty, but, nevertheless, the punishment was hard to bear. Here she was in the "big room" at grandma's, with all the shadowy corners and queer, foreign-looking things around her, and she must stay among them a whole long hour, without a soul to speak to or anything to think about—that is, thoughts that were nice; there were plenty of disagreeable ones. She remembered how cross she had been at the breakfast table that morning, because Aunt Mary wouldn't let her have the banana that would surely have made her ill; she recalled how she had pulled the cat's tail and teased the goldfishes with Uncle Dan's paper cutter, just to see if they could squeal like mice and guinea pigs; she thought how she had found grandma's knitting on the table, and when no one was looking had pulled the thread of scarlet wool just a tiny mite, and it went so funny, and was all so crinkled, and the mitten kept growing so much smaller that she had not thought how wrong it was until after the deed was done, and the poor mitten lay a heap of bright red worsted at her feet. Dear me! how could she have been so heedless! Grandma hadn't said a word, but just looked over her spectacles with such sad old eyes that it almost made Dorothy cry, and then Aunt Mary had led her into the "big room" and told her she must stay there until she was sorry for her naughtiness and was willing to ask grandma's pardon. Dorothy tossed her curly head at this.

"Hump," she just wouldn't 'pologize, 'cause it wasn't really naughty at all, only mischievous; anyhow, that's what Uncle Dan said." "Bless the child, she's just mischievous!" Dorothy didn't know what the word meant, but she guessed Uncle Dan loved her too much to say anything about her that wasn't nice.

She settled back in the great, stiff rocker, and knocked her little shoes impatiently saying over and over, "I won't 'pologize; I won't, so there!"

"I won't; no, I won't!" Gracious! Who was repeating her own words so sharply? She looked around her fearfully, half expecting to see Aunt Mary coming to scold her again.

"I won't; no, I won't!" Why, it was—yes, surely it was the little China matchgirl on the mantelpiece talking to the Dresden teapot by her side! Dorothy sat up very straight and listened with all her might.

"But you know you really ought to," said the teapot calmly, moving a little bit nearer to its companion, "because it is right, and what's right is korrek—spelt with a K for emphasis."

The match-girl shrugged her shoulders. "I tell you I won't," she said decidedly, "and I don't care for your advice, either."

The teapot looked stern. "Don't Care" got hung," it remarked severely, "and as for my advice, I have a right to give it, because I am a good many years older than you, my dear. If you will remember, I originally came from Dresden, and that was over a century ago."

The little match-girl hung her head. "You are cracked," she said, "and so you ain't worth anything; why, there's a big nick in your spout."

"Who did it?" asked the teapot in a low, distinct tone.

Dorothy trembled. She knew who had done it. It was herself, when she had played party one day, and taken the teapot without asking permission.

"Well, never mind," the teapot went on, "but it was unkind to treat me so carelessly, I think."

The match-girl looked around her. Somebody has been very naughty again to-day," she said, "and I shouldn't like her any more."

"Why, dear, do not cherish unkind feelings in your heart against anyone!" and the teapot looked very wise.

"But don't you think it was wrong of her?" asked the match-girl quickly.

"To be sure, it was unpardonable to tease those poor little goldfishes so; one of them told me, confidentially, that he had no idea a little girl that had such pretty yellow curls and soft blue eyes could be so cruel."

"Yes," said the match-girl, "if she doesn't look out her eyes will be all lined with temper."

Dorothy shivered, but she seemed glued to her seat and dared not say a word.

"And her poor grandmother is so good to her, too. Do you know that very pair of mittens that she ripped was for the little girl's Christmas?" The teapot nodded its head, and Dorothy's face grew very sober, indeed.

"Do you think she'll say she's sorry?" asked the match-girl anxiously.

The teapot thought a moment. "I just heard her say she wouldn't," it answered slowly; "no, she is too naughty; she will not apologize."

"O dear, I will, I will—right now, this minute!" and Dorothy jumped from her chair and ran to the door with a sob. She pushed it open, and hurried along the hall till she got to the sitting room; then she paused an instant.

There was grandma, sitting before the cheerful open fire with her lace cap on her dear old gray head, and her wrinkled fingers patiently picking up the stitches and knitting away at Dorothy's red mitten.

"Grandma, grandma, I've come to 'pologize; I'm so sorry, and I'll never do it again—never!"

Grandma stooped down tenderly and, dropping the mitten, drew the tumbled curly head against her knee.

"Dear, dear pet, I know you won't; there, don't cry, and give your old grandma a kiss, Dorothy dimples!"

Dorothy lifted up her tear-stained little face. "Have you gorgived me?" she whispered pleadingly.

Grandma's hand stood over the bright head and rested there like a benediction.

"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive others," she murmured brokenly, and though Dorothy hardly understood it, she knew by the caress that she was forgiven.

That night she stole into the "big room" a minute before she went to bed, and she heard the teapot say to the little China match-girl: "There! she says she is gorgived and now always, and, do you know, I really think she will."—Selected.

ANSWER TO LAST WEEK'S PUZZLE.

Mocksville.—The work here seems to be moving along nicely. We are having large congregations at our regular appointments. The Sunday schools are holding up well for the summer months.

Our revival meeting at Elbaville was a great meeting. Brother Braswell was with us and did a good work. We were glad to see him at himself again. To hear him preach, one would hardly think that he had been so near death's door, for his sermons are just as interesting as they were ten years ago, or more so because of his experiences. There were about 30 professions of faith in Christ and nine new members were received as a result of the meeting; a number of others have not joined the church yet. Brother Braswell will not soon be forgotten at this place and will be welcomed back any time that he can come our way.

Union Chapel Sunday school won the Davie county Sunday School Association banner this year. We are indeed proud of this Sunday school; the average attendance for this month was 118. The Sunday school report from the various churches on the charge is as follows: Union Chapel—present 120, offering $1.55; Bethel—present 101, offering $2.33; Elbaville—present 72, offering 74c; Dulins—present 62, offering 38c.

Mocksville is moving to the front in many ways. It is our purpose to play second to none.

J. T. Sisk, Pastor.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Fairfield, Guilford Ct.—Just closed a good meeting. Rev. D. R. Williams was the help, coming for the first service Sunday, July 19, at 11 o'clock, continuing to the close. Congregations were good from the beginning, getting better as the days went by. Some renewed their covenant, some began a new life. About twenty all together. Ten united with the church. Many old friends came to hear Bro. Williams. Many new ones were added. All thank him for his earnestness and faithfulness. And want him to come again.

C. H. Whitaker.

Orange Charge.—The 3rd. quarterly Conference met at Hebron church Sat., July 25th. Each church was represented. The business was transacted harmoniously.

The Conference approved the work of the building committee in the erection of the new Parsonage.

Bro. S. N. Hayes of Chestnut Ridge Church was declared delegate elect to the next annual Conference.

Union Grove was selected as the next meeting place for quarterly conference.

Sincerely,

B. M. Williams.

Concord.—This work and the people, we believe, deserve frequent mention. Sunday, for example, carried evidences of real progress and spiritual uplift.

Sunday School attendance reached a total of two hundred and twenty-four. The largest audience for the morning worship for the entire summer was present, and the evening service was fine. All branches of the church are doing splendid work. I just want the readers of the Herald to know of the enthusiasm and growth of spirit in the religious life at Concord.

We are glad also to announce the development of the Band. Boys are speeling off the musical notes and with deep interest show great progress. This is the only active brass band in the city now. so with the present rate of success we can soon be rendering some real nice music.

Best, though, is the response to the special call of the college for money to meet the payment to Jefferson Standard. When this call which came from the College President was presented to the people they subscribed in cash the amount of $145.50. This of course is over and above the regular pledges which are also coming on nicely. This extra donation shows the interest Concord people have in the college.

P. E. Lindley.

Burlington.—We are having good services and good attendances, in spite of the hot weather.

Our pastor, S. W. Taylor, has been conducting a series of meetings at Julian, N. C. He is back with us again now and reports wonderful results at Julian. To-night (Sunday) Bro. Taylor delivered an interesting sermon on the subject of "Hell" and never before have I heard this subject handled in a more efficient manner. It is a part of the scriptures which is not dwelt upon enough by our ministers. Bro. Taylor talked principally on why people go to hell, and he did not seek to scare or excite anyone, but presented it in a very commonsense manner.

We are sorry to report that our Wednesday night prayer meetings are dropping off a bit in attendance. Let us, one and all, "keep step" with the Wednesday night prayer service, and we urge every one not to lose interest in this important part of our church life.

Rev. and Mrs. C. B. Way and daughters, Mildred and Louise, of the Shelby pastorate, are spending their vacation in Burlington with relatives. Looks good to see them attending their old home church.

W. T. Way.

Church Reporter.

State Street, Lexington.—In our third quarterly conference F. J. Cox was found to be elected delegate to next Annual Conference, J. W. Lindsay alternate. Our work here is making progress. Our Sunday school has more than doubled its enrollment this year. Recently we had 99 present. It is holding up well these hot Sundays when so many are tempted to go to the country.

We had 25 enrolled here on our Church register at the beginning of the Conference year. Yesterday we took in two new members, Mr. and Mrs. Hester Koonts, and that made 25 received this year. This is our first goal set, the doubling of our membership. The goal set was reached some time ago when we paid both budgets. Our next was to register all our members for Young People's Summer Conference. We did that and then went into the Sunday School after them and made it one hundred and seventy-seven per cent.

We want to add another 25 to our roll by Conference. That will treble our membership. They are here, M. P.'s and if we can make some more goods ones as some in the last 25 we ought to go to that all right. Pray for us, the harvest is great, laborers are few, but as faithful as are to be found anywhere.

Supt. Lowdermilk, Miss Ruth Vancannon and a party of the children from the Children's Home will have charge of the services at 11 A. M. Sunday and at night the Children's Day Services by the Sunday School. We are hoping for a liberal offering at each service.

Our work is encouraging. We thank God for it. Sincerely,

N. G. Bethea.

West End, Greensboro.—The members of West End are looking forward with a great deal of prayer and planning to the revival, which will begin Sunday, August 9th. Rev. J. H. Lynch, pastor of the First Methodist Protestant Church of Lynchburg, Virginia, and a member of the Maryland Conference, will do the preaching. Mr. Lynch, being naturally gifted in this work, has won quite a reputation as an evangelist and has been wonderfully successful in winning souls to Christ in the revivals he has held in his own Conference. The success of the revival will not rest in the efforts of the preacher alone, however, not in that of the pastor, but in the united efforts and prayers of the visiting preacher, pastor, and people. With these we are hoping for and expecting a great ingathering of souls. We extend a cordial invitation to the other Methodist Protestant churches in Greensboro to attend these services.

Unusual interest is being manifested in the mid-week prayer services. Mr. Ballard is using Charles M. Sheldon's book, "In His steps," or "What Would Jesus Do?", as a basis for discussion, and the comments heard on every side are evidence of its influence.

Several members of the Senior Christian Endeavor Society went to Tabernacle Methodist Protestant Church Sunday afternoon and held a meeting with the Tabernacle society. A very interesting debate on the question "Resolved, that the young people of today are better than the young people of the preceding generation," and short talks and discussions on how to keep the young people in the Christian Endeavor society furnished a very lively program. The prospects for a wide-awake society at Tabernacle are good, and we are hoping soon to hear of their good work.

Miss Hazel Bull, who recently underwent an operation for appendicitis at St. Leo's Hospital, is recovering rapidly and we trust will soon be able to resume her duties as teacher in the Beginner's Department of the Sunday School. Hazel is one of our best teachers and it would be hard to find another who could so entirely win the love and admiration of the little folk.

We regret to lose, for the time being, the help in the church work so willingly and lovingly given by Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Herndon. They are spending several months in Florida with Mrs. Herndon's brother.

We regret also to lose from our midst Miss Cordia Thompson, whose marriage to Rev. George Murdock, of New York, was solemnized at West End last Tuesday night. Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Murdock will sail for India September 6, where they will serve as missionaries in one of the Presbyterian mission stations. Mrs. Murdock has many friends at West End, who are wishing for her and her husband many happy years of service in their noble work.

Plans are being made for the annual Bible school picnic, which will be held at Kimesville Saturday afternoon, August 1. All members of the Bible school and parents of the pupils are urged to attend.

Miss Carrie Booker, assistant principal of the William A. Bass Junior High School, of Atlanta, is spending her summer vacation with her sister, Mrs. L. M. Foust.

Shiloh.—We had good attendance at our Sunday school July 26, 42 present.

Rev. Raymond Gertner preached at eleven o'clock. All enjoyed his sermon. Prayer meeting was held at 8 o'clock Sunday night. Mr. Leonard Sitzer was leader. Rev. J. E. Austin, Mr. John Decker and Mrs. W. S. Miller each made a ten-minute talk which was much enjoyed.

The number of chapters read in our Sunday school the past month is 1,344.

Mebane.—Yesterday morning at 11 o'clock Children's Day exercises were observed. The children did fine. Much credit is due Mrs. George Wyatt, Misses Mattie Smith and Elizabeth Nicholson, for the splendid training given the children. The offering amounted to $29.81.

Last Thursday afternoon at 3:30 the Ladies' Aid society met at the home of Mrs. C. C. Smith. At this meeting officers for another year were elected. Mrs. H. C. Nicholson gave a brief report of last year's work, of which we are very proud, but we are expecting to accomplish more this year. We were glad to have Mrs. R. T. Dunn join the society at this time. After business matters were attended to, lemonade, ice cream and cake were served. On last Friday night an ice cream supper was given by the W. H. M. S. Everybody seemed to enjoy this, and about $10 was realized.

Love Joy, Why Not Circuit.—Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. On the second Sunday in July we had our Children's Day exercise. The arbor was taxed to its seating capacity. The children rendered their part of the program well. The collection for missions amounted to about $22. We were glad to have with us our pastor, Brother Hulin, and his good wife and daughter, Maudia. They are always welcome at Love Joy.

Our singing school closed here on Saturday night, July 18. We had a very large crowd attend our singing, especially at night. Let us as a church not stop our singing because our singing teacher has left us but sing the more. May God help us to train our voices in this life so if we are fortunate enough to reach that better land we can sing His praises throughout endless ages.

We have our church now lit up by electricity, which adds very much to its appearance. It certainly is appreciated by the people of the community and all those who worship with us. Our people now are planning to tear down and remove the old arbor which camp meeting has been held under for the last 50 or 60 years and put in its place a modern structure which will increase its seating capacity 40 or 50 per cent. We want it completed before our annual camp meeting this fall.

Most of the singing choir from our church attended the singing convention at Macedonia church last Sunday and reported a nice time.

Sunday school next Sunday, preaching the second Sunday in every month. Everybody invited to attend.

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

Henderson.—We were glad to have Rev. R. A. Hunter of Winston-Salem preach for us Wednesday night, July 8. Mr. Hunter has been helping in the Rehoboth revival.

Rev. R. M. Andrews, D. D., preached at the eleven o'clock service July 12. We are always glad to have Dr. Andrews with us.

A number of our people have been attending the meeting at Mt. Carmel the past week.

We lost four of our members this month, by moving to another city. Mr. and Mrs. P. S. Ellis going to Rosemary, N. C. Mrs. Annie McIntosh and Miss Bessie Scoggins going to Petersburg, Va., where they will enter training in the Petersburg Hospital.

In the quarterly conference, which was held last Wednesday night, it was announced that Mr. Ray Dixon would be our delegate for the next annual conference.

We had our annual Children's Day Service last night. The committee which had charge of the program, also the children, are to be congratulated upon the success of the entertainment.

Rev. J. E. Pritchard will help Rev. M. P. Chambliss in a revival meeting at Flat Rock church this week.

Our Sunday School will have their annual picnic next Wednesday, going out to Balance Rock for the day.

The Girl's Mission Band will have a social in the basement of the church next Tuesday night. The public is invited.

Palestine, Flat Rock.—Our revival meeting has come to a close. Pastor J. B. Trogdon had for his pulpit help Rev C. H. Hill of Denton, N. C. Brother Hill did all the preaching from Sunday at 11 o'clock until the meeting closed Friday excepting one service when Brother Trogdon preached. Brother Hill and pastor both did good preaching that was enjoyed by all. We know our people enjoyed their message by their strict attention and quietness in the house. The church was crowded at every service. Our services were held at two and four o'clock in the afternoon.

We believe the good results of our meeting were due partly to the two prayer meetings that were held in the grove at recess. Mrs. J. B. Trogdon was leader of the ladies' meetings. Here the dear sisters poured out their hearts in prayer and praise to our dear Lord for the unsaved. And we know God answered our prayers. A revival does not just happen: it is sent down from heaven in answer to the prayers of God's children. As a result of these good prayer meetings and the good gospel sermons of Brother Hill and Pastor Trogdon, there were about 20 stepped out and gave their life and soul to our Lord, and others asked for prayer that were not willing to take the whole steps. Some of these were mothers and fathers, young men and girls; 12 of these united with our church. We welcome them into our church and pray our dear Father to watch over them, that they may march onward and upward, and never turn back. We pray especially for the dear father and those mothers that came into our church, that they may train their boys and girls that united with them, that they will never have a desire to turn back. And again, dear Lord, we would ask Thee to bless these little girls that gave their young hearts to Jesus.

Pastor and Mrs. Trogdon and the children helped out nicely with the singing. Also members of the surrounding churches helped in the choir and at the organ. This we all appreciate. Brobert Hill won a warm place in the hearts of all the people and we all regretted to part. But, as Bro. Hill said, if we do not get to meet here again, may we all live such lives that we can meet in heaven. The people presented Brother Hill with a little purse of about $30, which wasn't half enough for the faithful service he rendered.

We have bought 34 new song books for our choir and put a window on each side of our pulpit that makes it more pleasing to sit in our choir.

Aunt Sarah Landreth, the good wife of Uncle John, is just a little better. Pray for her that she may soon be able to be up again.

Henderson.—Our third quarterly conference has been held and Brother Roy Dixon has been declared the delegate to the next annual conference. A fine Children's Day service was held a week ago. Mrs. Pritchard and Miss Helen Hayes trained the children in the recitations and Miss Mary Powell and Miss Alice Falkner trained them in the singing. The offering was about $33.00.

There will be no church services for the next Sunday as the pastor will be away on his vacation. There will be Sunday school and Christian Endeavor as usual.

During the pastor's vacation he will assist brother Burgess in the meeting at Tabernacle church.

J. E. Pritchard.

Spring Vally, Vance Circuit.—Our Sunday School is doing fine if the weather is hot. We had 56 present yesterday and a number of visitors.

Last Sunday afternoon we were greatly surprised when a number of members from other churches on Vance circuit came to worship with us, and also a number from Bro. Chambliss home church. It was our regular preaching Sunday and Rev. J. E. Pritchard from Henderson gave us a splendid sermon. We are always glad to have Christian workers with us.

Our Children's Day Service will be held the Second Sunday night in August.

Our special meeting will be held the third Sunday in September. Pray for us that we might have a great meeting.

We held our annual Sunday School picnic Saturday. Fine attendance and plenty of "Good eats."

The farmers are all in good spirits this morning on account of the fine showers we have had in the last few days.

Aug. 2. Topic—God's Friendliness as expressed in Nature. Matt. 6: 26-30; Ps. 104: 16. (An outdoor consecration meeting.)

Some Bible Hints.

God has made full provision in nature for our need. The Creator is Preserver (v. 26).

Jesus reasons from nature up to God. Will God care for the less valuable and let the more valuable perish? (V. 26).

Grass was burned as fuel. It was of little use to man, yet God thought of it. Shall He think of us as well? (V. 30.)

Nature shows the generosity of God. His hand is closed until we come with our need. We have not even scratched nature's resources (v. 16.).

An Outdoor Consecration Meeting.

Plan an afternoon hike into the country and hold your prayer-meeting on a hillside or in a grove. Enter into the spirit of God's outpourings in all that is said and done. If such a plan may be impractical, hold the meeting on the church lawn at twilight. God is everywhere, all nature speaks of Him. When you see trees and flowers and birds, do you think of God? They are evidences of His love to you. He could have made this world without a bit of beauty in it. But because He is love, He so loved us He wanted a beautiful world for us to live in.

Suitable Songs.

"We Thank Thee, O Our Father," "Sunshine and Rain," "God Speaks to Us in Bird Song," "There's a Rainbow on the Cloud," "Scatter Sunshine."

The Leader's Talk.

This is the time of the year when nature is at her best. It is the season when everybody spends as much time as possible outdoors, in order to benefit to the greatest extent, physically, mentally, morally. We see all the beauties of nature spread out around us, and we sometimes fail to sense her lessons, and we see the hand of God in it all.

Our heavenly Father has proved His friendliness for His children by providing everything we need. And yet, many of us fail to take advantage of this wise provision. We have no need to pass by the glories of nature, and refuse to give thought to the Giver of them all. God is our best friend, and proves his friendliness by giving us what we need, without money and without price. So, as we enjoy the summer season, let us look beyond these enjoyments to the Provider of them, and be thankful to Him.

Consecration comes from deep thought and communion with God. Nowhere should we be closer to God than in His great out-of-doors. Let nature providing the setting, our lives should be greatly lifted up by this meeting tonight. Then we will be more fit to prove our friendliness to Him by doing His will.

Points for Purposeful Prayers.

Thank God (1) for His thoughtfulness for us as expressed in nature; (2) for the varying seasons, each of which has a message for us; (3) for the privilege of consecrating our lives through a study of the glories of nature.

Ask God (1) for His presence in a special way in this meeting; (2) to give you the spiritual vision to understand the beauties of His out-of-doors; (3) to help you all to use the summer season helpfully.

The Lesson in Life.

God proves His friendliness to us by showing that He is interested in us and in our welfare. All through sacred history, as well as secular, He keeps up His interest in the development of the human race. His face is ever upon us, and His arm ever held out to shield us and provide for our needs. As we are interested in our children, so God is interested in us. Let us strive to prove worthy of His friendliness by doing His will.

Nature sometimes frowns and complains, and justly so. The strenuous rain, the wind-storm, the swirling snow, the blizzard, are beautiful, and yet show us nature at her moments of ill feeling. Here, again, God has lessons for us. He frowns upon His children when they are doing wrong, when they go astray from His will; and yet, all for the purpose of calling them back to Him.

But God proves His friendliness to us through nature by seeing that she supplies all our physical wants. We can never get very far away from the earth's provision for our bodily needs. The farmer, the stockraiser, the herdsman, will always have a place in our life. But we don't usually stop to thank God for His friendliness to us in this respect—yet we should.

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains: from whence shall my help come?" (Ps. 121: 1). The remedy for tired eyes—and who has not had them, or, what is the same, wearied hearts?—is the "far look." ... Tired, weary one, the far look, the upward look, is what you need. The upward look, if concentrated and continuous, upon some lofty ideal or prospect, will transform your character. Our eyes are unto the hills.—Selected from the C. E. Quarterly.

THE PLEASURES OF RELIGION.

Much has been written about the pleasures of the world. We are living in an age of large and varied entertainment. To have a good time is the vaunted outlook of the worldly-minded. Much of modern entertainment is questionable. Righteousness, decency, and the sacred ties of family life are derided, made unattractive, or even sacrificed in many a modern play and picture film.

The Creator has made man for pleasure as well as for service. But God's method of imparting a good time is quite different from that of the world. The world's method is to amuse the sensitive faculties, to produce mirth through the avenue of the five senses. It is a most superficial method. God's method is to stir the soul-life into large exaltation and appreciation by the operation of the Spirit.

The Psalmist has declared, "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures." This large and all-inclusive magna charta of sweet enjoyment is the priceless privilege of all who believe in God to the saving of the soul.

There is the accompanying satisfaction of righteousness. To be right with God and at peace with all mankind is happiness to a large degree. The pleasure of an approving conscience outmeasures all the entertainments of a worldly character. "Thou wilt keep him at perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee."

There is the delight of certainty in the realm of spiritual values. Blessed assurance supplies a stream of quietness and rapture of which the world is entirely ignorant. To know God and to be known of Him entitle one to sit in the heavenly places of joy unspeakable and full of glory.

There is the joy of helpful and uplifting service. Doing good yields about as much real happiness as being good. In such Christian service the joy of fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ assumes large proportions. It is a most delightful distinction to be thus yoked with the Lord of glory in dispensing benefactions to a lost and needy world.

And there is the happiness of anticipation. The hope of eternal life and reward imparts a foretaste of the good things to come. This hope, which is an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast, lightens every burden, lessens every sacrifice, and makes easier every task in the world's great harvest field. It is most blessed to enter into the spirit of the adorable Christ, "who for the joy set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."—The Word of Life.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.

Dwiggins.—Robert L. Dwiggins was born July 31, 1885, and departed this life June 25, 1925. On Dec. 24, 1877, he was united in marriage to Miss Mirandy Jane Nelson. He leaves his wife, seven daughters, three sons, twenty-six grandchildren, and a host of friends to mourn their loss. Bro. Dwiggins had been in poor health for months. Some weeks ago he went to Greensboro for treatment, staying in his daughter's home. All that loving hands could do was done to relieve his suffering, but God saw best and took him. When about 19 years old he accepted Christ and joined the Methodist Protestant Church at Pine Grove. He remained a faithful member, and the community has lost a valuable citizen. He will be greatly missed by his many friends.

Funeral service was conducted by Rev. L. W. Gerringer and the writer at Kernersville Church, after which his body was laid to rest in the Kernersville cemetery to await the resurrection morn.

Smith—"Yes, absolutely penniless. You see he lost his health trying to get wealthy; then lost all his wealth trying to get healthy."—London Weekly Telegraph.

TO THE HON. WM. J. BRYAN.

America, the glorious and mighty land today,
America, the beautiful, with streaming banners gay,
America, America, a leading light you stand,
Oh, why and how your greatness and triumphs in the land?

In retrospect we behold the stern and rock-bound coast,
Our Pilgrim fathers kneeling, as captain of God's Host,
The open Bible speaking a covenant of God's grace,
'Twas thus thy birth of glory and triumph in the race.

The Holy Bible with its truths unquestioned and believed,
Led on and on to victory, and through it men achieved
Success, triumph and blessing, see today our flag unfurled
Proclaims in piercing accents—the one flag of the world.

Then America, turn backward a moment in your race,
And catch again a gleam of faith in your Pilgrim Fathers' face.
The gain is not to the swiftest, the wisest, the mightiest—nay,
But conquest comes through simple trust, to men of faith who pray.

Then honor and praise to men of faith wherever on earth they be;
All honor and praise for victories won and triumph yet to be.
While Christ leads on our bark is safe, no storm however wild
Can e'er upset our ship of state, if we've faith as a little child.

America, the land of faith, hails Bryan a mighty son—
Uniting past and present needs and victorious races run
By the golden cord of simple faith, so pure, so true and strong
That all the sinful powers of earth can never thwart, nor harm.

We hail thee, Bryan, crown thee too, pioneer leader, friend,
Your mighty soul of faith and trust a blessing to us send.
Your vision reaches inward, beyond scientific strands,
Your eyes behold the Prince of Peace, therefore you understand.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

Catalogue and application blank will be forwarded upon application. Those desiring further information should address The President, High Point College, High Point, N. C.

Thompson-Murdoch.

July 21 at West End Methodist Protestant church, Miss Cordia Thompson was married to Rev. George J. Murdoch in a ceremony marked by its beauty and dignity. The ceremony was performed by Rev. N. M. Harrison, dean of men at High Point college, before a large gathering of relatives and friends.

The church was arranged most attractively for the occasion. Palms and fern combined with green foliage formed an attractive background while Queen Ann's lace and cut flowers were used as decorations in the foreground and flanked the altar effectively.

Prior to the ceremony Mrs. J. R. Holden played, "To a Wild Rose," which was followed by, "I Love You Truly," sung by Mrs. V. C. Stockton. Rev. E. Lester Ballard, pastor of West End church, sang, "At Dawning."

Following the ceremony a reception was held at the home of Mrs. A. G. Dixon, 126 Tate street.

Mr. and Mrs. Murdoch left last night for Lake George, N. Y., to attend Silver Bay Methodist Conference and after three weeks spent in Pittsburgh will sail early in September for India, where for five and a half years they will serve as missionaries.

Mrs. Murdoch is the daughter of Mrs. M. C. Thompson, and has made her home in this county for the past 10 years. She attended Guilford College and has a number of friends in this section of the state who will learn of her marriage with interest.

Mr. Murdoch is the son of Henry P. Murdoch, of Cambridge, N. Y. He received his education at Muskingum college in Ohio, later attending the theological seminary at Pittsburg, Pa., graduating last May.

Birthday of Mrs. Mary E. Hayes.

On the beautiful, clear morning of July 1 the children, grandchildren and friends gathered at the home of her son, S. N. Hayes, to celebrate the 85th birthday of our dear mother, grandmother and friend, Mrs. Mary E. Hayes. This occasion was a very happy one because we are glad grandmother has been spared to be with us 85 years, and is still able to go, and enjoy life. It seems to the fullest extent. We all rejoice in her good fortune.

After an hour or so of social conversation talking with old friends and new ones, the baskets were brought forward, and dinner was spread, and such a dinner, the big birthday cake was a picture in itself.

During the evening music was rendered by one of her grandchildren.

All of her children were present except M. G. O. Hayes who is now in Florida, all of her grandchildren and a number of great-grandchildren. Everyone seemed to enjoy the day and left wishing grandmother many more such happy birthdays. Granddaughter.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

I have read with pleasure the recent comments on High Point College, and I feel moved to add a word. As a member of the faculty it seems to me that the past year was a success and I am looking hopefully for a larger year soon to begin.

For twelve years I have been closely associated with colleges, as student or as teacher and have met many young men and women of the finer type of students, but I have never come in contact with a more loyal, more earnest, more excellent student body. The administration of the college has also, in my opinion, been wisely conducted and the year was amazingly free from problems of a grave character.

The four years spent in college form a very large part of one's life and a very important one. Much depends upon the associations formed and the ideals acquired during those four years. Methodist Protestants should be concerned that their own sons and daughters are trained by those and with those with whom they are to live and labor and achieve.

THE DENOMINATIONAL OUTLOOK.

Alabama. Since moving into the new church on Capitol Heights, the Montgomery church has taken on new life. A number of members have been added to the roll. As an appreciation of the pastor's services, the congregation has presented him with a Ford car.—At a meeting of representatives from various churches in the Conference, a branch of the Woman's Home Missionary Society was recently organized.—The members at Hopewell, Lee circuit, have just completed a new church building at a cost of $3,000.—The Ladies' Aid of Spring Hill church, Pike circuit, have installed and paid for a Deleo light plant for the church.

Arkansas. A new church is to be built at Rector. The church organization at this point was well nigh extinct two years ago. With the coming of the present pastor, Rev. J. E. Butler, the work has taken on new life. A number of substantial members received. A new bungalow has been bought for a parsonage at that place.

Colorado-Texas. The church at San Angelo has been blessed with a fine revival. Sixteen, mostly heads of families, have united with the church.

Eastern. St. Paul's Church, Inwood, L. I., has received 74 members as a result of the recent revival. During the year $2,700 has been paid on mortgage.—The Baldwins congregation is rejoicing in the new church, which replaces one destroyed by fire more than a year ago. The fire was a blessing in disguise, since the present structure is modern and adequate.—The church at Roseland, N. J., is to be remodeled at a cost of $15,000.—Many of the churches in this conference have paid the expenses of the pastors and wives to the Montrose, Pa., Bible Conference.

Georgia. Plans are being worked out for the building of a hotel at the Waco camp meeting grounds.

Illinois. Crooked Creek Circuit has built their pastor, Rev. N. J. Meek, a new parsonage at a cost of $2,000. The Fairview church has received eight additions to the membership. The church building has been reroofed, repainted, and improved inside. The Falmouth church received 16 new members as a result of a recent revival.—The fourth M. P. church in Chicago was recently organized. Ground has been broken for the church building.

Maryland. So far this year more than $13,000 has been paid on the debt of Hampden church, Baltimore.—Children's Day offering at Stewartstown amounted to $314.—A new brick church is to be built at Marion at a cost of $20,000.—The Finksburg Sunday-school held its 55th anniversary service on June 21. The preachers were Dr. Stephens, professor at Western Maryland College, and Dr. J. H. Straughn, pastor of Rhode Island Avenue Church, Washington, D. C.—The Mt. Olivet Sunday school offering for Children's Day amounted to $405.

Missouri. Brother J. F. Howe, of Ionia, has just completed fifty years of service as Sunday school superintendent.

Mississippi. The President, Rev. S. E. Gipsen, reports the work in an encouraging condition.—A wooden tabernacle has been built on the lot recently purchased at Meridian. The work in that city is hopeful.

Ohio. The members of the Coshocton circuit put on a reading contest during the first quarter of the year. A total of 750,000 square inches of literature was read including 326,000 verses of the Bible.—Rev. Roy Farmer, pastor of the Steubenville church, is the president of the Ohio Christian Endeavor Union.—The first unit of the church building at Mt.

Lookout, Cincinnati, is well under way.

Pittsburg. The Mt. Washington church reports improvements at a cost of $20,000, more than $1,600 paid on benevolences, and 26 additions to the membership.—Ground has been broken for the new First Church, Uniontown. This will be one of the finest churches in the denomination.

West Virginia. The Sunday school of the Grafton church presented Miss Amanda Abbott with a Bible as a token of appreciation for 47 years of service as Superintendent of the Primary Department. C. W. B.

—The editor made his first visit to Concord church, Saxapahaw circuit, last Sunday. The pastor, Rev. H. L. Isley, invited us for the morning service. It was the beginning of an evangelistic meeting. Professor White, of Elon College, preached in the afternoon, and the pastor expected to preach at night. Rev. G. F. Millaway, the engaged help, was expected on Monday. This church was the place of membership of the late A. N. Roberson. We met some of his family. We do not remember how many people we met bearing the name of Guthrie. Woodys were pretty plentiful also. Brother Isley has a good people to serve, and they appreciate his service and wish to keep him. We hope to hear that they have had a good meeting.

—Brother Pritchard came by this morning and had an encouraging report of the Tabernacle meeting. The federation of Pleasant Union church has come to the help of the other workers, and three services a day are being held. Up to last night there had been thirteen converts counted. The meeting will go on till Sunday afternoon.

—The corner stone of the new Grace church was laid last Friday with a rather elaborate program of songs and speeches. Dr. Spahr presided. Greetings were received from various bodies. The mayor of the city spoke for the city. Rev. Mr. Turner spoke for the ministerial association. Charles Ireland spoke for the community. Dr. Brown spoke for First Church and indeed all the churches of High Point. Dr. Charles F. Myers spoke for his church, the First Presbyterian of this city. The editor of the Herald conveyed the greetings of the new Calvary church. President Andrews represented High Point College in bringing greetings. Among the articles deposited in the corner stone was a Bible that was used by Rev. R. H. Wills, bearing his name in gilt letters on the leather cover. It must have been held dear by his sons, but they made an offering of it that they might express their devotion to the church to which their father gave his life.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

WHY SONG WRITERS ARE OFTEN ACCUSED OF PLAGIARISM.

By Homer Rodeheaver.

I have often overheard discussions regarding the authorship of certain songs - - where more than one writer takes credit for the words and music. It is true that sacred music has been published where it appears as though the music or words were a deliberate steal from music that has already been published.

As far as I am able to discover, the accusation of plagiarism in music is as ill-founded as that in literature. Some historians have accused Abraham Lincoln of appropriating the thought in his Gettysburg Address from the Greek account of the funeral oration of Pericles over the dead bodies of the Athenians after the Battle of Thermopylae.

Lincoln probably did read this oration in his youth. The thought remained after he had forgotten its source, and at Gettysburg the thought again came into consciousness when he expressed his feelings on this occasion.

The same thing has undoubtedly happened in music. For example, there has been considerable discussion concerning a portion of Signor Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West," and Alexander's Rag-time Band" - - how they were practically the same, note for note, yet no one will assume the great Italian composer plagiarized, and surely the rag-time man had never heard the "Girl of the Golden West" when he published his song, for they were issued simultaneously in different parts of the world.

The popular song "Haven of Rest," is taken from one of Dr. Robert Lowry's compositions, published in one of his early books, both words and music. The melody of "Face to Face" is the first strain of a home song popular two or three decades ago written by W. A. Ogden. "When the Mists Have Rolled Away" is quite identical with the song written by J. H. Anderson back in the early 70's. The chorus of "At the Cross" is an old plantation melody, well known thirty years ago.

Charles H. Gabriel once told me the following incident:

"I wrote and published a song entitled 'Over in the Glory Land;' the manuscript had been seen only by myself and the typesetter. My surprise may be imagined when one day, soon after, I received from an Eastern hymn writer a text on the same subject, same title, same meter, and substantially the same subject-matter throughout, stanza for stanza. He had not seen my song nor I his poem, yet the one was the counterpart of the other. I immediately mailed him a printed copy of my composition which proved to be as much of a surprise to him as his had been to me."

It is entirely possible that two or more men of the creative type may feel and express in music the same thought and emotion.

AIAMANCE COUNTY—YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

By William Thornton Whitsett.

(Extracts from an Address delivered before the annual meeting of the Albright-Alamance Association at Mount Hermon Church, Alamance county, N. C., on July 28, 1925.)

The Creation of Alamance County.

In order to understand the history of the county of Alamance it is necessary to go far back of its erection into a county. Its history begins as a county in 1728 when the county of New Hanover was created and named from the English House of Hanover. From this New Hanover county in 1734 was created the county of Bladen which at that time took in the entire western part of the State. later, or in 1751, the county of Orange was formed from the ruling House of Orange. In 1776, Guilford county was created from parts of Orange and Rowan counties, and it was not until the year 1848 that Alamance county was created, the greater part of the territory being taken from Orange county with a smaller portion from Guilford.

Pre-Revolutionary days in Alamance.

On the soil of what is now Alamance county (then known as Orange county) centered the struggles of that patriot band of farmers and early settlers known as the Regulators who in resistance of the oppressions of Edmund Fanning, clerk of the county court at Hillsboro, and of Gov. William Tryon, boldly marched upon the field at Alamance and on May 16, 1771 took their stand for justice even at the cost of death. This battle between the Royal forces and the hundreds gathered hastily from their farms was the first blow struck in that struggle between the Crown and the colonies that was finally carried to a glorious culmination in the war for American Independence. It was the preliminary note in the chorus for freedom and liberty that closed with the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to General Washington on the field of Yorktown in 1781. After the struggle at Alamance there followed the Declaration of Mecklenburg, the Declaration of Philadelphia, the Battle of Guilford Court House, and that long train of events connected with the winning of American Independence; but let us never forget the bold spirits and the strong arms of the men of Alamance who dared to defy even the haughty Tryon when they felt that their rights were being trampled into the dust.

"The war of the Regulation ripened North Carolina for the coming stupendous change in which her people would fight with Massachusetts for the second Magna Charta. . . This was the first lesson in the history of a new nation—that of the United States of America." Stockard's History. In the forty-seven sections of the State Constitution adopted in 1776 we find more than one fourth of the demands of the Regulators adopted and embodied as the law of the State, thus showing that the Regulators in the Petitions of Grievance which they from time to time presented were only asking and demanding rights which were later on to be recognized and adopted as the law of the land. We do not endorse or praise all the actions of these Regulators, but their spirit we must commend, and their bravery we must admire, if we will but read their true story in the pages of the early Colonial Records of North Carolina. The field of Alamance is sacred ground; some day it will become a great battle park with stately monuments and tablets, and here the lover of liberty will stand with uncovered head before the heroism of that earliest outbreak against despotism on American soil. Of this spot it will some day be said:

"Here Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there."

We must not forget that it was also upon the soil of Alamance that Col. Pyle's famous hacking match occurred, a decisive battle that filled the hearts of the Tories of Chatham and Randolph counties with terror. Remember, also, that down yonder on Cane Creek five or six miles was fought what is known as the battle of Lindley's Mill which of itself was no insignificant struggle in the events of that early day, this was on Sept. 14, 1781. These events show us as nothing else can the mettle of the men of that day, and the determination that fired their hearts to have justice and equity even if they must be purchased at the price of blood. This is the stock that peopled these hills of Alamance, and their story is one that no patriot would willingly forget.

Physical Features of Alamance County.

The county of Alamance contains 265,776 acres of land. The northern part of the county lies in the Laurentian, and the southern part of the county in the Huronian geologic belts. Both of these belts are very old, the Laurentian being the older of the two. The few Triassic sections of the county are much younger speaking from the standpoint of geology. In the Cane Creek mountains in this county we find the Huronian slate. There is no coal in Alamance; as coal was formed after both the Laurentian and Huronian periods of geologic history. There is valuable granite in several sections; and much auriferous quartz. Scattered mineral deposits are found, but building stone is by far its most valuable mineral product. The upper waters of the Cape Fear, the Haw River, the Big and Little Alamance streams, and others are capable of developing from four to five thousand horse power. The soils are chiefly fertile red clay loams. Hickory, the various oaks, and pine, are the chief woods. The upper edge of the county is well suited to tobacco; the central part to the various grain crops, and cotton may be raised with profit on the lower edges. The fruits are very plentiful, and the flavor is fine; clover and the better grasses flourish. The excellent water powers called early attention to Alamance as a manufacturing country. The land area measured in square miles is 494 square miles. In 1860 the county had a population of 11,852; in 1890 this had grown to 18,271, and in 1920 the last census taken gives Alamance county a population of 32,718. More than one half of this is white population. Remember that the entire state of North Carolina had a population in 1675 of only 4,000; in 1752 of 100,000, and in 1786 of only 350,000. In 1920 the largest town in Alamance county was Burlington with a population of 5,952 which is estimated for 1925 to be about eight thousand, Graham the county seat had in 1920 a population of 2,366, now estimated in 1925 to be about four thousand; the third town in size is Mebane located in Alamance-Orange with a population in 1920 of 1,341, now estimated in 1925 to be three thousand. The North Carolina Railroad (now leased to the Southern Railway) runs through the center of the county from east to west, as also does central highway No. 10 which traverses the State. State maintained highway No. 62 also traverses Alamance county. Over 1,000,000 pounds of tobacco are raised annually, among other crops. The average elevation of the county is from 400 to 600 feet above sea level, rising to nearly twice this height in the Cane Creek mountains in the southern portion.

The Indians of Alamance County.

Here lived the Saxapahaw, or Saxapahaw Indians, when we first learn of this section. Indian words still survive to remind us of those days of the Red men; names like Haw, Minneola, and others. A careful reading of John Lawson's history written concerning his trip through this section in 1700 will give us a clear idea of those days.

Indian villages were quite numerous. The banks of the Haw river were among their favorite resorts. Indian relics such as arrow points, and broken pottery, are still frequently found. Indian paths and trails were well marked all over this territory. In 1728 Col. Wm. Byrd spoke of the well-known fertility of the section known as the Haw fields, a region that still keeps this name from the olden days. Game was abundant; the buffalo, deer, bear, turkies, and smaller game filled the woods. The Indian had his patches or small fields of corn, but food was too easy to obtain to encourage him to work much. These Sissepahaw or Saxapahaw Indians were simple children of nature but were neither savage nor vindictive; judged by an honest standard, they must be said to have been semi-civilized, with some knowledge of the healing art, customs well-fixed for marriage, burial &c., with a simple speech; for example, one—unche; two—nechte; ten—wartsanh; eleven—unche schanwhan &c. The mild climate, abundant game, excellent fishing, etc., made life easy for the Sissepahaw Indian. Even the shad then came up the Haw river; and the buffalo crowded the grassy lowlands of these surrounding streams. It seems almost impossible to conceive that it has been only two hundred years since these days of which we are speaking, yet such is a fact, for the first white settler came into this region about 1720, after it was pretty well known by traders for a score of years previous to that date.

John Lawson, English surveyor and historian, of 1700, speaks of this middle section of the State as far excelling many other parts of the surrounding territory; George Bancroft, America's great historian, knew and admired greatly this region. The Quaker early occupied Pennsylvania; Virginia was claimed in great part by Episcopal faiths; so this favored spot of mid-Carolina early claimed to attention of pre-Revolutionary settlers. In 1740 the Strayhorns settled around Haw Fields, and in 1828 ten thousand acres of land was patented by the Moseleys in this section. The Quakers were organized at Cane Creek before 1752, and some claim had settled there by 1700. The Palatine settlers poured in from 1725 to 1750, coming from the favored Rhine region. Settlers from England, Germany, Holland, and France poured into this territory, with many from the Virginia settlements, until about the close of the Revolutionary War. Soon after this time a tide of emigration began to flow from all this territory toward Tennessee, Missouri and other points west, and this continued until about 1840, giving to many and other points west, and this continued until about 1840, giving to many places in other western states entire communities and settlements with the identical family names found to-day in Alamance county. It is said of some of the members of almost every family "He went West" when records are being searched, referring to this tide of emigrants.

Western Alamance was settled by people of the Lutheran and the Reformed faith; followers of the doctrines of Martin Luther and John Calvin. In the main, they were Whigs. Their names are found on Herman Husband's petitions of grievance to the Royal governor (See N. C. Colonial Records Vol. 7, pp. 733-737). They fought at Alamance May 16, 1771. Many of their graves are to be found at Low's Church, Brick Church, Stoner's Church, Frieden's Church &c. Their pastors, Rev. Adolphus Nussman, Lutheran, and Rev. Samuel Suther, Reformed, at Friedens Church, and Low's Church, stood for liberty and justice, side by side with Dr. David Caldwell of Alamance and Buffalo, and Rev. Henry Patillo of Haw Fields, of the Presbyterian faith. What a mighty team for that early day,—Caldwell and Nussman, Suther and Patillo! No wonder that the fury of Lord Cornwallis was aimed at them when he came into this section on his memorable trip; They used their pulpits as recruiting camps for the army of patriots who immortalized themselves at Alamance, at Guilford Court House, and later at Yorktown.

From all obtainable data it seems certain that Alamance county was first settled in connection with the eastern portion of Guilford county by settlers from that Rhine river region known as the Palatine section, and that their coming was an outgrowth of the effects of the Thirty Years' War in Europe which raged from 1618 to 1648. A great many of these settlers undoubtedly came from what was known as the old Alemanni region. We find in old records these names: Alamance, Alemanz, Alamans, Allemanni. The family names corroborate this view: Foust, Clapp, Holt, Albright, Summers, and many others being identical with the numerous Alemanni names. These early people settled on all the lands lying along the streams now called Big Alamance and Little Alamance, and even yet their descendants are on these lands. Naturally they became known as the "Allemanni settlers" and the streams took these names, Alamance being only a softening of the name Alemanni, and from these streams bearing now the name Alamance, came the county name of Alamance. That view of some that Alamance is an Indian name, finds no chain of circumstance to bear it out, while the other view of its derivation from the Alemanni may be traced back for hundreds of years. Certainly for more than a thousand to fifteen hundred years the pages of history carry the story of the Allemanni people, and it is these same people who came to this section, and whose racial name is now borne by the two streams named, and by the county of Alamance. In accepting this view, Alamance county is only paying proper tribute to those who were beyond any question her first settlers, and who first set up their house and their household gods upon this virgin soil. The county is sprinkled still with hundreds of names that trace back in this view of the matter,—descendants beyond question of the Allemanni stock of the Palatine region of the Rhine river.

The Haw River and Alamance County.

To the student nothing in Alamance county can be of more interest than the Haw River, for this stream later on down is known as the Cape Fear River, and many early explorers sailed up the stream. Let us notice for a moment the interesting account of Capt. William Hilton, and Capt. Anthony Long who in 1664 sailed up Cape Fair (Fear) river, and later on wrote this following description of a part of their voyage. After going up stream until stopped by obstructions they have this to say: "We viewed the land on both sides of the stream, and found as good tracts of land, dry, well-wooded, pleasant and delightful as we have seen anywhere in the world. Great burdens of grass are upon it; the woods stored with abundance of Deer, and Turkies, everywhere, we never go on shore but we also see great store of Partridges, Cranes abundant, Conies in several places, we heard Wolves howling in the wood and saw where a Deer had been torn in pieces. In the river stores of Ducks, Teal, Widgeon, and in the woods great flocks of Paroquets; Oaks of four or five sorts, and forty, fifty and sixty feet before you come to boughs. Likewise also Cypress, Walnut, Birch, Beech, Maple, Ash, Bay, Alder, Holly, and Innumerable Pines, with Mulberry trees, Grape-vines, and some Grapes which we did eat." Certainly, an attractive picture they draw of the Haw River of their day.

On a branch of the Haw River Holt and Carrigan began cotton manufacturing in 1837 and continued this firm until 1851 when Carrigan sold his interest. In 1859 they did the first dyeing of cotton yarns ever done in the South, and thus started an industry that has carried the name of Alamance county over the world, and given her a large place as a manufacturing county in North Carolina. Millions upon millions of dollars worth of cotton products have been manufactured in Alamance county upon the waters of the Haw River, and its tributaries, at various points, as Haw River, Big Falls, Glencoe, Altamahaw, Swepsonville, Old Alamance Mills, Belmont, and Saxapahaw. Until the coming of steam and electric power it is difficult to estimate the influence of a stream such as the Haw upon the life of a county.

Townships in Alamance County.

The townships of Alamance county are as follows: Patterson, Coble, Boon Station, Morton, Faucett, Burlington, Graham, Albright, Newlin, Thompson, Melville, and Pleasant. (Continued on page six.)

CALLING ATTENTION.

Pastors who received a complimentary copy of the July number of The Missionary Record, —and we tried to reach all,— and the subscribers who have theirs have noted at the back of the magazine, the annual report of the Union Board of Foreign Missionary Administration.

It was purposely prepared in that concise way so that any one desiring information on any phase of the work in either or all of the three fields could find it readily, and in a brief compass.

An examination of that report will make it perfectly clear that the Methodist Protestant Church is conducting an important, varied and extensive foreign missionary enterprise, embracing, in the main, all departments which any other church is prosecuting abroad.

And as to expenditures for maintaining and for the natural, not forced, development of that enterprise, it will be seen that the expenses bear very favorable comparison with those of any other Board operating in the same area or country.

If expenditures are compared with those of similar kinds of workers and work in America, it will be shown that those of the three Missions in Japan, China and India lose nothing by such comparison with those in the United States.

One example may suffice—Nagoya College, at Nagoya, Japan, with its enrollment of 1115 young men, receives from the Union Board this year, 1925-1926, only $2,664.50 and that covers taxes, insurance, general and special repairs, equipment to laboratory, etc. The balance of the expenses amount to $29,414.00.

Then, as often mentioned heretofore, the Union Board is of necessity, in projecting a church in foreign lands, compelled to carry on practically all the kinds of work which our denomination is doing in America through all its boards, institutions, local churches, etc., and in addition thereto, the Union Board is conducting kindergartens, girls' schools, medical work, and ought to have that consideration and support which the character and extent of its work reasonably demand.

Another fact worthy of mention is that, for the first time, all the foreign Missionary work of our church is found in one report, instead of in two publications, because the general Conference authorized the formation of the Union Board to have charge of all the work of our church abroad, and none can question but that this is a gain.

It is hoped that pastors will put forth effort to have their members subscribe for the Missionary Record at 75cts. a year, sending subscriptions to Mrs. H. E. Amos, Cambridge, Ohio, and set a good example by ordering it themselves.

Do Not Forget.

It is absolutely necessary that the Union Board receive all the Children's Day offerings, at the earliest possible date, so please give attention to this earnest request, brother pastor, brother superintendent. Be sure to state the offering is for Foreign Missions.

State to your conference treasurer how many are in your Sunday school, because we must have the information so as to properly award one of the beautiful Japanese banners to the school giving the largest amount in proportion to membership, and the other banner goes to the Sunday school sending the largest amount, regardless of membership.

Fred. C. Klein.

FOUR PRIME OBLIGATIONS OF A SICK MAN.

By Luther K. Long.

It is both inconvenient and uncomfortable to be sick. None of us likes to be dependent on others to feed us and to render the many sorts of service required when we are confined to the house—perhaps to the bed also—for several weeks at a time. I have repeatedly passed through that experience, and, I trust, have learned some useful lessons.

Recently, I had a fall. While on the roof of the veranda I was endeavoring to adjust a screen over an up-stairs window. Somehow my hold became released and I went to the ground, striking on my back. Several ribs were broken and I was rendered unconscious.

Neighbor Dilly was working in his garden across the street. Hearing a noise on the roof he looked up just in time to see me strike the ground. When he reached my side I was on my back with my eyes closed. He remarked to himself (so he repeated later) "I wouldn't give ten cents for him." On examination he found my arms, legs and head seemingly uninjured. My wife, Mr. Dilly and another neighbor attempted to set me up; but I was too limber to hold together. Finally they got me onto my feet and supported me while I—still unconscious—walked into the house. The Doctor came, examined my broken ribs, put a cloth bandage about me and assisted me to the bed. Later, he strapped me up with adhesive tape to hold me in shape while mother nature is doing the necessary repair work. There has been considerable pain, there has been even more discomfort. But repairs are going forward and I hope before many weeks to be as good as new.

There isn't much difference between being sick and sustaining an injury. The lessons and obligations of the patient are practically the same. Here are four of them:

1. The obligation to be appreciative. The sick or injured person is at the mercy of his family, neighbors, physicians, nurses and, it may be, of strangers. As a rule, everyone responds liberally with time, with effort, and with anything else that may be needed. Many plans are given up, and the neighborhood soon adjusts itself to the changed situation. Good things to eat are offered to tempt the appetite and to keep up the strength. Mildred brings in the last picking of strawberries, little Ruth climbs to the top of the tree that she may gather the choicest sweet cherries, while other homes yield deliciously cool deserts and chicken. He who fails to be appreciative of such kindness must be decidedly below normal. He will feel it a privilege, as well as an obligation, to show his appreciation.

2. The obligation to help himself. Disease is often exceedingly depressing and debilitating. A man feels so utterly helpless as compared with his former state that he is tempted to slump down and allow others to do whatever must be done. Nature is dependent largely on the patient's own resources to work a cure. It is of the greatest importance that a strong heart and hopeful spirit be manifest. Everything the patient does for himself in the way of service and entertainment is worth more than double the number of things others may do for him—and greatly relieves the watchers.

3. The obligation to make himself intelligible. His voice may be weak, his breathing may be defective and painful, his strength utterly inadequate. But by skillful use of words and signs he may make it possible for his friends to know what is required. He may know what he wants when he mumbles, "Pumizlipperson," but it will be difficult for the nurse to guess that he wants something to put on his feet. Regard for his friends will prompt the patient to aid in his own recovery, and at the same time economize their time and interest, by keeping the means of communication well open.

4. The obligation to let his light shine. This may seem to require more than is possible for a sick man. He is so weak and depressed, so concerned with physical aches and pains that, it would seem, he should be excused from philosophizing on the situation. It is foolish for him—or for anyone else—to be searching for high spiritual states and intimate religious experiences and testimonies. They are not apt to be found—and, if professed, are not likely to be very reliable. "I have lived my life and had my say; let me die in peace," was the rebuke of a dying saint to a self-constituted inquisitor seeking for a "last word." However, a man's life is a unit. In whatever condition he finds himself the foundations of his character and hope should stand sure. Much of our life is carried on without conscious willing. We choose and decide and set the machinery going—and much of the time it seems to run automatically. But the principles by which we are governed and the spirit in which we do our work are ours, and they are abiding. In our weakness—and, to some extent, even in our unconscious moments—it should be manifest that our souls are at rest in God.

LITTLE SISTER SWALLOW.

"Something must be done immediately," said Mamma Swallow to her little ones. "The nest, this morning, seems so very small and you so very large that I am afraid to have you stay in it longer. You must learn to fly."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" said Big Brother. "When can I begin?"

"Right away, you may begin," said Papa Swallow, coming up just then. "Fly right over to that limb over there."

With that, Big Brother spread his wings and flew. "That was so easy," he called back, as his feet touched the friendly branch.

"Come on, Young Brother. It's lots of fun."

"I'd like to try," said Younger Brother, as he stepped to the edge of the nest.

"Come on, then," called Big Brother. "I'll wait here for you."

So Younger Brother spread his wings and landed beside Big Brother.

"Come on, Little Sister," called both brothers. "It's really not hard at all," they coaxed.

Little Sister fluttered to the edge and then looked down. "Oh, it's so very far down, I'm afraid," she said.

"Don't be afraid," coaxed Big Brother. "Just try. We'll wait here for you."

"Do just as I do,—just this way," said Father Swallow.

"Just this way," said Mother Swallow.

"Don't be afraid, dear."

So Little Sister tried, but oh, dear me, she didn't quite reach the first limb. Instead she sank to the ground. There she flopped and fluttered in despair.

Just then a terrible sound came floating on the air, "Me-ow, me-ow," Louder it came. Nearer it came.

"Oh, Little Sister," called the brothers from above, "we'd help if we could."

"My child, my child," called Mother as she flew down to the ground. "I'll try to help lift you from this side."

"Keep calm, little one, I'm right here," said Father. "I'll lift on the other side."

Oh, how near that cat sounded now. All of them were so excited that they did not notice a boy who darted around the corner of the house just then. Quickly he dashed to the rescue of the little bird.

"I'll give you a boost. Now fly," and he tossed Little Sister high.

Little Sister flew. Strength came to her in this great emergency. Her wings carried her safely above reach of the disappointed cat. Mother, Father, Brothers, circled about her in the ecstasy of having her with them again.

"Me-ow, me-ow, I wanted that bird, I wanted that bird," whined the cat.

"Not a bird," said the boy, who was kind to all things, "not a bird, pussy. I'll take you to the house and give you a nice drink of milk." Whereupon he tossed pussy up onto his shoulder and walked away.

"Thank you, thank you," chattered the birds to their new friend. "Maybe we can do something for you some day."—Florence Houghton Prouty, in Junior Home Magazine.

HOW JANE SETTLED IT.

"Here comes mamma," said Janie. "O mamma! must I leave some of my candy for Grace?"

"I think a good little sister would."

"But Grace didn't give me any of hers yesterday."

"Didn't she? How did you like that?"

"I didn't like it at all. And I want to make her not like it, too, because I think she was real mean."

"Dear, dear! And is mamma to have two mean little girls, then?"

Janie looked at her mother and was quiet a minute. Then she ran and threw her arms around her neck and said: "No, no, mamma dear! You shall not have any mean little girls at all! I guess Grace forgot; and I'll go and give her some of my candy now, so she won't ever forget again!"

Her mother smiled. "I think that is the way to make her remember," she said. "And I am so glad I am to have two kind little girls."—Picture World.

TOBACCO FIRES DEMORALIZE BUSINESS.

A man engaged in the grocery business at Monrovia, Calif., in writing to a friend concerning a forest fire near there, which was started by a careless smoker, said:

"The cost of the fire was not limited to the cost of fighting the fire for nearly a month, but it absolutely demoralized business all over this valley. Hundreds of men were dragged away from their business almost without a moment's warning. Monrovia was stripped of its man-power. So far as carrying on business, we could just as well have closed up. Our sales dropped to almost nothing, yet our overhead expense went on, just the same."

How long will civilized communities stand for such foolishness as permitting smokers to invade forests? Or, for that matter, smoking at any time or place? The average smoker is habitually careless. Figuratively speaking he doesn't know how to spell the word "Thoughtfulness."

Forest fires in California in 1924, started by careless smokers, destroyed 270,000 acres of timberland, with a total loss of $1,700,000, not counting the cost of fighting the fires . . . estimated at $440,000. Careless smokers were responsible for 480 forest fires in Michigan in 1924, causing a loss of about $175,000.

The Boston Transcript says ash trays have been provided for men who smoke in bed, and asks: "Why not asbestos pajamas?" That wouldn't keep the bedclothing from burning, nor the building. Here is a better question:

Why Not Fire-Proof Cells In An Insane Asylum?

WHAT CAN A LITTLE CHAP DO?

What can a little chap do

For his country and for you?

What can a little chap do?

He can play a straight game all through:

That's one thing he can do.

He can fight like a knight

For the truth and the right;

That's another good thing he can do.

He can shun all that's mean,

He can keep himself clean,

Both without and within;

That's a very fine thing he can do.

His soul he can brace

Against everything base,

And the trace will be seen

All his life in his face;

That's an excellent thing he can do.

He can look to the light,

He can keep his thoughts white,

He can fight the great fight,

He can do with his might

What is good in God's sight;

Those are truly great things he can do.

Though his years be but few,

If he can keep himself true

He can march in the queue

Of the good and the great,

Who battled with fate

And won through;

That's a wonderful thing he can do.

And in each little thing

He can follow the King—

Yes, in each smallest thing

He can follow the King—

He can follow the Christ, the King.

"I AM NOT AT LEISURE."

I have read of that presented Antipater, the king of Macedon, with a book that treated of Happiness. He refused it, saying, "I am not at leisure." Many have the Book by them, yea, presented to them by Christ, that treats of everlasting happiness, but they slight the present. "I am not at leisure," say they. They have opportunity of hearing the Word opened on week days, as well as Sabbath days; but they are not at leisure. They have means of knowledge for hearing the same Word; but they are not at leisure. They have many precious seasons of grace, seasons of prayer, seasons of duty; but they are not at leisure. They take leisure to their own work, their worldly work, yea, for idle conversation; but they have no leisure for God's work, their soul's work, eternal work! Reader, have you leisure to be saved? or, are you willing to continue in the bustle of the world, neglect salvation, and be lost?—Ralph Erskine.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

The greatest Missionary field in the world is in the American cities. Greatest in the difficulties of the task, and greatest in potential results.

In Metropolitan New York there are now 2,000,000 people; 1,200,000 are children of school age, provided for in 1,500 public schools. In this area there are 2,000 Protestant churches. In the two central boroughs only about forty percent of the churches are entirely self-supporting. All the others receive financial aid from national, state, city, and various denominational societies and funds. The conquest of the city should not be left to the churches of the city. The organized religious forces of the city, and of the several denominations, should supplement the income of the churches in these strategic centers, when it becomes necessary to do so in order to carry out a needed program of community service. New York is presented because the problems are perhaps more fully developed in this city, but the same problems exist in a greater or lesser degree in cities of every class.

Contrasts might be made which would leave the church with a sense of failure, but all the facts will show that the church is grappling with its many problems in a successful manner. This article will present some of the responsibilities. The opportunities will be presented in a later discussion.

It is a fact that the larger the city grows the less commanding the position of leadership of the church. The church should march at the head of the forces of the city, and it can be done under proper leadership. The church in the business section of the city, does not equal its next door business competitor in the expertness with which its business is conducted. We have just begun our planning to meet conditions like these. No Protestant Church approaches the industrial populations with understanding, adaptability, or competency of leadership shown by various and labor organizations. No Protestant Church ministers to the foreign speaking people with the magnificence of building or adequacy of equipment to which they have been accustomed in their old world cathedrals, and rarely does Protestantism show the respect for genius and ability which the Roman Catholic Church has shown. With twenty American cities having a foreign population ranging from seventy to eighty-six percent a new emphasis is put upon the necessity of presenting an effective appeal to these new Americans.

Few Protestant Churches have made an attempt to provide an outstanding, commanding, and popular ministry for the throngs of transients in the city hotel and amusement districts. No counter attractions have been provided to offset the appeals of the commercialized agencies of leisure. It is a regrettable fact that the Protestant institutions which serve the unfortunate, the sub-normal, or the vicious, do not match those of the Roman Catholic Church either in size or impressiveness; and they often fail to reach the standards of hygienic and pedagogical excellence set by scientific agencies of charity and relief.

Here are tremendous responsibilities, and challenging opportunities for the Protestant Church of America.

Finances in Alamance County in 1924.

In 1924 the taxable property of Alamance county was estimated to be worth sixty million dollars and the assessed valuation at that date was $34,806,375.00. The county tax rate is $1.37, and there are 4,436 white polls in the county, with 950 negro polls. The cost of the present county-owned property is as follows: New Court House, $250,000.00; County Home, $75,000.00; County Stockade, $75,000.00; County Jail, $30,000.00. The total net debt of the county of Alamance is as follows: $2,033,636.41; which is divided as follows: bonded debt, $1,511,000.00; sinking fund $52,081.00; other indebtedness, $574,717.42

Churches of Alamance County.

The religious life of Alamance county has always been of a very high order. The earliest settlers brought with them their Bibles, and their love for morality and religion, and the religious development of the county has been notable in every decade of growth.

Throughout the county the numerous handsome churches with large membership testify to the universal high regard of the Alamance people for religion. Burlington, the largest town, has long been noted for its fine church buildings which would be a credit to cities of much larger size. To illustrate the interest of the people in religion we note the church activity of the three largest towns. In Graham, the county seat, we find churches as follows for the whites: (The membership mentioned is approximate for 1925.) Presbyterian, 300; M. E. Church, 300; Baptist, 275; New Providence, Christian, 250; M. P., 250; Quakers, 150; and for the colored race, A. M. E. Church, 125; Baptist, 100; Christian, 125; Presbyterian, 100. In Haw River—Baptist, 150; Christian, 200; M. E. Church, 150; M. P. Church, 140. In Burlington we find churches as follows Macedonia Lutheran, 275; First Reformed, 250; First Christian, 650; Holy Comforter Episcopal, 200; First Baptist, 750; Hocutt Memorial Baptist, 350; Front Street Methodist, 800; Webb Avenue Methodist, 300; West End Methodist, 200; First Presbyterian, 400; Elmira Presbyterian, 200; Piedmont Presbyterian, 100; East end Presbyterian, 75; First Methodist Protestant, 750; Fountain Place M. P., 75; Holiness, 100; and the colored churches of Burlington are as follows:—Christian, 450; Baptist, 250; Methodist, 75; mission points, 100.

School System of Alamance County.

Alamance has spent much money especially during the past ten years in bringing her school system up to date. Splendid graded systems are found in the towns and villages, and the county schools have been greatly improved by consolidation, transportation of children to centers and so forth. A number of handsome buildings throughout the county for the larger schools would be a credit to any city in the state. In addition to her excellent public school system the county of Alamance is fortunate in having a standard A-grade college within her borders, Elon College, at Elon with a group of buildings notable in the educational architecture of the entire South. The county has shown her appreciation of this college by joining in a general citizenship movement in building on the Elon College campus a magnificent building costing more than $100,000.00 known as the Alamance Building, a gift from hundreds of contributors to the educational work of this excellent institution.

Alamance county has 51 white public schools and 30 colored. Value of school property, white, $250,000; colored, $5,000; number of white teachers 145, colored 43; school children in Burlington 1976; Graham 735; Mebane 680; Haw River 525; outside of towns 6170, total for county 8954. School trucks 17; schools with over three teachers 11; total school fund for county $210,000; incorporated school districts Burlington, Graham, Haw River, and Mebane.

Alamance Roads and Highways.

Under the supervision of a county manager the county is rapidly developing her road system, and fine sand clay and hard surface roads are coming during these later years to connect all important places throughout the county, and thus adding untold benefits to the commercial and social possibilities of her citizenship. This work is being done after careful scientific surveys are made, and the large expenditures are being made with constant thought of the permanent results to be secured.

ADAM, WHICH WAS THE SON OF GOD.

This caption is a quotation from Luke 3:38. It is the last statement of the recorded genealogy of Jesus Christ, giving seventy-five generations, an average of about fifty-three years to the generation.

It is a most valuable record. It mentions, by name, the seventy-five ancestors of the human Christ, the first of whom is God. So God is the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ in the two-fold sense. As the second Person of the adorable Trinity Jesus Christ is the Son of God, eternally begotten of God the Father.

The claim of the evolutionists that Jesus Christ had an animal ancestry through millions of years is defiantly and absurdly untrue. This is a record of direct and immediate ancestry. God was the direct and immediate Ancestor, or Creator, of Adam; as much so as Adam was the direct and immediate ancestor of Seth. But unbelief is using the hypothesis of evolution to its utmost to discredit the Bible account of creation and thereby destroy the faith of mankind in the entire word of God. But this unholy conspiracy will not succeed. "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure." 2 Tim. 2:19.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

"GOD IN EVERYTHING."

We have Shakespeare as our authority that there are not only tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, but good in everything.

Sometimes we find it difficult to believe such a sweeping assertion, and even now we would make some exceptions. If we search thoroughly, however, we shall find that good often is found where we least expect it.

We have never had much love for the Roman Catholic Church, since we studied the history of the church preceding the days of the Reformation under Luther, and even now when we trace their schemes in Congress and at the seat of Government at Washington, we can see the signs of their skillful hand.

It is, however, refreshing to come across, now and then, the proof that even they sometimes rally around a good cause and try to lend their influence to help the cause of decency, at a time when indecency is undermining society and destroying the purity of our young men and women.

The Protestant Churches, with possibly a few exceptions, have denounced the modern dance; but such denunciation has generally been discounted by the charge of Puritanism and straight-laced piety. The world cried, "On with the dance! let joy be unconfined."

Recently we read a statement that the Archbishop of Quebec had called upon the faithful of his diocese to abhor the modern dance in its repugnant and suggestive embraces. Then the organ of the Vatican, at Rome, says that the increase in immorality and divorce is seriously augmented by these suggestive attitudes of the dance.

Among us in this country, it is not considered good taste to inveigh against the dance. It is a mark of false modesty and mockery. "Evil he who evil thinks," they quote, and in the meantime practices are indulged in that cannot bear the light of day, nor the ventilation of open discussion.

We therefore welcome the aid of our Roman Catholic brethren. The Pope exercises more authority than any man on earth. If he will forbid it, it will do more good than all the deliverances of Protestantism, not only because among his followers the evil is prevalent, but because his power reaches farther and is more despotic.

THE HOUR OF NEED.

Organized Christianity faces in this hour an unusually difficult situation. It has responsibilities under God for saving the world, and just now the world is in very great need of its beneficent and healing ministries. Opportunities for service were never so many nor so insistent. The call to the church is worldwide. For the first time in Christian history the organized church finds itself with sufficient resources in men and money to fulfill the command of Christ to go into all the world and Christianize all nations. For the first time in history, the doors to these nations are open. Yet with adequate resources the church of God stands by wide open doors and hesitates. God calls and the world calls. THE DEEPER SPIRITUALITY OF LIFE.

If Religion be the first thing, as well as the last, it is the most important matter of mankind. Every tendency to weaken moral obligation is to be deplored. One grave danger of our day is the tendency to atrophy the religious feeling. Ties binding men in spiritual organizations are sometimes lightly regarded and easily dissolved. Man needs to be stirred by appeal in behalf of faith and hope and love, to be moved to a closer relation to the world with its crying need, to realize that the strong should bear the burdens of the weak, and to a firm belief in the reality of the unseen. To proclaim Christ, to persuade souls to seek Him, and thus permit the principles of Jesus to dominate life, is the most far-reaching work in which man can engage. The religious life should signify that experience in which the power of God is felt, the Spirit of God manifested, and the love of God revealed. It should be the altar of our devotion, the hearth of our faith, the center of our affection, and the inspiration of our daily life. Religious instincts are as truly a part of our nature as are our appetites. Happy the individual who allows nothing to infringe upon his religious duty, and in whose life righteousness is the chief virtue.

The deeper the spiritual life the greater our sense of freedom. What is the secret of the Christian's peace? It is the triumph of the indwelling God. There is an abiding interest in Kingdom movements. When one Christian suffers, all are moved to pity. When one rejoices, all are happy. Spiritual power comes from complete surrender. We know a layman who seldom misses a Sunday in speaking publicly for Christ. There is nothing in his appearance to indicate the secret of his power. We look deeper—into his heart. His reports show complete reliance on the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Being in perfect sympathy with the high ideals of Christianity, he bears open witness to them at every opportunity. Many good people are on the outside of the church looking in. They ought to be on the inside looking out. In proportion as the spiritual life is developed, we shall find a real revival of love and loyalty to the Master, and those who possess such an experience will have the peace and power of souls who walk with God. Christ came to reveal God in a new light. He threw over life a new conception. He dignified the cross by making it the daily badge of service. Spiritual vision always calls for a radical change in head and heart. Jesus stands to-day as the moral Leader of humanity. We see as never before that every advance must be traced to His teachings. Christianity is Christ. God's power is exhibited in the spiritual world. The church is organized on the basis of eternal things. Only as we discern our Lord's moral requirements do we begin to make His reign possible in human hearts.

We cannot make Christ a mere abstraction and hold Him in the world's thought and love. Men demand reality. We are in the world to remind men of Jesus Christ. Some look at Christianity from a legal standpoint. They seek release. Others view it from the ethical side. They have been captured by the attraction of Christ's character and rise to follow Him. Assuming the Christian life signifies surrendering our own will and wish to God, entire sanctification has been defined as an intense desire not to have your own way. Life thus becomes so blended with Christ that He speaks and works through us, and His power reaches men through a new incarnation. A great French painting shows an old fisherman with powerful frame, his strong hand laid upon the oar as he puts out to sea. Beside him sat a little girl, and she is represented as putting her hands on the oar. It was her purpose to help grandfather row the boat. God permits us to put our weakness beside His strength, and thus help Him bring this world to Christ. We must not shut out the miraculous. We live in the dispensation of the Holy Spirit. We may witness it again and again—ten thousand times over—this miracle of faith. There is one hope for the world, one panacea, one solace, one consolation, one Redeemer. Faith in Him will behold the magic, the miraculous, every day. And when the chill waters men call death play about our feet, all that will matter will be how little we wavered in our faith.

The horses and the chariots were in the mountain before Elisha prayed for the young man's eyes to be opened. He did not argue; he prayed for insight into the world of spirit. Reason does much for faith. It makes ready the path within the soul. It explains, infers, combines, computes; but reason cannot do the work of God's grace. Spiritual vision never comes until the soul struggles for emancipation, and like the dying martyr of gospel times, sees the heavens opened and Jesus standing at the right hand of God. Devotion, singleness of purpose, brotherly love, spirituality—these are the standards we need to keep in view. God give us closer relations with the Holy Spirit! Then there will come the supernal joy of divine acceptance, and the inspiring purpose to obey the divine will in all things. The glory which was permitted to Moses, and the transfiguration before the three disciples, are typical of certain experiences which come to every devout soul. We need such hours to see things as they are. We often look through fogs and mists until everything becomes distorted. We must climb higher to get a closer view of truth. After vision comes service. The hour of sweet communion is followed by the time of testing as duty is faced. Our mountaintop experience will make us strong for the conflicts that await us. All such souls are white stars in our sky whose paths sweep upward to God. Every task finds them ready. Such beautiful characters, like silver bells, call us to worship. They shame the earth and shed over all the glory and power of immortality.—Selected.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, AUGUST 16.

The Flesh Against the Spirit.

Lesson Text: Gal. 5. 13-24.

Golden Text: Gal. 6:7.

The Central Truth: "To be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace."

Scriptural Points.

1. "Called unto liberty." This is the freedom from sin, its guilt, its corruption, its power, and its practice. James calls this gospel an experience of salvation, "the perfect law of liberty." It is also the liberty of sonship, a freedom of access and association with, and service for, God.

2. It is not the liberty to do wrong, to indulge carnal inclinations, or violate the moral law.

3. The gospel is the law of love written upon the heart by the Holy Spirit, and this law impels a service of uplift to fellow-mankind.

4. Unjust and injurious treatment of another is at to provoke the same sort of treatment in return. It is the law of the kingdoms of nature, sin, and grace that "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

5. "Walk in the Spirit," under His guiding influences and enabling power, and you will be able to restrain the desires of the flesh and live the clean, straight and exemplary life.

6. There is an uncompromising conflict between the fleshly nature and the Holy Spirit. So often the power of carnality is so strong that one is totally unable to perform the suggestions of his better nature. He has become a helpless slave to the Adamic nature. His only recourse for freedom and clean living is to yield heart and life to the Holy Spirit, who will subdue and mortify the unholy desires of the flesh.

7. To be "led of the Spirit" is to triumph over all sorts of sins, and these sins provoke the wrath of God and bar the individual from entrance into the kingdom of grace and glory.

9. Nine Christian graces are mentioned as the fruit of the Spirit. They are wrought in the soul by the power of the Holy Spirit in the experience of regeneration.

10. The crucifying or mortifying of the flesh with its affections and lusts is imperative in order to be a complete, well-rounded, and triumphant Christian. It is by the power of Christ's crucifixion as applied by the Spirit that any one is able to die to self and live unto God.

Practical Points.

1. The wonderful grace of God is sufficient either to keep the carnal mind in check or destroy it altogether. The latter is by far the most desirable disposition of this most frequent cause of offending. For it is better to kill the snake than to keep it caged.

2. Sin is not a necessity of being as some say it is. No one is physically constitutionally or by stress of surroundings bound to do wrong. People sin because they want to. The abolishment of the desire to sin and the substitution of the triumphant desire to do right is the supreme ideal of Christian experience.

3. Purity of heart and life demands the complete mortifying of the carnal mind. Holiness is really wholeness, the state of being whole, or altogether right and pure and good. The taking away of the least and last inclination to sin is necessary in order to perfect holiness in the fear of God.

4. The body of sin must be crucified with Christ before the soul can rise into the fullness of life. Likewise reckon ye yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin; but alive unto God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

OBSCURER MARTYRS.

They have no place in storied page;

No rest in marble shrine;

They are past and gone with a perished age,

That died and "made no sign."

But work that shall find its wages yet,

And deeds that their God did not forget,

Done for their love divine—

These were their mourners, and these shall be
The crowns of their immortality.

Oh, seek them not where sleep the dead,

Ye shall not find their trace;

No graven stone is at their head,

No green grass hides their face;

But sad and unseen is their silent grave—

It may be the sand or the deep sea wave,

Or a lonely desert place;

For they need no prayer and no mourning bell

They are tombed in true hearts that knew them well.

They healed sick hearts till theirs were broken,

And dried sad eyes till theirs lost sight;

We shall know 't last by a certain token

How they fought and fell in the fight.

Salt tears of sorrow unhehld,

Passionate cries unchronicled,

And silent strifes for the right—

Angels shall count them, and earth shall sigh
That she left her best children to battle and die.

—Sir Edwin Arnold.

THE GLORY OF A NATION.

The glory of a nation lies, not in her worldly wealth, her force of arms, or her wisdom of diplomacy, but in the ability of her people to understand and know God. . . . Nations having all these three glories have fallen before the north wind of God. The memory of the glory of Greece and the grandeur that was Rome reminds us that these are not everything. . . . Religion is something ethical,—that is, to know God in history and in life as doing loving-kindness and right. Religion is to imitate God, to know Him spiritually and to apply this knowledge to daily life. Jeremiah says that to take delight in love, justice, and righteousness is to know God. . . . But now on the face of the thing, the wise man who glories in his wisdom, the powerful man who glories in his might, the rich man who glories in his wealth, are these not pitiful ideals when placed against the spiritual majesty of our Master? What a rebuke Christ is to us, to the things men glory in! . . . It is not wisdom, power, or wealth that I deplore, it is the exaggeration of them that is bad. They are the sinking sands of our lives. They are the things that men sell their souls for. But cannot buy love. . . . To fulfill the chief end of life we need more. The glory of man is spiritual or it is nothing. Seek God, and these other glories will fall into line in their proper places.—Selected.

OUR HOME.

This world is not our home. We were born for heaven, and must enter it here and now if we would enter it hereafter. But where is heaven? The Lord answers, "The kingdom of God is within you." It is within us. And the description of Canaan is meant to convey some idea of it to us: "The land whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out. . . . But the land. . . . is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven." The promised land is a land of mountains and valleys. We know what this means when we have set our hearts on keeping the King's laws, have chosento do the will of the Lord as the chief object in life. At once we ascend the heights that formerly lay in the distance. We saw them afar off; now we scale them. We find in the Lord's life a high and noble standard of life which we strive to reach. We draw near unto God. We are far above the earth, on the mountain top. . . . Entrance into the heavenly life here on earth brings with it exaltation and humiliation. At times we feel the elation of a conquest over self in the Lord's name, and at other times the deep depression of trial and temptation, with its doubts and fears, and uncertainty as to what we can do or ought to do. But the Lord always sends His refreshing truth according to our needs and again draws us nearer to Himself. And through every experience we feel that the Lord is always present with us and providing for our highest needs.—Selected.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS IN THE NATION'S LIFE.

In order to secure the judgment of some of the outstanding leaders of Protestant thought and life in America as to the value of religious journalism and the importance of the church paper in the homes of the country, the Editorial Council of the Religious Press, through Rev. Paul S. Leinbach, its president, has brought together a remarkable body of recent testimonies. The Editorial Council was initiated by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to promote the interests of religious publications and to serve as a center for exchange of experience among the editors.

Among the many significant declarations concerning the place of the religious journal, are the following:

I.

From Hon. Gifford Pinchot, Governor of Pennsylvania:

"I am glad to add my endorsement to the value of religious literature in the home and church. The influence of the church should not be confined to Sunday, but should make itself felt throughout the whole week. Church publications of the right kind are a most valuable help toward this end."

II.

From Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, pastor of Broadway Tabernacle, New York City:

"I am a steadfast friend of the Religious Press, and am a firm believer in its usefulness. It is performing an indispensable service to our churches, and I regret that so many people fail to appreciate its value. The efficiency and enthusiasm of many professing Christians would be immeasurably augmented by the faithful reading of some religious weekly."

III.

From Henry Churchill King, president of Oberlin College:

"I quite agree with you that it is well to emphasize just now the value of religious journalism and the importance of having a strong paper of some kind in the homes of our Protestant people."

IV.

From Bishop William F. McDowell, Washington, D. C.

"I suppose there would be no question at all about the value of pure household food in an American family. The singular thing is that many families are very careful about the food they eat and utterly reckless about the literature they read; careful about the food they supply their children and utterly reckless about the magazines, books and papers which get into their children's hands. The current revelations as to the literature on sale in the news stands all over the country are appalling. If these revelations mean anything, they ought to mean a new appreciation of the importance of Christian literature, especially periodical literature. I do not see how our churches and families can possibly be at their best without it."

V.

From Dr. Francis J. McConnell, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.:

"Every day of my experience as a church administrator increases my sense of the value of religious journalism. Much well-intentioned and serious minded religious feeling is at the present time failing to make any strong impact for good, through sheer lack of religious information and education. The grossest misunderstandings abound, the most inadequate conceptions prevail, simply because the people are depending on secular newspapers and magazines for information concerning religious matters. I would be the last to disparage the importance of such secular publications. They are doing an indispensable work, but their utterances are lamentably lacking in the realm of religious thought. Nothing has taken the place of the distinctively religious paper as a medium of imparting information and of creating sound religious understanding. If the Religious Press is not supported, we shall experience a great lack in religious effort—a lack which nothing but the religious press can fill."

VI.

From Dr. Merton S. Rice, minister of the Metropolitan M. E. Church, Detroit:

"If the same religious forces of our country would make as enthusiastic endeavors with the circulation of their literature as do those who become enamored with freak ideas under the head of religion, we would soon see our country aflame with influential journalism."

VII.

From Dr. Robert E. Speer, secretary Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.

"I believe with all my heart in the value of the religious press and lament all the more on that account that we have so few religious papers which are able to maintain themselves and which approach the Christian ideal."

"I remember so vividly the influence in our home, when I was a boy, of the 'New York Independent' in the days of Mr. Bowen, and 'The Presbyterian' in the days of Dr. Muchmore. There was a great deal in these papers that was beyond us but there were pages in them that were within our comprehension, and as the years went on, the number of these pages increased."

"I think we ought to put forth every effort today to maintain our religious papers and to lift them to a still higher level of effectiveness and Christian spirit."

VIII.

From Dr. Alexander MacColl, pastor Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia:

"The Religious Press has a sphere all its own by reason of the irritating inaccuracy of the daily newspapers, their assignment of callow youths to discuss the most vital matters of faith and life, and their habitual emphasis upon the more sensational features of church life. For this reason, our church papers should be heartily supported by all Christians who think it important to keep informed about the affairs of the Kingdom. Many of the most serious problems of church life today come from a lack of accurate information, especially among the laity. Of course if the religious paper is to be supported, it must not only be pious but interesting, highly intelligent and inspiring. Its editorial policy must be persistently constructive, never aggressively divisive. All church papers will be likely to suffer so long as certain so-called religious papers are kept alive by controversial groups within the church for the purpose of misrepresenting all who in the least degree differ with them."

IX.

From Dr. Ernest M. Stires, rector St. Thomas' Episcopal Church, New York City, bishop coadjutor-elect of Long Island:

"The value of the religious paper in the home depends upon its contents and upon the intelligent and attractive setting forth of the material it contains. The mind and spirit need nourishment quite as much as the body, and I am convinced that there is a real desire in the homes of our land for religious literature which is interesting, instructive, stimulating. Those who are providing such reading are rendering a service of the highest importance, and thoughtful mothers and fathers for their own sakes and for the sake of their children, will take care that amid all of the reading which is merely amusing or entertaining, there shall be found religious literature which shall inform and nourish, and which should persuade for high thinking and right living."

X.

From Dr. M. Ashby Jones, pastor Ponce de Leon Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga.:

"With the ever increasing numbers of those who are entering the membership of our churches, and the multiplying of the ministries of the church, the religious journal becomes an ever more vital necessity. It is necessary for the actual dissemination of the news of the current activities of the churches all over the world. Great enterprises depend for their support upon a sympathetic knowledge on the part of their constituents. Possibly the most important function of the religious journal is to give the disciple of Jesus the Christ-standpoint from which to view life itself. Such a journal should become the interpreter of current history in terms of the Christ-principles and the Christ-ideal."

XI.

From Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, minister Madison Ave. Presbyterian Church, New York City:

"Some church papers are admirable and keep people posted as to the work of their communion and of the Church universal, and foster a spirit of Christian sympathy and generosity. I should be very glad to endorse most heartily those Church papers which make for Christian unity and liberty and love."

XII.

From Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor Central Methodist Episcopal Church, Detroit, Mich.:

"Personally, I feel that if it were possible to develop a genuine interest in the best books and magazines which are being produced by our religious press, in every home which is nominally Christian, the whole of our American life would be profoundly changed for the better in a generation. I cannot think of any one thing which would do more for the deepening and enriching our whole national life, and what it would mean to the homes and individuals who make up our Republic is quite beyond computation."

XIII.

From Dr. John Grier Hibben, president Princeton University:

"I feel that the great need of the Protestant families in our country is a paper which will avoid all the acrimonious and controversial questions of the day and give itself to the constructive activities of the Protestant Church, I believe that such a paper, emphasizing the unity of the Protestant denominations, and having as its policy the endeavor to bring together in a spirit of cooperation the allied forces of Protestantism, will find a place for itself in the Protestant families of our country."

XIV.

From Dr. Karl Reiland, rector St George's Church, New York City:

"I regard religious journalism as of the utmost importance at this time and of great importance at any time. Especially do I think there is great need of liberal religious journalism—fearless, constructive and free. This question of Science and Religion will not down and should not down until definite values have been gained that are clearly in the transition which is taking place. The trouble with people is, they do not think. In religion especially the people have allowed the leaders to do their thinking for them and religious leaders have become intellectually lazy."

"The attitude of religious people is sickly and anaemic as contrasted with the attitude of the same people toward medicine and the practical uses of modern mechanics and scientific material in other fields. Jesus was right: 'The children of the world are wiser in their generation than the children of light.' There seems to be something about spirituality as it is used that makes for consecrated stupidity. Religious journalism has got to lead in the transition for religion, but with a scientific understanding and a scientific method."

MOTHER.

Mother of the smiling eyes,
Love-illuminated, kindly wise,
Heaven's goodness shines straight through
Those clear orbs of softest blue;
To your deeply furrowed face
They impart an angel's grace.
Mother of the helping hand,
There are few in all the land
With so many friends and true;
Those who know you, love you too.
Poor folks, rich folks, all agree
You've a heart of sympathy.
Mother of the silver hair,
You have borne a weight of care,
But have never lost your zest
For the game of life, possessed
Of that gift of childhood joy
Which no hardship can destroy.
But, to sum it up, no other
Takes the place of you, our mother.

ARE WE DISTRIBUTING AGENTS?

Good things should be universal in their distribution. A men's Bible class was recently giving the reasons the Gospel should not be withheld from the heathen until there are no longer any "heathen" at home. One member of the class answered by giving an illustration. He said that if he were manufacturing some new invention which was evidently destined to be a blessing to mankind, he would be foolish to decide not to sell any of his products outside the city in which it was manufactured until every person in that city had purchased it. The good news of salvation is the best blessing any human being can have, and it is sinful to seek to confine it to any particular locality until every individual there has accepted it. Our commission as Christians is to let every human being know that Christ has died for him and that there is not salvation for him in any other name under heaven given among men. Are we doing our part as "selling agents" or distributors for the blessings of the Gospel?—Selected.

GEN. GRANT AND THE MULE DRIVER.

In 1864, at City Point, Va., the general of the army one day strolled along the wharf, and seeing a big, raw-boned teamster belaboring one of his wheel-mules with a billet of wood, and cursing him roundly, he quietly said:

"My man, stop beating that mule." Rawney looked around at the little, unostentatious appearing person in a plain blouse and answered,

"Say, be you driving these here mules, or be I?" and bat, crack, again went the cudgel, the mule dodging, and jumping the tongue.

"Well," said the general, "I think I have sufficient authority here to stop your cruelty to that animal;" and turning to the officer in charge of the train, he ordered him to have the teamster "tied up" for twenty-four hours when he returned to camp, and report the fact to his head-quarters when done. The news spread rapidly from camp to camp, and there was much less mule-mauling after that.

A good many men, and some boys, would treat mules and even old horses differently if they had General Grant to oversee them. Do they forget that God sees them, and that he says "Every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills?"—Selected.

OUR HEROES.

Here's a hand to the boy who has courage
To do what he knows to be right.
When he falls in the way of temptation
He has a hard battle to fight.
Who strives against self and his comrades
Will find a most powerful foe.
All honor to him if he conquers,
A cheer to the boy who says, "No!"

There's many a battle fought daily
The world knows nothing about.
There's many a brave little soldier
Whose strength puts a legion to rout.
And he who fights sin single-handed
Is more a hero, I say,
Than he who leads soldiers to battle
And conquers by arms in the fray.

Be steadfast, my boy, when you're tempted;
To do what you know to be right,
Stand firm by the colors of manhood,
And you will overcome in the fight.
"The right," be your battle cry ever
In waging the warfare of life,
And God, who knows who are the heroes,
Will give you strength for the strife.

OUR CHILDREN IN HIS COURTS.

By Alice W. Frary.

Though I would not hold young children to all the older-fashioned Sabbath regulations, of one I would not deprive them. To have the family habitually in church on Sunday morning is not in most cases achieved without effort, but I believe that effort to be richly repaid. Not that this is a plea for having babies brought to a service which can scarcely fulfill its high purpose if marred by restlessness. That is unfair both to the occupants of the neighboring pews and to the children themselves. But when they are old enough and strong enough to attend school, their mental as well as their spiritual life may be the richer for church attendance also. Sabbath school at best offers instruction rather than inspiration. Valuable as that instruction is to their development when it is well given, I believe the atmosphere of a reverent church service of even greater value.

Few intelligent children will fail to be impressed by the dignity of public worship. Occasional attendance will have its influence, but unvarying, unquestioned participation will give religious thought a definite place in their scheme of things. Hymns can be made to mean much to them; they will gradually reach up to grasp parts of the spoken service; they will learn to give sustained attention even though it requires effort. The hour of bodily quiet in such surroundings is conducive to fruitful thought.

Their after-service chatter may not be indicative of the impress of the hour, for little people are as reticent as we about their inmost thoughts. The little girl of Mary Lyon's day who said she "loved to sit in church to look at Miss Lyon's hat" may have shocked her mother, but her words probably in no sense measured her reaction to the character of the face beneath the decorous velvet bonnet.

Far better continued absence from church than attendance for the sake of respectability or from mere habit. Our children can learn, if we will take the trouble to teach them, how to take a responsive attitude of mind into the service. We must plan ahead, hold the idea before them like a banner through the week, insist upon early Saturday bedtime, refrain from criticism of the service, ourselves worship sincerely.

Yes, I know grown-ups who have reacted against habitual church attendance in their childhood. But knowing so many others who have found in it strength and serenity for the "varying vicissitudes" of the intervening days, I feel that we cannot fairly withhold it from our children.—Christian Advocate.

SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.
The Will of God.

Text: "Thy will be done." Matt. 6:10.

There is a God because God has created the heavens and the earth and all that is in them. "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth his handiwork." These things could not have created themselves. A created being, not even the wisest and most powerful of the human species, could have created them. Only God could have created them therefore there is a God.

There is a God because God has spoken. He has spoken into the ears and hearts of angel and men. He spoke to Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and all the prophets. He has thereby revealed Himself. His will, man's sin, man's duty, and man's destiny. He still speaks through nature, providence and the Holy Spirit.

And there is a God because God has saved. Selfsalvation and selfrighteousness are impossibilities. The dead in trespasses and sins cannot bring about his own resurrection. The dead is helpless to do anything. The mighty God alone can save. Millions have testified that God has saved them. Therefore there is a God.

God has expressed His will to govern the conduct of all His creatures. The lower order of moving creatures are governed by that declaration of His will called instinct. But intelligent beings, such as men and angels, are given a set of principles, rules and regulations to guide their conduct and destiny. They are given a freedom to be governed by them or not. They have the choice to serve God or not. This will of God as given in the holy scriptures is wise, good, and holy.

We will first notice that

The Will of God Is Wise.

Since the omniscient God is the fountain of all wisdom His will that flows therefrom must be all-wise. For the stream must be like its source. His revealed will embodies the wisest thoughts of God. The depth of this wisdom is unsearchable. No finite mind can grasp all the will of God. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgements, and how ways past finding out!" The wisdom of the divine will is the source of all human wisdom. Men think their best thoughts after God. The creation, the Bible, and the plan of salvation are calculated to provoke deep thinking, noble acting, and correct living. Where the Bible has gone people have risen to high levels of lectual life and achievements. "The entrance of thy words giveth light."

In the next place

The Will of God Is Good.

"The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." The Father of mercies has willed an adequate supply to meet the needs of all living things. "The lions roar after their prey and seek their meat from God."

Nature is an ordered plan to supply food, clothing, and protection. Plant life is designed to meet the needs of animal life; and animal life along with plant life meets the needs of the life of man. Nature is one of God's channels of bestowing blessing upon the human race. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of light, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

Special providences, operating along with nature and above nature, are exercised to meet special needs. The rain of manna, the feeding of Elijah by the ravens, the angel and the multiplying of the widow's meal and oil, and the marvellous increase of the loaves and fishes are instances of the special providences of God outside of and above the ordinary channels of nature. "All things work together for good to them that love God."

And lastly

The will of God Is Holy.

God has willed the salvation and eternal well being of the fallen race. This will is expressed in law and gospel. In the law there is the correct and safe rule of conduct. In the Gospel there are the provisions and conditions of personal and eternal salvation. "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

"The law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ." The evident fact that all have broken the law make salvation imperative. "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. In salvation there is enabling power to keep the law of God. One must have the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost given unto him before he is able to love God with all his heart, mind, soul and strength."

Purity of heart and life is salvation in its fulness or completeness. To be holy is to be wholly saved. Holiness is the full likeness to God. For He has said: "Be ye holy, for I am holy." To be complete in the christian graces is a most commendable ideal. "For it is the will of God, even your sanctification."

—The Word of Life.

McKINLEY'S DYING PRAYER.

In the afternoon of his last day on earth the President began to realize that his life was slipping away, and that the efforts of science could not save him. He asked Dr. Rirey to bring the surgeons in. One by one the surgeons entered and approached the bedside. When they were gathered about him the president opened his eyes and said:

"It is useless, gentlemen; I think we ought to have prayer."

The dying man crossed his hands on his breast and half closed his eyes. Tears streamed from the eyes of the white-clad nurses on either side of the bed. The yellow radiance of the sun shone softly in the room.

"Our Father which art in Heaven," said the President in a clear steady voice.

The lips of the surgeons moved.

"Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done—"

The sobbing of a nurse disturbed the still air. The President opened his eyes and closed them again.

"Thy will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven."

A long sigh. The sands of life were running swiftly. The sunlight died out, and rain drops dashed against the windows.

"Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Another silence. The surgeons looked at the dying face and the friendly lips.

"For Thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory forever."

"Amen," whispered the surgeons.—Selected.

TAKING STOCK.

It is good and profitable to stop, from time to time, and take stock of what we have. In industry the inventory is taken once or twice each year. How much has been accomplished from period to period, is the important question.

As money represents the working capital in commerce and industry, faith is the working capital in Christianity. The calendar year is almost spent; as stewards of the Lord, let us take stock and render to him our account.

How much faith had we last January? Tell me that, and we may together list our assets now.

Paul informs us that "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," and James takes it out of the poetical setting and states it in this way: "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show you faith by my works." Hannah More has exemplified it once more in meter. She says:

"If faith produces no works, I see
That faith is not a living tree.
Thus faith and works together grow;
No separate life they e'er can know.
They're soul and body, hand and heart;
What God hath joined, let no man part."

AIMS TO BE UNDERSTOOD.

I have been referred to as a former evangelist. I want it distinctly understood that I am not an ex anything. What I was I am. Frankly, taking you Kiwanians into my confidence, one reason I have never been ordained to preach, I have wanted to feel free as a layman to help lick the fellow who jumps on preachers; whenever I hear a blind, stingy parasite say that "a preacher always hears the call where the biggest salary is," I want to be free as a layman to lash him with my tongue or crack him with my crutch and remind him that he is one of the "nuts" that do not pay him any salary. When I hear another blind parasite say that "preachers' children are the worst children in the world," I like to be free as a layman to look him in the face and tell him "without mental reservation or purpose of evasion" that he is an unmitigated fool or an unfumigated liar—either or both. If one child of a preacher goes wrong, you tell the world; but you hear nothing of the ninety and nine who live on in the modest beauty and the conquering glory of their God-fearing lives, going out from the sacred influences of family altars and sacrificial parental example, making a positive gulf stream of blessing through the social, spiritual, educational, and political life of the nation, fructifying every shore that it touches.—Congressman Upshaw.

SARCASM OR HUMOR: A STUDY IN CONTRASTS.

Sarcasm exasperates; humor is oil on the sea of life.

Sarcasm writes the "Not Wanted" sign on the walls of life; humor opens a channel adown which many refreshing streamlets flow.

Sarcasm is a door closer; humor is a door opener.

Sarcasm says to opportunity, "Keep out!" Humor says to opportunity, "Come in!"

Sarcasm is a life shortener; humor is a life lengthener.

Sarcasm pounces on the mistakes or failings of another as a tiger pounces on his prey; humor, delightful humor, takes the sting out of failure.

Sarcasm is like the drippings of the gloomiest day of the calendar year; humor is like the sunshine when the heavens are "deeply, darkly, beautifully blue."

Sarcasm is as undesirable and as dangerous as a flash of lightning; humor is as desirable as the electric light.

Sarcasm subtracts from usefulness; humor adds to it.

Sarcasm dries up the springs of human kindness; humor increases the flow.

Sarcasm grinds down a mind until there is nothing left but the cutting edge; humor gives a smooth edge for effective work.

Sarcasm is a stumbling block; humor is often a stepping-stone.

The toadstools of sarcasm are as valueless as the mushrooms are valuable. Which will you cultivate?—Selected.

The best theology—A pure and beneficent life. The best medicine—Cheerfulness and temperance.

ANSWER TO LAST WEEK'S PUZZLE.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Friendship, Haw River Ct.—Our protracted meeting closed last Tuesday night, having lasted a week and two days. During these days many were converted and eight received into the church. Sunday morning was a beautiful service when a family so well known in this community came penitently to the altar. Later they joined the church. We feel that this meeting has helped the whole community. But let us pray together that we may not drift aside from its influence.

Our children's service has been postponed until this late hour because of so much sickness among the children and for other reasons. But we hope to have it soon. The date will be announced later.

Herald readers, pray for the upbuilding of this church. It will help us greatly.

Lelia Wagner, Reporter.

Mt. Zion.—We have been wonderfully and bountifully blessed since we reported last. A lot of good things have come to us. Our revival meeting closed Saturday with the eleven o'clock service. At the last service 25 new members came into Mt. Zion church. In all there were about 35 professions and reclamations. We all thought we knew Bro. Gerringer was a real good revival preacher—which he is, but he improves every sermon. We certainly have been lucky that he was with us.

On Friday evening at 7 o'clock Rev. Lawrence Little addressed the young people. We had a packed house of just young people for him and we all enjoyed so much his address. Mr. Little promised us his coming back to Mt. Zion some time in the near future and talk to our young people again.

Our pastor is still doing some wonderful work; hardly seems to us that he grows older. He has won the hearts of the young people and most of the older ones anew by being instrumental in placing a real piano in Mt. Zion church.

Our Sunday school is doing fine work; 174 were present two weeks ago and 112 last Sunday. The last words Bro. Gerringer left with us were something like this: "I have been mighty glad to be with you people at Mt. Zion. I have enjoyed it to the extent that I hope you may call me again soon—but listen! When I come again I hope you will have some Sunday school rooms to take care of this crowd of children and young folks." We enjoyed everything Bro. Gerringer said, but he touched the keynote when he said "Sunday school rooms."

On Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock the Workers' Council will meet with Bro. I. G. Barber. On Friday at 3 P. M. the Ladies' Missionary will meet at the church.

Say! you Shoals, Pinnacle, Pilot, and Mt. Zion folks, how about giving Bro. Hunter a month's vacation when his revivals are over?

C. W. Allen, Reporter.

Matthews Chapel, Greenville Ct.—On the fourth Sunday in July our special meeting began. Bro. Powell preached for us on Sunday, and Monday Bro. R. S. Troxler came to our aid and preached for us until Thursday afternoon. We feel so fortunate in having with us Bro. Troxler. He came to us filled with wonderful messages, and we cannot express in words the joy we received from them. I am sure all who heard him were benefited and feel nearer to the Lord who has so wonderfully blessed us.

We hope if it is the Lord's will we may have the privilege of having him with us again sometime.

The third quarterly conference will be held here next Saturday. The W. H. M. S. will meet at our church on the second Sunday evening at 8 o'clock. We are inviting all members to be present and bring some one with you. We feel it will help you and we hope to make the program interesting and pleasant for you.

Our Sunday school is doing nicely at the present time, but we didn't have any school last Sunday as most of our people worshiped with the good people at Hobbs Chapel, and enjoyed the splendid services by Brothers O'briant and Powell.

Brunswick, Va., Aug. 3.

Gibsonville.—Gibsonville Methodist Protestant Church has just closed a three-week daily vacation Bible school with an enrollment of 129. The hand work of the school will go to the M. P. Children's Home. The pastor acted as director of the school and was ably assisted by Mrs. W. J. Jennings, Miss Nellie Jones, Mrs. Frank Owen, Mrs. Clapp, and Mrs. Dick. The school was pronounced a great success by its patrons and the entire community as well.

Fountain Pouce Church has let contract for its new Sunday school rooms, work has already begun and when completed will be a fine modern Sunday school plant and will relieve the embarrassing condition under which the school has worked since its organization a year ago. Total cost when furnished will be about $12,000. This church is making fine progress along all lines, and will pay all the claims.

Gibsonville-Fountain Place charge has elected H. W. Wade as delegate and G. J. Yow as alternate to the ensuing annual conference meeting in High Point Nov. 4th.

Glen Raven and Haw River.—Our special meeting began at Haw River Monday night after the first Sunday in July and ran over second Sunday. Bro. G. H. Hendry was our pulpit help; he did all the preaching and did it well. I feel sure his sermons were enjoyed by all that heard him. We had a very good meeting. Several conversions; six members received as a result of the meeting.

Our third quarterly meeting was held at Haw River July 18; the usual business was transacted. Bro. C. D. Suits was elected delegate to Annual Conference; he is a member of Haw River. T. A. Williams.

Liberty, Siler City Charge.—Quite a good many things have happened since a report has gone from our church. Our Sunday school has kept up well during the hot weather.

Children's day exercises were held the 4th Sunday night. The children rendered their parts well. They were trained by Mesdames Charlie Smith and Jack Crowson and Misses Bertine Shepherd and Lora Bowman.

Our special meeting will begin the 1st Sunday in September.

Pray that we may have a good revival this year; each member get a clearer vision of service also that sinners be brought to Christ.

Sincerely,

Bertine Shepherd.

Greer, S. C.—A few weeks ago I wrote that I was going to spread the rich butter of M. P.ism all over this section. We have not as yet covered all the territory we expect to cover. But we would like the readers of our good little Herald to know about the good meeting we just closed at Fairview.

Fairview is located on the Anderson circuit about 4 miles from Easley, S. C., a country church. We started our meeting July 26 and ran over two Sundays. Things looked very discouraging in the beginning. The church was cold spiritually. No life, no fire, no action. But after a few nights of faithful hard preaching we noticed life began to show among the dead bones. Directly we had a strong arm with every man in his place, praying and encouraging the pastor. The result is that we came to the mourners' bench and prayed there to definite victory. The people at Fairview are great believers in old-time shouting religion, and sure enough when they get it they manifest it in this manner. It was a blessing to see: mothers praying with their children, fathers praying with their sons. It seemed to be in style to hug or shout in the meeting. Some of the elderly folk remarked that it seemed like old times had come back to Fairview. Thank God for some old-fashioned Christians, some who believe that Jesus is the same yesterday, today, and forever.

What is more beautiful than to see a sinner weep his way thru to God. I would soon see this in this age and time than anything else that I know of. The pastor himself was raised and fed on Methodism. It seems to digest well. Sixty-eight professions with a promise to unite with our church; among them the best citizens in the community, with another list to join in a short time.

With faith in Jesus and a love for M. P.ism, Yours for True Gospel, R. G. Koons.

No. 10 Township Sunday school Convention

The convention was held at the Midway Baptist Church Thursday, July 30. The morning session consisted of songs, solos, and duets by the Bethel Sunday school. The most attractive and inspiring part of this program was a beautiful pageant. The good ladies who assisted the children in the preparation of the pageant are worthy of much honor.

This was followed by an inspiring address by the pastor of the First M. P. Church, Concord; his subject, The Advantages of Rural Sunday School. Pine Bluff made the best record in attendance for the year; enrolled, 138; average attendance, 94. Bethel next; on roll, 202; average attendance, 85.

The afternoon session was devoted to songs by the Chaney Hill choir and Pine Bluff. Then an address by Mr. Charles Ritchie, Concord, N. C. His talk was well enjoyed and appreciated by all.

The following officers were elected for the next year: J. E. Jenkins, Vice President, E. Mabry, Secretary and Treasurer; M. own (Bogers Church), Supt. Adult Division; O. B. Furr, Supt. Young People's Div.; Mel Eudy, Supt. Children's Division. The next convention will be held at Bogers Thursday before the 4th Sunday in July, 1926.

J. E. Jenkins, President.
L. E. Mabry, Sec. & Treas.

Hickory Grove.—Hickory Grove Sunday school enjoyed a picnic at the Guilford Battle Ground Wednesday evening, July 29, 1925. Many games were played by the young folks while the older ones prepared the lemonade and had friendly chats. The Rev. Mr. Whitaker, wife, and daughter were present. Mr. Whitaker made a short talk on "Right Living." He said that we always got as much of life as we put into it—that much and more. The sixty members present then gathered around the table, and after asking God to bless the food, ate as all picnic crowds do—like they never expect to eat again. Next came the foot races, both old and young running made the races very amusing. At the beginning one person would compete with one other; but at the end when ice cream was to be served there were 60 competitors, each person competing with 59 others. Unfortunately a few people were too late for everything except the serving of cream. Separated, some going one way and some another. The truck load of young people returned through Greensboro, the longer way, which made the evening complete for them.

High Point.—Last Sunday morning Doctor Brown delivered a beautiful sermon based on text from Psalm 21: 3—"For thou predestinest him with the blessings of goodness." The word "prevent" is here used in the sense of anticipate, and Dr. Brown said that God in His infinite love and care for His children anticipated every need and desire. Before we were born, He created this beautiful, wonderful world with its manifold blessings of sky, sea, mountains, rocks, soil, rivers, element, and all the riches of nature, for the use and comfort of man. Into the hearts of our parents he instilled mother love and eternal care in anticipation of our advent to their homes. What wonderful foresight and benign goodness! Truly this sermon was of greatest comfort and consolation to hearts oppressed and grieved by these present controversies of doubt and unbelief. The missionary societies both foreign and home held their August meeting at the church Sunday afternoon. A very interesting program was presented by Mrs. L. J. Diffie and Mr. C. W. Vance, who gave readings, and Mr. A. M. Rankin gave a delightful talk on "The Home near Weaverville." The Home Society secured some additional pledges to a scholarship in High Point College and the sum of $6 was paid for this purpose. The man Drew school at Pine Ridge, Ky., was forgotten, and the contribution amounted to $7, of which Dr. and Mrs. Brown donated $5. We were sorry to miss Mrs. W. P. Kett from the meeting—she has served long and faithfully as treasurer of the Foreign Missionary Society, but was kept at home by illness. The September meeting will be held at the home of Mrs. W. L. Kivett, two miles east of the city.

At the morning service last Sunday the congregation enjoyed a duet, "In the Cross of Christ I Glory," by two promising young singers, Misses Dorothy Hoskins and Margaret Gurley. They will be students at the College next year.

The officers and teachers of the Sabbath school will hold an important meeting Tuesday evening. The Sunday school will hold its annual picnic and outing at Ritter's Lake near Greensboro Wednesday afternoon. The cars will leave town about 1:30 and it is hoped that a large number of the pupils and their parents and friends will attend with full baskets. The committee on arrangements, Messrs. J. W. Hinkle and J. D. Koonce, and Messdames C. L. Gray and C. C. Robbins, is planning for a splendid outing. On account of this picnic there will be no mid-week prayer meeting on Wednesday evening.

The A. M. Idol Philathea Class and Circle No. 4 of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society will hold a joint meeting Thursday evening at 8 o'clock with Miss Pearl Reynolds on Fourth St. The young people and children of the church are being lined up for missionary study and work.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Reitzel have returned from a honeymoon of four weeks spent in the mountains of western N. C. and are at home at the Reitzel residence on N. Main St. Mrs. Reitzel before her marriage June 27th was Miss Lily Nelson Mason, of Durham, and a most cordial welcome is extended to her by the countless friends of her husband.

Dr. S. S. Coe has returned from a vacation spent at Whitelake and Myrtle Beach, S. C.

Mr. and Mrs. Leigh Harper (nee Miss Lucy Oakes) have returned from their wedding, and are at home for the present with Mr. and Mrs. H. U. Oakes on Euniss St.

Dr. Brown attended the exercises of cornerstone laying of the handsome Grace church last week.

Reitzel Reunion.

The seventh annual Reitzel Reunion will be held at Richland church, about four miles east of Liberty, N. C., on Thursday, August 20, 1925.

All persons related to the Reitzel family, either by blood or marriage, as well as all friends of the family, are cordially invited to be present.

At 10:30 A. M. the gathering will be called to order by the president, and a short program of business and short talks will follow, after which dinner will be served picnic style.

We expect a large attendance and a great occasion. Come early with well-filled baskets; mingle with your old acquaintances and make new ones during the day.

Committee on Arrangements.

—Warren McCulloch and Miss Berta Troxler were married at 4:30 on Wednesday afternoon, August 5. Dr. Spahr, who officiated in the marriage of Warren's parents, officiated in this marriage also,—an unusual occurrence. The bride and groom left on an automobile trip to Asheville, Wilmington, and other points.

PERSONAL INFLUENCE.

An atheist going along a country road overtook a woman poorly clad, who seemed strangely excited. Her face was glowing with a calm and radiant joy.

"What were you talking about as you walked along?" he asked.

"I nebber knowed I was talking; 'pears like I didn't notice myself. I was thinkin' as I look on de worl' an' de sky, an' took 'em all in, dat they is all mine—all mine, 'cause I is Christ's and Christ is God's!"

He was a learned man, but this was a kind of learning he had never heard of. He was a successful man, but here was such triumph that he had never dreamed of. He listened, full of curiosity to what the woman had to say; he went away, but the leaven worked, causing him so much thought that he never rested until he also could say: "They are all mine, for I am Christ's!"

This kind of influence counts. God owns it. It makes its impression upon the unsaved. The results are a blessing to the one who gives and the one who receives. No apology is needed because of any adverse effects. The earthly end of such a being is peace and joy and satisfaction.—Central Christian Advocate.

THERE MIGHT BE A DIFFERENCE.

The telephone bell rang, and one of the group in the living room went to answer it. Her part in the conversation came back readily to the circle she had left, and called forth remark from the guest who was an old friend.

"What a clear, pleasant voice Helen has."

"When she talks over the phone," admitted the little girl of the family with judicial deliberation, and then she wondered at the burst of laughter that followed a moment's silence.

Whether or not her comment really meant what it seemed to imply, the fact remains that in many homes the voices that are sent out are very different from those that are kept in for household use. The tartness, the whining, the ungraciousness, do not greet the caller at the front door or the acquaintance over the wire, and a sudden change of tone from unpleasantness to bright friendliness is often so marked that no hearer can fail to note it. Voice cultivation is worth while, but it should not be wholly for export.—Forward.

"DEPART YE."

Sin brings separation from God. The word "depart," uttered to the workers of iniquity, is not an arbitrary one. It voices a law of God that runs through all His moral realm. . . Think it not strange, if man is driven from God and goodness who yields himself to sin. By a changeless law of moral repulsion, he is pushed away. Is it hopeless? Yes, as long as his back is turned toward God. But let him come to himself, let him feel his sin and degradation, let him long for home, for forgiveness, for his Father's face, and the law of changeless love takes hold of him. The law of divine attraction draws him then to God and goodness.

Man-like it is to fall into sin,

Fiend-like it is to dwell therein.

Christ-like it is for sin to grieve,

God-like it is all sin to leave.

Tabernacle Charge.—On the second Sunday in July we began our special meeting at Shady Grove. The first service was conducted by Bro. G. C. Dawson. This was a very interesting and helpful service and enjoyed by all. The following services were conducted by Bro. L. W. Gerringer, pastor of Calvary M. P. Church. The meeting continued until Wednesday night.

On Thursday night of the same week we began our special meeting at Julian. Bro. S. W. Taylor was our pulpit help here. This meeting continued for a period of ten days. We were assisted here by the Men's Federation of Burlington. At this point there were forty six conversions and reclamations.

This week we begin our special meeting at Tabernacle with Bro. Pritchard as our pulpit help.

On Saturday, July 18th. at 7:30 P. M. at the home of Mrs. Garner her daughter was married to Mr. Richard Kennett.

On Thursday, July 23rd. at 7:30 P. M. at the home of her parents Miss Pearl Trogdon was married to Mr. G. C. Welker.

These two young women were valuable assets to our church and community. We do not at this writing know where they will make their homes but fear they will be lost to our community. We predict good things for them wherever they go.

J. A. Burgess.

Belmont, Mt. Hermon Ct.—We had our children's day service on Sunday, July 26, at 7:30 P. M. A large crowd was present. Our collection amounted to $30.49, which was right good for our church. A very attractive and interesting program was rendered by the children, and we wish to lay stress upon the pretty pageant, "The Call," which was so well given by some of the larger girls.

All the credit of training the children is due to Miss Ramah Shoffner and Mrs. Charlie Sharpe, and we wish to thank them for their faithful help and kindness.

Our pastor, Rev. W. F. Ashburn, was with us the same Sunday and preached a good sermon in the morning, and made a short talk for us in the evening at our service.

Yours to help and do all I can for the work of the Master. Green A. Nicholson.

Democrat Circuit.—We are not dead here at Democrat if we haven't been saying much through the paper. We closed our special meeting at Mountain Valley last night. The Lord wonderfully blessed us; a great meeting; the people shouted and praised the Lord for His goodness toward them. The church was greatly revived, not only our church but the other churches of the community; for they all worked together for the salvation of lost souls—you could not tell what church they belonged to, but they united and fought the devil with all their might, and God did give us the victory and 27 souls were saved.

On Thursday night we opened the door of the church and seven came forward and joined the church; five went to the Presbyterian church, two joined our church.

Third Quarterly Meeting.

Saturday, July 25, we held our third quarterly meeting at Pleasant Gap. We were sorry that Dr. and Mrs. Dixon could not be with us, but we had a good conference. I tried in my weak way to preach at 11 o'clock; after the preaching service we went down to the home of Bro. T. C. Hensley where a long table was spread with everything good to eat, and after partaking of this good dinner we held the conference in the home. The spirit of love and harmony prevailed.

Bro. S. W. Angel was declared elected delegate to the Annual Conference.

Pounding.

Sunday night we came home from church and found that some one had entered the house. On investigation we found that they had left flour, meal, sugar, honey, molasses and jelly. We will not take the space to name the donors, but the Lord knows them, and may His blessings be upon them. I thank you one and all for your thoughtfulness. May God bless you and help me to serve you better. Yours in the Master's service.

L. S. Helms, Pastor.

Bethel, Mocksville Charge.—We held our children's day exercise the fourth Sunday in June. A large congregation was present. The children rendered their parts well. They were trained by Miss Lelia Martin. Offering for foreign missions, $11.45.

Miss Lelia made a splendid gift to Bethel church at that time of a silver communion service set as a memorial of her father and mother. For this the church feels very thankful to her.

Our Sunday school is moving on just fine. We have 117 on roll with 101 present Sunday. We were very sorry to lose Mr. and Mrs. Earl Williams from our Sunday school but wish them much success and happiness in their new home.

Our Sunday school gave a barbecue and supper on the church lawn the 18th which was well attended and enjoyed by all present. There were visitors there from different parts of the state and county.

Mrs. Clarence Penory of Tampa, Fla., is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. B. L. Hopking. Miss Lelia and Notie Martin are spending the summer near Hendersonville. Sorry to note Mrs. Sisk is on the sick list. Hope she will soon be well again. Bro. Sisk is helping in the normal that is being taught by Mr. Sebran of Asheville. Our special meeting will convene the third Sunday of August. I ask all who read this to pray that we have a glorious meeting. Best wishes to the Herald.

A Reader.

Bethesda, North Davidson.—We have held our children's day service and are looking forward to our special meeting second Sunday in August. We are hoping and praying for a good revival. We will welcome our friends and old acquaintances back home again, and are hoping and praying we will come together for no other purpose than to worship God. Sunday has been said to be show day, but we trust all who come will come with no other purpose than to get food for the soul. Our pastor has moved in the circuit community; we are glad to have our pastor get closer. He can do more pastoral work.

We held our picnic on Saturday evening, July 18. Bro. Lowdermilk and Miss Ruth Vuncannon came over with some of the orphan children and rendered a program for us which was very much enjoyed by all present. Rev. George Curry was present and also Rev. C. H. Whitaker and Rev. N. G. Bethea, giving us splendid talks. We are always glad to have these good people with us.

We had invited the neighboring churches to be with us and lots of them came.

We are planning to hold an old-fashion class meeting Wednesday night of this week, and pray for the success of the special meeting. May we be drawn closer to our Savior and love each other as we should is my prayer. Pray for us that we may have a glorious revival.

A BILL THAT WAS NEVER PAID.

A ten-year-old lad overheard a conversation about certain bills to be paid and conceived the idea of making out a bill for his own services, says the Compton Enterprise. So the next morning he laid this statement of account on his mother's breakfast plate:

"Mother owes Willie for carrying coal six times, 20 cents; for bringing water lots of times, 30 cents; for going ten errands, 15 cents."

His mother read the bill but said nothing about it. That evening Willie found on his plate the 75 cents, and also another bill which read as follows: Willie owes mother for his happy home for ten years, nothing; for nursing him through a long illness, nothing; total, nothing."

When Willie saw the 75 cents he was pleased; but when he read his mother's bill his eyes grew dim and his lips quivered. Then he took the money to his mother, threw his arms about her neck and begged that she would let him do lots of things for her.

Mother's bill is rarely presented, but it will pay each person to think it out and over for himself and then pay it in love and service.—Downey, Calif., Champion.

FOR HIS MOTHER'S SAKE.

The florist's boy had just swept some broken and withered flowers into the gutter when a ragged urchin darted across the street. He stooped over the pile of mangled flowers, and came upon a rose seemingly in better condition than the rest. But as he tenderly picked it up the petals fluttered to the ground leaving only the bare stalk in his hand.

He stood quite still, and his lips quivered perceptibly. The florist's boy who had been looking at him severely, felt that his face was softening. "What's the matter with you, anyway?" he asked.

The ragged little fellow choked as he answered: "It's for my mother. She's sick, and she can't eat nothing, and I thought if she'd a flower to smell it might make her feel better."

"Just you wait a minute," said the florist's boy as he disappeared. When he came out upon the sidewalk he held in his hand a beautiful half-opened rose, which he carefully wrapped in tissue-paper; then he said, "take that to your mother."—Selected.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, AUGUST 9.

Strengthening the Churches.

Lesson Tet: Acts 15:16-16:5.

Golden Text: Psalms 72:8.

The Central Truth: To build up believers in the faith of the gospel is quite as important as is to lead them into an acceptance of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ.

Scriptural Points.

1. "After some days." Reference is here made to events and decisions recorded in Lesson V., when the decrees concerning Gentile Christians were delivered to the church at Antioch in Syria.

2. Paul's proposal to Barnabas to revisit the churches established on the former missionary tour indicates that he had assumed his full responsibility as the apostle to the Gentile world.

3. Barnabas' determination to take John Mark with them displays a kindness of heart to give this runaway young man another chance. Being his own nephew no doubt influenced him much in making this decision. For blood is thicker than water.

4. Paul's suggestion that it was not best to take this weak young man on such another perilous undertaking showed him to be a man of superior judgment. The work demanded was true and tried.

5. "The contention was so sharp between them." Neither would yield to the other's position. Each was extremely human to carry his point. A personal separation was the result. No doubt they separated as friends. They just agreed to disagree. It all worked out for the best. Two missionary tours were projected instead of one.

6. It seems that Barnabas' departure with John Mark for Cyprus was hasty. He did not wait to receive the blessing and good wishes of the church at Antioch.

7. It is likely that the church sided with Paul in this contention. For he and Silas were "recommended by the brethren unto the face of God." They were sent away with the prayers and blessing of the Antioch congregation.

8. The sequel of this separation is interesting. Barnabas passes into obscurity. The last of the book of The Acts of the Apostles is a personal history of Paul, his journeys, his ministry, and his persecutions.

9. "Confirming the churches." This means they were instructed and built up in the faith. The weak were made strong. And the strong were made more effective and useful. They were trained for service.

10. It is probable that Timothy was a convert during Paul's former preaching at Lystra and Derbe. For he calls him in one of his epistles his own son in the Gospel. Perceiving that Timothy had received a call to the ministry Paul took him with him to give him training and experience in the gospel ministry.

11. "They delivered them the decrees" of liberation from Jewish ordinances, and the new rules of abstinence to be faithfully observed.

12. This second missionary tour of the great apostle was greatly blessed of God. For it is recorded that "the churches were established in the faith, and increased in number daily."

Practical Points.

1. Differences of opinion in regard to truth, policies and procedure are inevitable. People can't think alike on all subjects. Truth is infinite and the human mind is finite, and the most competent mind can grasp only a part of truth. Differences of view point, previous training, and agreeable associations are responsible for differences of opinion on matters pertaining to religion, politics, and general welfare.

2. But the spiritual faculties are very unlike the mental. Love, faith, and other spiritual graces flow along similar channels. "He fashioneth all their hearts alike." People love the same way the world over.

3. Differences of opinion are sources of much unchristian feeling among the narrow-minded. Such presume that they see all the truth and all who see differently are false and heretical. The charity that covers a multitude of sins ought to cover also a multitude of differences.

4. It is well for those who believe differently to toil in different spheres. The different denominations of Christians may after all be a wise provision of the great Head of the church.

5. The practical functions of the ministry are as necessary as the teaching and evangelistic functions. That which promotes nourishment in the Christian life is quite as valuable as that which sways the heart to accept Christ as Savior and Lord.

6. The primary and indispensable mission of the church is to influence and win the unsaved outside. And the purity, consistency, and the strength of the church need to be maintained in order to accomplish this most desirable result.

7. The training of all whose hearts the Lord has touched to enter the harvest field of lost mankind demands the most prayerful concern of the body of Christ. Training for leadership in the Kingdom of God is imperative.

—The Word of Life

THE UPPER ROOM.

"It was the first cathedral of the Christian Church. There was no altar, no choir, no nave, no crucifix. It was without Gothic arches and steepled splendor. There were just the four bare walls of a common room, but there never was built a house that held more of God than that plain room. It was the room where the Holy Supper was instituted."

So Dr. James I. Vance, in his spiritually delightful book, "In the Breaking of Bread," begins a beautiful and heart-searching study of the program that the redeeming and risen Christ has bequeathed to His disciples.

The upper room is at the center of the program. Communion with Christ is the heart of the Christian life. It is the source of true spiritual service. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is the Holy of Holies in the temple of Christian worship. There the voices of the world are hushed. There the veil of flesh seems less obscuring. We are nearer the heart of God. His whisper and His touch become more real. His love envelops us. With the symbols of redeeming grace at our lips, our Savior seems nearer than our fellow-worshippers, and by His presence renews our spirits. The fountains of our love and faith are refreshed. The dew of penitence is in our eyes. We are sorry that we have ever displeased our Lord. Then He speaks to us of forgiveness, and with revived desire for holiness and a new consecration to service, we rise from the table rejoicing.—Selected.

THE CHARM OF GOODNESS.

No one had ever been more uncompromising in his attitude to sin and wrong than Christ (Jesus); yet to the end his charm was cast upon all sorts and conditions of men. His goodness was attractive. It found men, won them, and held them. Men still would be won for Christ by the strength and charm of Christlike goodness which was freed from pride, censoriousness, and complacency. The noteworthy things were his unconcern of what other people thought of him; his concern about what God thought of him; and his concern for the mercy of God. He hit the center of real goodness when he faced the fact of God and measured his life by God's glorious goodness. Christlike goodness was unattainable until men got away from the accumulation of self-directed virtues and self-acquired righteousness. Forgetfulness of self was reached best when the mind was set upon God and occupied with His standards of conduct.—Selected.

WALKING PRAYERS.

Years ago, in Chicago, Dr. Henry M. Scudder, of the famous missionary Scudder family, was in an evangelistic meeting where the ardent leader claimed that every true Christian should spend several hours each day upon his knees. He was asked, "How many hours do you pray each day?" He replied: "I may not spend as much time on my knees as our enthusiastic friend thinks necessary, but I go up and down the crowded streets of this busy city and hundreds of people, young and old, weary and forlorn, pass me. I never allow this human parade to pass by unnoticed. I do not withdraw into my own thoughts away from it. I have trained myself to keep looking at it. I look into their faces, and pray for every one of them; not on my knees, but on my feet. I spend much time every day in prayer."

THE GOLDEN RULE.

The Golden Rule is the law of God governing human relationship. The only thing the matter with the world is a mutual lack of confidence among people. If the Golden Rule were practiced universally, it would have been physically impossible for the World War to have occurred. Christians are trying to find some complicated philosophy of life to live by. Our sectarian walls must come down before we can see the kingdom of God, and we shall find that the Golden Rule is the only thing in God's universe that will work.

IN HONOR OF THE DEAD.Resolutions.

Whereas our Heavenly Father in His loving kindness has seen best to call from labor to reward the soul of our deceased friend and classmate, Miss Sadie Burton, therefore be it resolved:

First, That we extend our sympathy to the bereaved family and friends. We commit them to Him who said, "I will not leave you comfortless." We humbly bow to His divine will, knowing that He doeth all things well.

Second, That we as individual members of the Methodist Protestant Philathea class ever remember her beautiful Christian character, her kind and cheerful manner, and thank God for the privilege of having known her.

Third, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Methodist Protestant Herald, the Reidsville Review, and a copy kept upon the records of our class book.

Miss Lola McCollum,
Miss Eva Aldridge,
Mrs. H. S. Dixon, Com.

Whereas it hath pleased our dear Heavenly Father to call Mrs. Callie Neal, mother of our friend and classmate, Miss Nellie Neal, to her reward, therefore be it resolved:

First, That we bow in humble submission to Him who doeth all things well.

Second, That we extend our love and sympathy to her loved ones and pray that God in His love may comfort and bless them in their great grief and loss.

Third, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family, a copy to the Methodist Protestant Herald, the Reidsville Review, and one kept upon the records of our class book.

Whereas our Mebane Ladies' Aid Society and Philathea Class are sorely bereaved in the death of our beloved sister, Mrs. A. W. Sykes, who by a terrible accident was rushed into the great beyond June 25th, 1925, she having been a faithful Christian and loyal church member:

Resolved, That we, the members of the Ladies Aid Society of the Methodist Protestant church, individually and as a whole very keenly feel our loss in the going of our sister. That we sympathize with the two daughters and two sons and pray that the Lord may comfort them in this, their greatest sorrow.

Resolved—That these resolutions of love and respect be published in our church Herald, the Mebane Enterprise, spread upon the minutes of our society and a copy sent to the family.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

College of the Methodist Protestant Church. Co-educational. Fitting for life and for university courses. Just closed a successful year in which one hundred and thirty-four students were enrolled in the freshman and sophomore classes.

Students are being registered for the fall semester, which begins September 15th. For years we have been looking forward to the time when we would have a college in North Carolina, and now that the dream has been realized we are appealing to all Methodist Protestants and friends of the church to stand by the institution in its first years of existence.

May God help us who mourn her loss to be drawn closer to our Lord by that influence, and finally when to us the summons shall come to meet her in that home not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. May God bless, comfort and console the bereaved family, and may they find joy in the blessed thought that there will come a day of reunion in a land where partings never come.

Interment was made in the Fairgrove church cemetery near Brown Summit.

A TEST.

A missionary tells of a poor Hottentot in Southern Africa living with a good Dutchman who kept up family prayer daily and invited all the members of his household to share in it. One evening he read from the Bible. "Two men went up to the temple to pray." The savage, whose heart was already awakened looked earnestly at the reader and whispered to himself, "Now I'll learn how to pray." The Dutchman read on, "God, I thank Thee I am not as other men." "No, I am not; but I am worse," whispered the Hottentot! Again the master read, "I fast twice in the week; I give tithes of all that I possess." "I don't do that. I can't pray in that manner. What shall I do?" said the distressed savage. The good man read on until he came to the publican who would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven. "That's me," cried the hearer. "Stood afar off," read the other. "That's where I am," said the Hottentot. "But smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner." "That's my prayer!" cried the poor creature, and smiting his dark breast, he prayed, "God be merciful to me sinner," until, like the Publican, he went down to his house a saved and happy man.—Exchange.

OBJECTS OF A CHURCH COLLEGE.

There are colleges and colleges. And notwithstanding the steady trend of certain modern movements there still exist many church colleges. Within the bounds of the Methodist Protestant denomination there are five such schools. Because of the modern trend to sever the ties that bind such schools to the church, and also because of a certain position now occupy, that relates me jointly to the church and her schools, I wish to write on the subject—Object of a Church College.

First, To Provide Higher Education for Its Youth.

This is of necessity the primary reason. It is self-evident that this is true. It goes without saying that unless the church desired and designed to give youth a chance for higher education, especially its own youth, there would be no need to create and foster a College. Because the church has recognized the worth of education, because the church has been and is conscious of the necessity of trained leaders, both in the ministry and laity, the church now she must build Colleges and knows she must support them.

But it is also manifestly the business of the Church College to provide such higher education at as small cost as possible. Unless she undertakes to do this and rigidly maintains such an aim, it is failing in the primary purpose. For such a College must purpose to and persist in serving the youth of the average home in the constituency of the Church. The business of such a school is not to conduct a college where only the sons and daughters from the home of "better means" may go. Manifestly they would be able to go elsewhere if they desired. But a school where the sons and daughters of the home of "average means" may go. In this day of the high cost of living, the day of steady advance of prices on all lines—a day when the same soaring cost is going on in the price of a College education, it is growing increasingly hard for the boy and girl of the average home to go to College.

so, such a College in its administration must keep before its mind the obligation to the Church's Constituency—that the Church has created such a school, nurtured and fostered it through both its dark days and bright ones, and directly and indirectly is in no little measure constantly giving it financial support.

I am conscious that the College, especially the Church College, is in no little dilemma. She is in the cross current engendered by traditional allegiance and standardizing agencies. There are certain aims to be maintained because of what she is, certain goals to be reached because of what the times seem to demand. The pressure of the times, educationally, is forcing her on to what is termed the "Bigger" College—represented in certain figures of endowment, certain salaries of the faculty, certain numbers of students, certain character of buildings. The desire to serve the end in view by the creation and promotion of the Church School warns against the inevitable result from such pressure. For the end is inevitable—the bigger the endowment, the larger the student body, the adoption of certain standards, then the higher cost of education. This is the result that must be jealously considered by the Church College—It is her sacred obligation. This is the "Noblesse Oblige" of her existence. Better that the Church College remain a small College and provide higher education at as small a cost as possible than become a bigger College and fail to do this.

Second, To Maintain Christian Standards.

For christian character is the plus in education. And without this plus, education is less than it ought to be.

To maintain these standards, necessitates the Church College setting forth and upholding such standards in all phases of College life and activities.

It must begin by seeing to it that Christian Teachers fill her chairs. Teachers who conceive that the big business of life is to so mold life that it shall honor God, follow the Christ, and serve man. That while education is to draw out of the youth the native latent abilities to be and know and do, it is also to put into youth the higher ideals for being and knowing and doing and to create motives large enough to impel youths toward these ideals. And every department of College life must head up in a man or woman of such vision, from the department of science to the work of the gymnasium, from the field of philosophy to the athletic field, from the atom of the laboratory to the calorie of the dining room.

For worthy ideals and sufficient motives to live and thrive there must be the proper atmosphere conducive to life and growth. A Church College must feel it a great object to engender such atmosphere. That is why the one who fills a chair in a Church College should be bigger than the chair—that is why the one who teaches is greater than the subject taught—why the department head is of more concern than the department. For the atmosphere of a College cannot be rarer than those who give personality to the College are rare.

But just as important as the setting up of Christian standards by the institutions and maintaining them is the demanding of the student body that such standards be respected. This brings us to the question of discipline. And the cry is everywhere—"times have changed." It is true, the times have changed very perceptibly. In some things not for the best, perhaps, but in many things certainly not for the worst. All this hue and cry about the revolt of youth is not as much discredit to youth as some would make us believe by comparison. About the deterioration of the present generation is not as logical and sound as some alarmists portray.

And while times have changed—certain standards have not. And conformity to such standards as such an institution sets up, not only are to be demanded, but must be in a large measure realized. Unless there is such an insistence, no College atmosphere, however rare, can be long kept wholesome—it will become miasmic by its own breathings.

No College education has done what it might for youth that has not disciplined youth, No Church College has done its most for youth that has not insisted upon youth acknowledging her standards and persisted in youth honoring such standards. And I believe the constituency of the church, not only has a right to ask this of the Church School, but earnestly desires and expects it.

Third, to shape the thinking of youth towards whole-hearted generous service of life.

The trend of modern times, not due to the youth of today at all, but to the accumulative result of the yesterdays, is to put the emphasis upon profit and loss. The inevitable result is to create and nurture the spirit of the mercenary, the prostitution of talents and opportunities to match the lure of gain. To give only where there is the chance of return. If there is a curse to any age it is this spirit that blights its youth to follow after such.

No higher object can the Church College have in its effort to instill motives into youth than to negate the possibility of the mercenary trend by holding up the royalty of generous service to life. To teach that the world owes nobody a living, but that everybody owes the world a life, and that there is much in this great, big, beautiful world to enrich the experience of life if heart and head and hand seek to give of that life its best to serve, in the sphere of privilege. "Give and it shall

WHERE TOBACCO DOES ITS WORK.

Will H. Brown.

When nicotine is taken into the body it does its work, regardless of whether it be the body of rich or poor, high or low. When the Prince of Wales visited the United States in 1924 he naturally attracted much attention. One thing the papers made very conspicuous. That he was a cigarette fiend. How has the nicotine affected him? What might he not have been had he left tobacco alone? Of course, he would still be a Prince, regardless of his own efforts. But there are two kinds of Princes and two kinds of rulers. Knowing that the Prince of Wales is a slave to tobacco no one should be surprised to read the following description of him from the pen of Frederick W. Clappett, special writer for the Hearst papers:

"The gray matter of the Prince contains no distinctive character. The average student of Oxford or Cambridge will leave him far behind. In neither art nor literature may he ever hope to shine. His speeches are molded by other brains. Thousands of young men serve behind counters, stoop over desks, to whom the Prince could not hold a candle in grace and strength on physique. His nervousness is painful in his constant twitches. Short and slight, he might walk the streets without attracting a single eye."

What tobacco can do to its victims was shown also in the cases of Nathan Leopold, Jr., and Richard Loeb, the youthful murderers of Robert Franks, aged 13, all sons of Chicago millionaires. The young criminals are both cigarette fiends. When they were sent to prison for their crime, one reporter wrote his paper: "They will fare better than some of the other prisoners, because they have money. They will be permitted to buy each week four packages of cigarettes, four plugs of tobacco," etc. That reporter was mistaken. The fortunates persons, inside and outside of prison walls, are those who cannot get tobacco at all. Tobacco does its work wherever it is used.

MASTER OR MASTERED.

Success Is Not Attained Because of Circumstances, but in Spite of Circumstances.

In the great problems of life the most important issue before the individual is whether he shall be a success or a failure. There is no doubt that every person is desirous of success. But is that sufficient. It has been stated that we may have anything we wish with-in reason, if we are willing to pay the price. Paying the price might be defined as the giving up of certain things in order to gain desired results along other lines. The whole problem resolves itself into the conclusion that to be successful we must be masters—masters of ourselves and masters of circumstances.

In the business world of today a man who is accounted a success must be bigger than his business with its accompanying problems. In other words, he is not recognized as a success unless he is master of his work. How often when we hear the expression, "He is a master workman," we think of one who is thoroughly trained and ready to meet any obstacle which may arise in the course of his duties. Is this our aim? It should be.

The apostle Paul was master of himself. And because of this he was able to say as the time drew near for him to suffer martyrdom, "I am now ready to be offered, . . . I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing." 2 Tim. 4: 6-8. Paul's assurance was the reasonable result of a constant victorious life in Christ. This is, however, no more than may be expected by every sincere Christian.

Whether circumstances master us or whether they serve us is a question we must decide individually. Success is not attained because of circumstances, but in spite of circumstances. Shall we not, then, take courage from examples left us all down through the ages, and especially by Jesus Christ, and adopt for motto, "Mastery of Self," which will result in mastery of circumstances and the final attainment of true success—a perfect life in Christ Jesus.—William Bradford.

THE MERCY OF GOD.

"The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy."

Mercy is a favor shown to the undeserving. It is benevolence, tenderness, pity, compassion, clemency, shown toward offenders. The essential thing in mercy is that the person to whom a favor is shown is guilty and has no claim to mercy. If he has any claim that is proportionate with the favor bestowed, the act is one of justice and not of mercy. That God is a merciful being, no one can doubt. David said, "The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." (Psalm 103:8.)

That God has sent His Son into our world to die for us is ample argument that He is merciful and gracious. What father would give his son to die for the guilty? What ruler has there been who would give his only son to suffer a shameful death in order to sustain the honor of his own law and in order to save even a whole country of rebels? And where is the judge who, to save the guilty, would give up to the same death a much-beloved, an only son? Yet "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." And this gift was the proof of God's mercy; it was the expression of His mercy; it was the sacrifice which mercy made to save the guilty. For it cannot be said that the sufferings of Christ made any change in God. It is not true that God was originally stern, inflexible and unmerciful; and that He has been made mild and forgiving by the death of His Son. It is not true that those sorrows have made God different from what He was, He gave His Son to die, not that He might be made merciful, but as the expression of mercy; not that His mercy might be bought, but because He was originally so merciful that He was willing to submit to anything, even the ignominy and death of His Son that man might be saved.

A father standing on the shore of a river sees his child suddenly fall into the waters. The child struggles with the current, but is carried farther out into the stream and is sinking. The father will instinctively plunge into that stream, at the peril of his own life, to save that of his drowning child. But neither the danger of his child nor his piercing cry makes the father compassionate and kind. No, he loves his son so much that he is willing to throw himself into the river to save his life.

A country is invaded. A father lays his hand on the head of his only son and sends him forth to the field of strife and death. Does that invitation, that peril, make the father love his country? No. He so loved his country that to save it he was willing to part with his only son, if necessary, that he should pour out his blood in defence of his country.

In the same way God, the Father of mercies, looked on men. He so loved the world; He so pitied us; He so desired our welfare, that, to save us, He was willing to give up His Son to die. And such a death! What are all the strugglings of a drowning child; what are all the privations of a camp or the perils of the field of battle; what all the pains of sickness, the tortures of the rack, the severities of flame, compared with the sufferings of Jesus Christ. They stand alone. Nowhere has there been ignominy so great, torture so keen, and pain so bitter as the Son of God endured. No other spectacle has been witnessed like that when the Son of God was nailed to the cross. And when He had been waylaid and persecuted; when He had been rejected and spurned; when He was nailed to the tree; when He had been crowned with thorns; mercy still prevailed, and the murderers of the Son of God—the perpetrators of that great crime which has been unequaled by any other deed of human guilt—were told that they might be pardoned. And from that cross the proclamation has gone forth that all, no matter what their guilt, may be saved. Here flows blood so rich in the sight of God that it is sufficient to atone for the sins of the whole world, and all who are now penitent and all believe on His name may enter heaven.—Adam W. Miller.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

At the age of 38 Patrick Henry, the bold and brilliant orator of Virginia, delivered in the Virginia convention his memorable speech which closed with the immortal declaration, "I know not what course others may take, but, as for me, give me liberty or give me death!"

At the early age of 36, William Jennings Bryan, the young Lochinvar of the West, "so faithful in love and so dauntless in war," mounted the platform at the national Democratic convention in Chicago in 1896 and delivered his "crown of thorns" and "cross of gold" speech. The young orator, handsome as Apollo, and with a voice whose musical cadences carried every word that he uttered in amazing distinctness to the outer rim of that audience of 15,000, snatched those striking figures from Mount Calvary and set them as gems to adorn the oration that entranced the convention, made him famous overnight and nominated him for the presidency.

And through all the years since that July afternoon in 1896, W. J. Bryan has been without a peer on the platform. His magnetic personality, his sincerity of heart, his high moral purpose and his "golden-mouth" has made him the incomparable orator of his generation, if not of all time.

One defeat for the presidency generally consigns a man to oblivion, but he could take three defeats and still remain the most influential private citizen of the Western world. W. J. Bryan was bigger than any public office. We shall hardly look upon his like again. We fear that nature has cast away the mold. Thirty years is a long time for a man to occupy the first place as a private citizen in a democracy. For democracies are proverbially fickle. They as a rule soon tire of their leaders. It is true that some got tired of Bryan, but the multitudes still believed in him.

"His was the strength of ten Because his heart was pure."

The enemies of Bryan sought to destroy him, and his judgment frequently ran counter to the opinions of his friends, but in all his spectacular, and at times stormy career, no man ever dared to besmirch his spotless life. For an enemy to have dared to touch the white lily of his pure life with a dirty finger would have meant political death to that enemy. His personal character, stainless and pure, was an ark of God that no enemy could touch without becoming afflicted with leprosy.

The American people will greatly miss the presence of this political and religious leader, who has battled for clean politics, for the rule of the people, for great moral reforms, and at the same time was a religious leader and teacher who wrought faithfully and well as an humble servant of his Lord and Master.—N. C. Christian Advocate.

THE HOUR OF THE GARDEN.

Love is of God, and everyone that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God.—1 John 4:7.

"I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee."—Jeremiah 31:3.

The love of God. How great is that gift to mankind! It is so wonderful that we cannot even comprehend it. It goes out to the humblest and poorest of earth's creatures. It is extended to those in the deepest degradation as well as to those who have found the better ways. There are no depths to which it will not descend in order to save and uplift. There are no heights which it cannot reach. And who shall prevent any from receiving of this great, saving love? Paul said he was persuaded that "neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

For the love of God is broader
Than the measure of man's mind;
And the heart of the Eternal
Is most wonderfully kind.
If our love were but more simple,
We would take him at his word,
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of our Lord.

—F. W. Faber.

Love is the greatest thing that God can give us, for Himself is love; and it is the greatest thing we can give to God, for it will also give ourselves, and carry with it all that is ours. The apostle calls it the bond of perfection; it is the old, and it is the new; it is the great commandment, and it is all the commandments; for it is the fulfilling of the law.—Jeremy Taylor.

Grandeur than the ocean's story,
Or songs of forest trees—
Purer than breath of morning,
Or evening's gentle breeze—
Clearer than mountain echoes
Ring out from peaks above—
Rolls on the glorious anthem
Of God's eternal love.
—W. F. Sherwin.

A WONDERFUL WORLD.

A little more praise and a little less blame,
A little more virtue, a little less shame,
A little more thought for the other man's rights
A little more self in our chase for delights,
A little more loving, a little less hate,
Are all that is needed to make the world great
A little more boasting, a little less jeering,
A little more trusting, a little less fearing,
A little more patience in trouble and pain,
A little less willing at times to complain.
A little more kindness worked into the strife,
Are all that is needed to glorify life.
A little more honor, a little less greed,
A little more service, a little less creed,
A little more courage when pathways are rough,
A little more action, a little less bluff,
A little more kindness by you and by me,
And oh, what a wonderful world it would be.

WEAVING OUR LIVES.

As I stood before one of the most famous of the Aubusson tapestries, I asked the attendant to show me the other side. It was a tangle of threads and thrums and ends, a confused mystery of colors, without order or meaning or beauty, and resembling a picture on the other side as little as the tuning of an organ resembles the oratorio of the Messiah. And yet the artist stands behind his web, on this reverse side, while he is making the picture. The pattern is before him. The materials are by his side. He weaves them in according to the pattern, but without seeing the charming picture that is coming into being. We are now weaving our lives on the reverse side; we cannot see their meaning; we see only the confused jumble of life's threads. But if we work in the threads God bids us and follow the pattern set us, at length He will show us the right side, the true picture our lives are making, full of blessing and glory.—Peloubet.

NOTICE.

The Annual Home-Coming Day will be held at Flat Rock Church, Flat Rock Circuit, the fifth Sunday in August at 10:30 A. M. Rev. J. S. Williams will deliver the address.

The special meeting will also begin on that day with Rev. T. A. Williams as help. Everybody cordially invited. Picnic dinner on the grounds, and please don't forget the baskets.

Mrs. John B. Ogburn,
Secretary Flat Rock Memorial Assoc.
Summerfield, N. C., August 10th.

Notice, Y. P. H. M. S.

We are anxious for the Y. P. H. M. S. of North Carolina to raise $100 for a scholarship for our college this year. Won't all leaders please send to Mrs. Garrett just as much as they can before September? Winston-Salem Home Circle has pledged $25.00. Who will be the next?

Mrs. T. L. Speas,
Secretary of Y. P. H. M. S.

—Revs. L. W. Gerringer and H. F. Fogleman attended the closing service of the Tabernacle meeting.

—Bro. J. Norman Wills occupied the pulpit of Westminster Presbyterian Church last Sunday morning.

—The Tabernacle meeting was one of great interest. It continued till Sunday afternoon. Brother Prichard stood well the ordeal of three services, a day, being kept up late at night, and being called up early in the morning to take breakfast with the farmers. He preached in the closing service, showing no sign of weariness. In that service seven or eight were received into the church by Pastor Burgess. More than fifty had been converted or reclaimed in the meetings, and the church was revived and brought into better spiritual condition.

—Plenty of pyrotol will be available for farmers in North Carolina this fall, states J. M. Gray of the State College.

—Livestock growers in the drouth stricken areas should plant some emergency hay and grazing crop like Sudan grass, German millet or Abruzzi rye, recommends Prof. C. H. Williams.

—Rev. W. C. Kennett came to the end of his long life rather unexpectedly to his companion and people on Monday night at 11:30. He was our oldest minister.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

(Begun on page one.)

be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together and running over, shall men give back unto your bosom," would be a good motto to inscribe on the seal of the Church College.

This is philosophy that can be taught not only in the College Chapel, but equally as well in the lecture room. It is philosophy that can be ethicized not only on the athletic field, but equally as well in the dormitory and on the campus. It is the sort of religion that a Church College can teach as a workable philosophy for student activities that will greatly enhance the worth of the college graduate in and to the great arena of life.

Fourth, to foster in the minds of youth a wholesome regard for the Church.

It is not to be minimized that this is an age when people are critical. The heritage of modern youth is the combined result of science, democratic ideals, and freedom seeking. The youth of today are not responsible for it, they have inherited it. It is in the air they breathe, the food they eat, the ground they tread. And say what you please about the lack of home training, the neglect of training in religious education in the public schools, and even in the Church, there is no "little world" that can do or fail to do with such splendid opportunity as the "College Sphere." It is a new world to the average boy or girl. The ear is sensitive to sound, the eye to light, the hand to touch, the brain to ideas, the heart to emotions. The Church can be magnified or minimized at this period with tremendous effect. And the Church, with all its defects from the human side, can be put in the place of fine contemplation and sacred worth in the mind and heart of the College youth. This is something the Church College is obligated, because of what it is, to do. In my judgment this is no little part of the work and influence of the teachers in such an institution. And more, the Church has a right to expect and should certainly receive of her institutions such inculcation and influence in and over the youth therein.

Should not the Church College deem this a sacred trust?

Fifth, to keep alive the spirit of Christian Democracy.

During the World War we heard much about "making the world safe for democracy." That was opportune. But now, in peace times, no greater program is needed than to make "Democracy Safe for the World." And there is no more fertile field wherein to cultivate such a program than youth, and no more potent power to work it than the Church College. And no democracy is safe for the world than such as is shot through with christian principles: with a fellowship that deems all men worth-while: with a fraternity that ties all together for the good of all.

To teach and illustrate Christian Democracy is and must be a definite object of every college in America, and certainly so for the Church College.

To repress all that fosters class, clan, and eliteism of caste. Whether it be a false idea of aristocracy, money, fraternities, sororities, athletics, or what not. To teach that merit not money wins reward; that character not cash counts in the final reckoning; that studiousness not snobbishness stands out for notice; that the only elite-ism is culture; that VERVE not JAZZ-E is the real pep of life; that maintaining your colors for ideals and principles is of more concern than coloring your viewpoint because of isms and pressure.

That to foster wholesome fellowship among all the students is of more importance than permitting any sort of cast that shuts out part of the students.

To teach that there may be more for thought in loyalty to an institution's traditions than there is for radical change by student revolt.

To teach that a man is a man for a' that! Not what his name was, but what he is. Not what his father did, but what he does. Not where he lived, but how he lives. That mankind are brothers the world over,—and that the safety of the world lies in the consciousness of that brotherhood, which consciousness shall come in and through the Spirit of Christian Democracy.

These five objects I conceive to be in and of the Church College;—of any Church Institution; certainly of those of the Methodist Protestant Church.

G. I. Humphreys, President,
Board of Education, Meth. Prot. Church.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Among the Churches.

It was my privilege to attend a very unique rally on the Why Not charge on Saturday, August 1st. Upon my arrival at Fair Grove

Sunday August 4th. I drove down and spent three days with them in the meeting. It was delightful to renew friendships in this fine old country community. The meeting was a good one, and closed Friday afternoon.

As soon as these services closed wife and I had the pleasure of driving to the home of "Aunt Peggy Lee" where her many friends were helping her to celebrate her birthday. For a long time her home has been the home of Methodist Protestant preachers.

It was good to see her shining face once more. May God bless, keep, and direct her in her years of going down the Sunset valley.

Littleton Charge.—Saturday and Sunday August 8th. and 9th. I spent on Littleton charge. Saturday we met in the 3rd. quarterly conference in the Littleton church. Littleton and Vaughn's both present their problems to a pastor just now, but Bro. O'Birant is doing his best with them. On Sunday I was with him, at Hawkins' Chapel and preached to a large congregation at the morning hour. This was the beginning of revival services. They were expecting Rev. M. P. Chambliss to assist in the meetings.

Enfield Charge.—As soon as I had eaten a bite of lunch at Hawkins' Chapel I started for Whitakers' Chapel, Enfield Charge, hoping to reach there before the afternoon services of the revival closed. But when I got there the folks had gone. However, my visit there of something like thirty minutes enabled me to walk through those old historic church grounds, and to think of those other days when our church was in its beginnings, and to think just how much this one church has meant in the history of the Methodist Protestant church. It was here, if I mistake not, that the first annual conference session of a Methodist Protestant church was ever held. I should like to see the minutes of that meeting.

Sunday night I preached in our church in Enfield to a very appreciative audience. We thoroughly enjoyed our stay of nearly a week with the good people of these three charges.

It was also delightful to be moving about in a section of the State where they have had plenty of rain, and where the crops are abundant. The people from Raleigh east should certainly be rendering thanksgivings to God for His showers of blessings upon them.

Rev. W. C. Kennett.

This morning a phone message told of the going home of our father in Israel, Rev. W. C. Kennett. He was the oldest minister in our conference, and I feel sure he was the oldest minister in the entire denomination. He was my pastor when I was a small boy, and I have loved him through the years. He grew old beautifully, and for a long term of years was one of the sweetest-spirited old men I have known.

May the Father sustain his companion, and all his loved ones in this their sorrow.

An obituary committee will be appointed soon.

Yours in His name, A. G. Dixon.

HIGH POINT COLLEGE.

Coach Boylin writes encouragingly from Duluth where he is at present. He expects some fine men on all the teams this year.

We are registering some splendid students. Prospects are bright for an orchestra.

Misses Young, Williams, and Idol have been at Columbia this summer. Prof. Allred has completed his work for his Master's degree at the University N. C. Prof. Yarboro has been doing special work at the U. of S. C. Prof. Houck taught in the first session Summer School at Boone and is now teaching in the second Summer School at N. C. C. W.

Miss Blackwelder and Miss Isley, class 27, are at N. C. C. W. Harris Meador is at the first Summer School at U. N. C. Hermon Coble and Elwood Carrol have been working in High Point during vacation. Miss Lois Coble is working with Mr. E. W. Teague this summer.

Both High Point, First Church, and Burlington First Church, have pledged their quotas in the endowment campaign.

Payments have come in very well this summer, but yet there is room for improvement and there is great need of funds. At this time when so much is needed to be done and so little help in doing those things, it becomes necessary for those of us who are working to double our efforts, to forget the number of hours we labor and cease to worry over the failures of others to join us in our toils.

High Point College has put one year of active service behind it. And by what has been done has proven to its friends that it can function normally. To those who have yet to be interested, it is yet to have a being and to be capable of really doing college work.

But High Point College is enlisting the friends of the Church. We have nothing to worry about this fact. We now know who are our friends. At first we were puzzled over the works and silence of some supposed to be real, loyal members of our communion, but these are now labelled and we know quite well how to handle them. So we are getting on nicely, thank you. We have been pleased with the consideration received from U. N. C. and N. C. C. W. At both these institutions our students will be admitted on same basis as students from other colleges. This encourages us.

Prospects for a large enrolment are bright; there have been a few changes in our faculty, these will be announced at an early date.

RECEIPTS FOR COLLEGE

In the central and lower piedmont sections of North Carolina, German millet and Sudan grass will produce good hay if planted before August 15 to 20. In the upper piedmont and lower mountain section, German millet alone will provide this hay. Land to be used for such crops should be prepared immediately and planted at the rate of 40 to 50 pounds per acre of the millet seed and 20 to 25 pounds per acre of the Sudan grass seed. To get the best quality of hay, the plants should be cut when the seed heads are in full bloom. If it appears that frost will catch the crop it should be cut before this time.—Prof. C. B. Williams, N. C. State College.

THE PASSING OF MR. BRYAN.

By Rev. Luther K. Long.

Whatever may be the verdict of history as to the place William Jennings Bryan shall occupy on the scroll of fame, no one can deny that he has had a remarkable career.

His voice was wonderfully charming, the ease and fluency of his address were exceedingly pleasing, and his power over a popular audience was unexcelled. He was sincere in the positions he took on a great variety of questions, and persistent in his efforts to achieve his ends. He fearlessly espoused unpopular causes, took his frequent defeats with a smile, retained to the end the loyalty of a host of friends, and never wholly lost the respect of his opponents. He was a devout Christian man, a lover of God's word, and he gave liberally of time and effort to the work of the church.

And yet, when we speak of Mr. Bryan's intellect, the fact stands out prominently that multitudes of the more thoughtful people did not, and could not, give him their full confidence. The feeling grows that he himself was sometimes seduced and carried away by the charm of his own voice. And he was habitually deceived by his skillful use of impressive catch-words and striking phrases—even as were also many of his hearers. True, these are faults rather common with men who are popular on the public platform—but they are faults that do not belong to the highest type of men.

Attention has already been called to striking resemblances between Colonel Bryan and another noted colonel—Colonel Robert G. Ingersol. Neither man had a rival in his time as an attractive public speaker. Their voices carried far and lingered like music in the ears of enchanted listeners. Both were special pleaders, and dealt in beautiful bubbles not too difficult to prick by a reasonably discerning mind. By far the larger part of Colonel Ingersol's shafts of criticism would today fall unnoticed, for, in the main, he directed them against conceptions of God, the Bible, and the Christian life no longer held by intelligent church-men. The successors of Colonel Bryan's present followers will eventually lose interest in his fierce denunciations and impassioned pleas, for even these good people will come under the influence of more rational—more Christian—conceptions of God and His methods with nature and men, and will better understand the spirit and purpose of the sacred Scriptures.

The following quotation seems to me a fair and not unkindly estimate of Mr. Bryan:

"A good man, he was intellectually an anachronism. Honest and sincere, but singularly parochial in his views and frequently illogical in his reasoning, Mr. Bryan displayed a strange blend of right purposes and wrong methods. Brilliantly superficial, confident in the soundness of his judgments, he was a man of singularly restricted information. In a time of marvelous progress in all forms of enlightenment he clung to impressions and prejudices that were outworn. His sincerity and his gift of eloquence would have taken him far as a statesman if they had been joined with a logical mind and a thirst for broad knowledge."

That they may rest in peace and awaken in light is our sincere wish for the two Colonels, and for all seekers after truth. They were sometimes mistaken, often prejudiced, but they honestly sought to do good to their fellow-men. Their hearts were clearer than their heads.

THE TENDER HEART.

The great secret of the tender heart lies in the fellowship of Jesus Christ. It is the continual wonder about Jesus, that He was so strong and yet so tender-hearted. No authority could make Him quail; no array of power could ever daunt Him, and yet a bruised reed He would never break and smoking flax He would not quench. He was tender not because He knew so little. He was tender because He knew so much. All that was hidden from duller eyes He saw—all that men had to bear and battle through. Their helplessness, their crying in the night, their inarticulate appeal to heaven—all this was ever audible to Jesus, and kept His heart as tender as a child's.—Selected.

"TO ALL THE PROFESSED CHRISTIANS OF THE WORLD."

By Feng Yu-Hsiang.

(The Christian General of China.)

The cruel episode which took place on May 30 at Shanghai has been repeated at Hankow and at Shameen in Canton time and again. We Chinese have been butchered ruthlessly by British police and troops.

To put the situation in brief, the British have flagrantly disregarded the sovereignty of China and have treated the Chinese people as though the latter were lower than hens and dogs.

What has happened in Shanghai had its origin in the cruel killing of a Chinese worker by the managers of certain Japanese-owned Canton mines there.

British Are Assailed.

Grieved at the unfortunate lot of their fellow citizens, the students conducted a lecturing campaign, but the British police took action without any justification and fired upon the unarmed students. As a result, the bodies of the dead and the injured lay in a pile at Hankow and on the Shameen in Canton.

The British authorities of both places went further in their high-handed policy and gave orders to the marine forces to bring machine guns into operation, resulting in even greater casualties.

Such dark and cruel deeds are indeed unprecedented. Alas, for a long time has Great Britain boasted of being a Christian. Now the British are engaged in perpetrating relentless and inhuman acts by means of their superior equipment of machine guns and cannons.

People Grief Stricken.

Not only is this a stain upon Christianity, but it is a disgrace to humanity at large. Overwhelmed with indignation and grief, the people throughout this country are unanimously protested with all their might.

Citizens of friendly nations have shown their sympathy with us and not a few Britishers and Japanese have in the interest of justice made declarations supporting our movement.

The International Labor Union and the Labor parties of various nations are particularly enthusiastic in their offers of assistance to our people.

We Christians have always been known as a class of people who always insist on justice and righteousness, the support of which has been recognized as our unshirkable duty.

Asks for Justice.

Unfortunately, concerning the persistent massacres in China, nothing has been heard from Foreign Missions up to the present. In my humble opinion, you must have entertained the sincerest sympathy for the suffering of the workers and must have regarded the recent massacre of innocent Chinese people as wholly unjustified, but, as you are under the overpowering pressure of imperialistic government, I presume you cannot see your way freely to give expression to your righteous views, for fear of incurring the displeasure of your respective Governments and the hatred of the capitalistic class which may cause damage to your own position.

Of course, due allowance must be made for your reticence in these circumstances, but, in the interest of justice and righteousness, I cannot help addressing to you a few words of friendly counsel.

Quotes From Scriptures.

You are all aware of the fact that Jesus Christ condemned severely the sins of the Pharisees and did not entertain the least fear of their strong power at that time.

It is said in the eighteenth chapter of the Acts: "Be not afraid, but speak and hold not thy peace." Again it is said in the tenth chapter of Matthew: "Fear not them who kill the body but are not able to kill the soul."

Here stand in bold relief the sacred instructions of the Master, and it is our duty to obey them to the letter. If we shut our eyes to these precepts, what else is the duty of a Christian?

It is my most fervent hope that you will stand up for justice. By all means don't be silent as a frozen cicada, as we Chinese put it. Further more, the most important principle of Christianity is that of defending the weak against the strong.

Love of humanity and the salvation of the world is our watchword. We must be bold enough to stand up for righteousness, regardless of the consequence, so that we may hold the shields of the Apostles against the fire arrows of the wicked. This is the only way whereby we can enjoy our existence; otherwise, though our bodies may live, we are in no better position than those who are dead. We shall certainly sink in hell after our death.

The fact that you are under the pressure of imperialism affords all the more reason why you should step out to make a desperate struggle to maintain the Christian integrity and to preserve the honor of Missionary institutions.

It is only after this is done that we may say the Cross is not worshipped in vain and that Christianity may be saved from bankruptcy. It rests with you to take instant action.—The Chinese Students Alliance.

LOCAL CHURCH HISTORY.

Next Sunday, August 16, St. Paul's Lutheran Church located six miles south of Burlington near Belmont Mills will hold an all day celebration. In the morning a leading minister of the denomination will preach a special sermon, and in the afternoon at 2 P. M. Dr. W. T. Whitsett will deliver a special historical address pertaining to the Colonial history of the older churches of the pre-Revolutionary group of this part of North Carolina, viz. St. Paul's Church, Low's Church, and Friedens Church. In the past few years much valuable historical material has been collected pertaining to this group of churches, and great interest is being manifested in these earlier events. St. Paul's dates from 1773 in its formal organization as a congregation, although services were held here even before this date. A large gathering is expected to attend these exercises. Rev. D. I. Offman is pastor in charge at this time. The church is located on a fine road, and easily reached on the hard surface road running south of Burlington to Belmont Mills.

—After the meeting at Tabernacle Brother Pritchard went to Central Hotel, Asheboro for a few days of rest before returning to his charge in Henderson.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

The joy of seeing America become a nation of great cities is lost in the realization of the fact that unheard of and unsolved problems have developed in the process. The altar of liberty has little in common with the disreputable, unsanitary, over-crowded alleys just off the avenues, or the sweat-shops, allied with reputable business establishments, where men and women eke out a miserable existence.

Democracy's stronghold must ever remain in our great American cities. Here the currents of life flow most swiftly, and mingle most readily. The people from the ends of the earth are elbowing each other from corner to corner, and the varied philosophies of the world are here given expression. Only a well entrenched Americanism can withstand this whirling eddy of ideas and ideals which have wrecked nations in other lands.

The cry is for a fair chance at life's opportunities, for wages to support the family, for houses fit for homes, for suitable recreational facilities, and for a first-hand experience with the Christ of the Golden Rule.

The city has become the battle ground for creeds and faiths, and the testing laboratory with its fiery furnace to discover real spiritual values. The church must not fail. Only a Christian Democracy can dig deep enough to give Americanism a fair opportunity to become the dominating force in these shifting currents of thought and life. In cities worse than those over which the Master wept, His disciples must today accept a challenge to so influence life as to establish more securely the very foundations of our nation, or see them swept away forever.

The church must not continue to retreat from the polyglot sections of the city. The community church should supplement and ultimately supplant the Neighborhood House by its own activities. All that is being done by the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the Red Cross, and all kindred organizations, the church itself should do under its own banners. The church now supplies the money, the genius, the leadership, the plans, but lacking the courage and the willingness to surrender the lines of division in the Protestant Churches, allows these great community enterprises to be carried forward under other names than her own. Every Christian Association and every Community, and Neighborhood House, and every other similar enterprise, should be conducted as an adjunct in name as it now is in fact, of the united Protestant Church.

The Church itself should be the community Center. The day of the prophet in the pulpit has not passed. The city eagerly awaits the coming of the man who dares to interpret principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ as they are related to business, society, economics and politics. The message that the Risen Christ can meet and satisfy every need of our complex civilization, must ring out from every pulpit with unhesitating conviction. There must be more than denunciation. A constructive interpretation of the gospel is required today.

"Loose him and let him go." The church in the city will never reach its proper position of leadership, and the prophet must delay his coming, while the minister must be errand boy, the business manager, and the general utility man of the organization. "Loose him and let him go."

Charles H. Beck.

HOME BASE—FOREIGN MISSIONS.

Articles in religious papers, ours included, have made it appear as if efforts to develop foreign missions affect adversely home missions, and invite denominational retrogression. They cited the Moravian church as an example of what too much specialization in foreign missions will do. They made a grievous blunder by so doing.

Surely "the purpose is the extension of the Kingdom," but the time has passed to insist "that America should obey the scriptural injunction to begin at Jerusalem in its proclamation of the gospel."

Three hundred years of preaching the gospel here has certainly carried America beyond the "begin at Jerusalem" period, for even in early apostolic days God's revealings and persecution sent the Christians forth from their homes—"therefore they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word." That began the movement from the "begin at Jerusalem," out "unto the uttermost part of the earth."

Under modern conditions, the world's evangelization requires a home base, and America with all its churches, institutions, agencies, resources has a home base to which all church boards alike must turn for workers and means to further their special part of the one work of the Kingdom.

Of course, the home base must be developed as much as possible to secure the prayed-for growth of denominational enterprises, but, from the nature of things, the main dependence for this must be on the pastors and the church members rather than on the Board of Home Missions, great as is our appreciation of its worth and work.

I regret the apparent reflection on our General Conference in the article referred to, "our highest governing body has not been fully conscious of this fact,"—need of developing the home base adequately—and "legislation has favored the foreign missionary enterprises of the denomination at the expense of the home activities of the church."

The church is a missionary society, its great commission was "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," and it exists for that as its supreme task. Our Union Board is doing in three lands practically all the kinds of work, and more besides, which our entire denomination is doing in America with all its Boards and institutions, and hence it ought to have full consideration and support.

The whole denomination is at work in America, and the Board of Home Missions is one factor therein, doing one kind of work, and cooperating largely with Annual Conferences in organizing and maintaining churches, but the Union Board of Foreign Missionary Administration must represent all the factors of the denomination doing all the work required to build up a new church in three heathen lands. The following is an unfortunate statement.

"In a limited degree we are following the Moravian Church which was so zealous in the prosecution of its work abroad that it entirely neglected its work in the homeland, and as a consequence the church has almost passed out of existence in America."

That was likely inspired by an article in "The United Presbyterian," or from similar sources of misinformation, unwarranted conclusion.

The Moravian church was compared with the Congregational Church, and stated "250 years ago the Moravian church had 250,000 members, the Congregational a mere handful. The former in its splendid zeal for foreign missions neglected its home field. All their energy and money were expended in their work abroad. As a result the home base dwindled and soon its foreign work was checked. Today as a result of the neglect of the home field the Moravians have shrunk to 35,000 members, one college, etc., while their foreign mission work has dwindled to a small band of missionaries working in a limited field."

In reply the Secretary of the Moravian Board states "250 years ago there was not a single Moravian in all America. In 1517 there were over 200,000 Protestant Bohemian-Moravian Brethren in Bohemia and Moravia, and to 1618 the number increased greatly, but then there were no foreign missions at all.

The wiping out of the Protestant Moravian Church was not due to its zeal for foreign missions, for it carried on no foreign missions at that time, but to the Anti-Reformation under Ferdinand 2 of Austria. The population of Bohemia Moravia fell from 3,000,000 to 800,000. Over two million Protestants simply disappeared from these Austrian Provinces done to death.

The modern Moravian Church was resuscitated through the exiles from Monrovia on the estates of Count Zinzendorf of Saxony in 1722, and in 1732 it began its first foreign mission, when the entire Church numbered barely 600 souls. The work could not have well dwindled very much and have carried on an ever expanding work for well nigh 200 years.

The only shrinkage of the work was caused by the world war and nothing else. Our large field in German East Africa was entirely destroyed.

"A small band of missionaries working in a limited field," but when it is remembered that the total membership in the four Home Provinces is 46,782—men, women and children—then to be carrying on foreign mission work in eleven different countries with 290 missionaries who have 105,711 souls in their care with 259 stations and outstations and 2,278 native workers is not so absolutely contemptibly small.

The Moravian Church in America 25 years ago had 11,661 communicants, and total contributions for foreign missions was $12,000.00. In 1922 we had enrolled 17,314 communicants, total for foreign missions $62,000.00.

That does not seem like a "dwindling" process.

Every year our gross gain is, as far as percentages go, astoundingly large, but it is lost in large measure, when it comes to net gain, through removals.

Far from our devotion to foreign missions being the cause of our smallness—there has been no dwindling—it is that which more than any one cause has maintained the life of our Church.

Without the spur and reflex action of our foreign missionary work our home Church would have "dwindled" to almost nothing.

If there is any one thing, of which our leaders are convinced, it is that our foreign missionary work has been the salvation of our Church."

That ought to dispel all gross exaggerations, palpable misstatements concerning the Moravian Church, and the effect of its great foreign missionary work upon the church at home.

Fred. C. Klein.

A WELL MERITED REBUKE.

In a recent speech, Dr. Millikan, of California, Nobel prize winner and internationally famous physicist, took occasion to rebuke the spirit of dogmatism so prevalent in the present day. Both so-called theologians and so-called scientists are guilty. Here is the newspaper quotation from Dr. Millikan's speech: "I see over-assertiveness from scientists in connection with such things as the late evolution trial, and I see on the other side assertiveness of subjects about which nobody knows anything. The pathetic thing is that we have scientists that are trying to prove evolution, which no scientist can ever prove." Doctor Millikan added that he is not on the other side. He has sense enough not to take sides when there are no sides to take. It is when men are wise above what is written or can be discovered that they make trouble. Our controversial wars are for the most part wars of error clashing with error.

IS GOD A BUNGLER?

Is He who made the lily, He who made the light, He who made the marvelous electric force, He who made the human soul, . . . is a bungling artificer when it comes to making man's body? I cannot believe it. That man who declared that he was stuccoed all over with quadrupeds was troubled with too free an imagination. Those unused organs of the human anatomy that the evolutionist makes so much of but which the ordinary man never notices at all, who knows that they did not play an important part in man's prenatal existence? Because we have not surely discovered their uses by no means proves that they had no uses. A conclusion based on ignorance does not present itself with much force.

—Rev. D. A. Braswell requests pastors and others who know of Methodist Protestants living in Spencer or Salisbury, to inform him of the fact. He may be addressed at Concord, N. C. He has made a beginning toward gathering our people for a new church organization, and has some very good people to begin with. Give all the help you can in forwarding this investigation that the Annual Conference may know the true situation when it meets in November.

Play the Game.

This subject suggests a contest meeting. One in which a game of some kind is played between rival players. Let the contest be taking part in the meeting. Suggest points for each participation. Speaking on a subject, giving an appropriate Bible verse, suggesting a hymn, speaking on the subject, even taking the collection on sides and counting it separately and let there be some understood points for the side giving the most. The above, so far as we knew, are the things on which our Heavenly Father credits us with service,—of course there are a great many other phases of Christian service, but these are some of them. Choose some athletic game, for the Christian life is so easily compared to an athletic game.

For the Leader.

Our C. E. Quarterly says, "Game" is a very popular word these days." And how true that is. We hear it on every side with reference to every phase of life. If success comes or failure, if joy or sorrow, if triumph or defeat, gain or loss, we must play the game. In the game each one plays his individual part and at the same time helps each of the others to play his part. So often the victory depends on one player and again it depends on some one playing a sacrifice of self in order that the entire team may win the victory. Perhaps nowhere are we so reluctant to sacrifice self as in the Christian life and yet right here is where we are taught all we know about self-sacrifice. Out on the ball field the boys will play a sacrifice game unhesitatingly if they see that it will help their side. In the Christian life we would too if we could see the opposing forces or the enemy and know that self-sacrifice spells defeat for him. One thing that makes it seem difficult to play the game of life in a fine noble victorious way is because we have to look at results to see what effect our living has on the enemy and his game. He does not come out in the open and show himself. But we have to look around and see what game he is playing, and how, what his tactics are, where he is concentrating, and lay our plans to defeat him in every move.

Laws of the Game of Life.

Every game has a set of rules or laws by which it is governed and directed. To break these is to lose place and even to be called out of the game and dismissed from the team. Life too has its rules and laws. Some of these are "love, kindness, generosity, sympathy, service, helpfulness, abhorrence of evil, square-dealing, honesty, reverence for God and respect for our fellow-man." Perhaps alone it would be impossible for us to keep these at all times but the Captain promises to be with us and He says, "My grace is sufficient for thee." Know the right and have the courage to do it. "It may make a difference to all eternity whether we do right or wrong today." Evil is made attractive, it is socialized, institutionalized, and militant. The kingdom of God and its higher laws can displace it only by conflict. "Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne. "This class involves conflict, suffering, earnestness and a determination to put our very best in it to win. Dr. Maltbie D. Babcock puts the thought this way in his little poem entitled,

Be Strong.

We are not here to play, to dream, to drift; We have hard work to do, and loads to lift. Shun not the struggle; face it, 'tis God's gift.

Be strong!

Say not the days are evil—who's to blame? And fold the hands and acquiesce—O shame! Stand up, speak out, and bravely, in God's name.

Be strong!

It matters not how deep entrenched the wrong, How hard the battle goes, the day how long. Faint not, fight on! To-morrow comes the song.

Be strong!

If you want a debate there is no better subject than that given by the C. E. Quarterly.

Resolved, that it is a better test of character to be a loser than to be a winner.

At the close it would be a helpful to have one of the younger girls tell a Pollyanna story from "The Glad Game."

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT.

Mrs. J. M. Stone, Editor.

Have you observed "Pine Ridge Day?" The appeal is before you and every other member of the Methodist Protestant church in North Carolina to co-operate with Dr. Woodford and the Woman's Home Missionary Society in raising $20,000 to erect a High school building at Alvin Drew Mission School, Pine Ridge, Kentucky.

This building is to be 48 by 60 feet; built of brick, and so arranged as to throw together by opening folding door all the class rooms and chapel when needed for a large crowd.

The plan for us in North Carolina is explained in a printed letter gotten out by the officers of the North Carolina Branch of Home Missions. That is for every man, woman, boy, and girl, who is a Methodist Protestant to give one penny for each year of their lives. This is such a small thing to ask yet if all respond we can raise our quota for this state. With 25,000 members this can be easily done.

Will you, my reader, see that each member of your family give the penny per years old?

We think a good place would be to have the children of the Sunday schools do the collecting. Each child make a list of the persons in his or her home and ask Mother, Dad and all the others to help pay for the brick in the High school at Pine Ridge. This school is giving an education to boys and girls of the Kentucky Mountain region who could never have a chance were it not for Alvin Drew Mission School. Many of these students come from homes where the parents can neither read nor write. All the grades are taught, also Alvin Drew school is now an accredited High school. So their graduates may enter the university of Kentucky without examination.

Will we answer the call to aid in this building which is being erected now? All names of contributors will go in the Corner Stone. Send the money to our State Treas., Mrs. H. A. Garrett, who will send on to Dr. Woodford. That is the only way our N. C. Branch can get credit for it. One penny for each year is all we ask, but, my, they will grow into dollars!!
Mrs. Stone.

Evangelistic.

The month of July was given to evangelistic work. Our Rehoboth meeting began 1st Sunday in July. On the following Monday Rev. R. A. Hunter, of Winston, came to our assistance. Two services daily were held up to and including Friday. The church was much revived and two persons joined the church.

Mt. Carmel.

On the 2nd Sunday we began our Mt. Carmel meeting. Bro. Hunter was with us in this meeting and did all the preaching except two sermons by the pastor. The church here was greatly revived and 14 persons joined the church. Our people were delighted with Bro. Hunter's preaching.

Union Chapel.

We began here 4th Sunday in July. Bro. K. C. Stubbins was with us from the beginning and did all the preaching except one sermon by the pastor. Here we also had a very helpful meeting. The church was revived and 7 persons joined the church. Of course all were pleased with Bro. Stubbins' preaching. The meeting closed Friday night. We were pleased to have Bros. Hunter and Stubbins spend all the nights at the parsonage. Dinners and suppers were taken with the people and we fared sumptuously every day. Between the 3d and 4th Sundays the pastor assisted Brother Chambliss at Flat Rock, preaching at three P. M. from Monday until Friday, thus filling up the month of July with evangelistic work. We did not lose any sleep; but failed to get much that we should have had.

Our third quarterly conference was held at Mt. Carmel on Tuesday of the meeting at 2 P. M. The attendance was the largest yet and the business was transacted in perfect harmony. The canvass of the vote for delegate to Annual Conference revealed the fact that Bro. C. W. Finch was selected. So far the year's work on Granville appears to have been successful. We are now announcing that the 4th quarterly conference will be held at Union Chapel on Saturday before the 4th Sunday in September. May we have a still larger attendance and the best reports ever. Why not? Are we not a progressive people?

WESTLEY'S GREATEST DAY.

Wednesday, May 24, 1738. I think it about five this morning, that I opened my Testament on these words: 'There are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, even that ye should be partakers of the divine nature.' (11 Pet. 1: 4). Just as I went out, I opened it again on these words, 'Thou art not far from the kingdom of God.' In the afternoon I was asked to go to St. Paul's. The anthem was, 'Out of the deep have I called unto Thee, O Lord; Lord, hear my voice, O let Thine ears consider well the voice of my complaint. If Thou, Lord, wilt be extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord, who may abide it? For there is mercy with Thee; therefore shalt Thou be feared. O, Israel, trust in the Lord; for with the Lord there is mercy, and with Him is plenteous redemption. And He shall redeem Israel from her sins."

"In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate street, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation; and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death."—The Journal of Rev. John Wesley, A. M., Standard Edition, Vol. I, page 472.

PINE RIDGE ITEMS.

Our little Mountain Central train is about at its end. Freight and express for us should now be sent to Slade, Kentucky instead of Camp-ton Junction.

Parcel post and other mail still come to Pine Ridge, Wolfe County.

Work on our High School building is going forward. We discovered very satisfactory stone on our own farm and so from our own quarry we are getting the foundation material. Building contractors in Lexington, who were born and reared in this community, have taken quite an interest in revising and improving our plans and in giving information that will mean a saving in the purchase of material.

Our funds are low but we have good reason to believe that our need will be supplied and we are very grateful indeed for the many friends who have already sent us help. By States, the receipts for our building fund so far, have been as follows: New Jersey, 25cts. Florida, $5.00; West Virginia, $5.00; Louisiana, $10.00; Texas, $12.00; Maryland, $20.00; Indiana, $20.00; Ohio, $25.00; Michigan, $30.00; Kentucky, $215.00; Pennsylvania, $500.00.

Ever contribution of five dollars or more will be entered on a list that will be deposited in the corner stone of our new building, August 9, 1925.

Our Tabernacle meetings begin July 26th and continue through August 9. We expect to have Rev. J. L. Nichols of Westminster, Maryland, and possibly other preachers, also Mr. and Mrs. Richard Nyburg, singing evangelists. Visitors will be welcome and a very moderate charge for board and room will be made. Roads are good all the way from Cincinnati now and auto parties will find the trip remarkably interesting. The drive from Cincinnati can easily be made in a day—via Paris, Winchester, Kentucky, Clay City, Stanton, Slade, then nine miles up the hill to Pine Ridge.

QUIET TALKS ON THE SIMPLE ESSENTIALS.

By S. D. Gordon.

Earth's Roughest Hill.

Contrasts make things sharper to the eye. Black looks blacker on white, and the white whiter. A dirty mongrel cur stands out uglier in a brood of well-kept thorough-breeds.

Contrasts never were sharper than in the one Man of the race. He was of the blood royal of earth, yet He lived in a white-washed stone cottage. He was a lineal aristocrat of the aristocrats, yet He earned bread as a carpenter. He came from a throne; He came to a dirty obscure Oriental village. He came for a world throne, but He lived among a people peculiarly provincial and clannish.

His hand had held a scepter; it handled a hammer and saw. His brow had graced a crown; it was scarred by a crown of thorns. He came, He said, to reign over a race; He hung on a rude cross.

He was the purest of men by consent of those that hated Him; He suffered as the vilest of outcast sinners. He came to bring in a blessed order of things to this war-scarred, thorn-growing earth. But sin broke the plan. But the thing's not finished yet. The game isn't played out. The innings will turn. Wait a bit.

Those contrasts didn't just happen. That Man wasn't foiled. The thing was planned. The purpose of the Man's heart shaped the plan. The passion of His heart drove it thru, even though His heart broke in the drive. Passion and purpose drove the Man steadily up the roughest, steepest, tallest hill on earth.

The geography of Jesus' life is fascinating. He was the Son of the Earth as well as the Son of Man. Every phase of human experience He knew, and every sort of the earth's surface He touched. He belongs to us down here, doubly.

He was born in a little village of the plains. In infancy He crossed the desert, and slept by the pyramids of Egypt, the cradle of history. He lived thirty out of thirty-three years in a common country village.

He was baptized in the muddy waters of the Jordan River. He was tempted in the Wilderness. He drew the crowds perilously thick by Galilee's pretty blue waters. He was transfigured on towering snow-clad Hermon. He went through the sorest strain of spirit in a garden under gnarled olive trees.

He was hurt to death on Calvary's hill. His body found a three days' resting place in a new-hewn tomb of the rock. He was the Son of Man and Son of Earth. He touched both intimately at every point of contact.

But the highest hill He ever climbed, the steepest, the roughest, was Calvary. It was tallest. It lay on the top of another hill, Nazareth. Nazareth was the human life He lived. Nazareth was the underpinning of Calvary. It was the quality, the purity of the Nazareth life that gave the distinctive meaning to the Calvary death.

It was steepest. None other climbed it, nor could, nor can. And only He by giving His life clean out. It was roughest. Thorn-growing, sin-roughened, it took His very life out getting to it stop. But He went.

Have you ever been on Calvary? It faces three ways.

It faces up—toward God. The condition of things on the earth is a scandalous blot of God's administration. Surely God can't be good. It can't be that He cares, to let things go as they do, suffering for the innocent, wrongs unrighted, selfishness riding roughshod over men, evil unpunished. Where is God? Does He know? Does He care? Why aren't things straightened out?

That roughest hill answers. It gives God's estimate of the wrongs that scandalize earth. They deserve the treatment His Son received. Does He feel? He Himself suffered at Calvary when His Son suffered, to tell His estimate of sin, and to destroy sin's power, and to hold judgment, sin's self-judgment, in abeyance till man has had fullest opportunity. God's embarrassment was to show His intense hatred of sin, and yet His intense love of man. He did both in that Calvary event.

Calvary faces down—towards Satan, that splendid foul spirit prince. Sin is obeying Satan. It enslaves man. The Calvary Man took on Himself what was due us. We are set free. Satan is answered fully and defeated stingingly. His power is broken. Calvary makes slaves free men.

And that hill faces out—toward men. It breaks our hearts with the love of it. For that Man didn't have to die, except the have-to of His love. Ten or eleven times they tried to do Him to death. And they easily could so far as sheer force were concerned.

Each time He held them off with a power they couldn't understand, and couldn't resist. Then He yielded. The dying was voluntary. It means just what meaning the Man put into it. It had to be done, He said. He did it out of love for us. And the love of the thing, once it gets home, breaks a man's heart.

Sainted Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, sat by the sick bedside of a cultured judge in the southland, talking in his scholarly way. At last the judge politely said, "Pardon me; but you know I'm facing the real things. Won't you talk to me like you'd talk to my black boy Jim?"

And the bishop said quietly, "You're a sinner, like me. Jesus died for our sins. Trust Him as a little child." And the judge said, "Thank you, Bishop, I can get hold of that. That gives me peace."

When one faces the real things of life, or beyond, it's touch with the man of the Calvary Hill that gives peace.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

WHAT BECAME OF ALICE'S SINS.

There is a little girl living in the same house that I am, named Alice. She is a very wild little thing, and never sits still more than a few moments at a time. If I listen, I hear her running up and down the halls as hard as she can go, then her restless little feet fly to the door, to see if the bakery man is coming; then she catches sight of poor pussy, and hugs her until she gets a good scratch in return.

Sometimes she comes and stays with me, while I read to her, or tell her a little story.

One evening, hot and flushed she entered the room, and sat down on the little footstool beside the window.

I went on with my writing, but presently, hearing a deep drawn sigh, I looked up.

Alice was gazing out of the window, with a most unusually saddened look on her mischievous little face,

"I suppose God only likes the good little boys and girls," she said, with almost an impatient shrug of her shoulders.

"What makes you think that?" I answered.

"Well, I am quite sure He doesn't care about me."

"Why not?"

"O! because I've done such heaps of wicked things."

"Have you?"

"Yes—heaps—disobeyed mother, and slapped Johnnie, and, O! ever so much more. I'm sure Jesus doesn't love me."

"Come here, Alice," I said, "and let us have a little talk about this. Now, if every one had been nice and good and obedient, do you think God would have thought it necessary to part with His dearly loved Son, and send Him into the world to die on the cross?"

"I don't know."

"Ah, Alice! if we could have saved ourselves, Jesus would never have come, but He knew how bad we all were, how sunken in sin and iniquity, so He left His Father's home and suffered on the cross instead of us, and now He says,

"I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance."

"And does He really love the naughty ones?" asked Alice anxiously.

"O, yes," I answered, "and Alice, you know when you have been naughty or disobedient to your mamma, she doesn't cease to love you, does she? but she feels very grieved and sad, and she wants you to tell her you are sorry, doesn't she?"

"O yes, she does," was the quick reply.

"And as soon as you have confessed your faults, she takes you in her arms, and kisses you, and tells you it's all right now, does she not? Well, that is what God does.

"If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we go to Him and confess that we are sinners, He shows us Jesus on the cross, the One who died for us, and who wants us to accept His full and free pardon, and if we are His children, and we confess to Him all that we do that is wrong, we are again happy in His presence.

"Then He does love me though I am so bad," said Alice with a great sigh of relief. When mother came in a few minutes later to take Alice to bed, she was surprised to see the quiet look on her little girl's face, and even more so, when, instead of the usual entreaties to be allowed to sit up 'just five minutes more,' she readily went to bed. And O! I am sure that He who began a good work in that little girl's heart then, will complete it, that she may be the Lord's for time and eternity.

Yes, dear little reader, Jesus calls the naughty ones. I want you to say—

"I bring my sins to Thee,

The sins I cannot count;

That all may be cleansed be

In Thy once opened fount;

Jesus paid it all,

All to Him I owe.

Sin has left a crimson stain,

He washed it white as snow."

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." John 3:36.

THE SHEPHERD'S CARE.

I am Jesus' lamb;

O, how safe I am!

Folded by His strong, kind arm,

I can never suffer harm.

Jesus left His throne,

And to earth came down,

Came to seek and save the lost,

Though His precious blood it cost.

I was full of sin,

Very black within;

Jesus' blood has washed me now

Whiter than the whitest snow.

All along the way,

Lest my feet should stray,

He, the tender Shepherd, leads,

And His little lamb He feeds.

When His home I share,

In the glory fair,

Then my lips will sing His praise

Evermore through endless days.

WHAT WAS DONE WITH A PENNY.

"What good would a penny do?" Richard was always asking. "I'll just spend this one for candy, and maybe the next one I'll put in the mite box. If I had lots of money, I'd like to give big, shining dollars; but a penny doesn't count. When I'm a man, I'll give lots of money."

"But if all the boys spend their pennies, where will the offering be?" asked his mother. "Somebody must save, and you should be willing to do your part."

"I would like to, mamma, but a penny isn't anything," said Richard. "I want one of those pretty red candies awful bad."

"Richard, I wish you would take this penny and run over to Mrs. Gray for one of those slips she promised me," said Mrs. Snow, seeming to forget all about the mite box. "She sells them for a penny apiece, and I want to start one."

Richard was very glad to have his mother forget about the mite box, and he could buy the red candy on his way for the plant, so he ran whistling down the street. "Now get one of these old tomato cans in the back yard and punch three holes in the bottom of it with a nail," said his mother, when he came back with the geranium branch and his mouth full of candy.

It was a short task to plant and water the slip, as she directed him, and very soon Richard was out at play and had forgotten all about the plant. He did not think of it again until his mother asked him, some weeks later, to hunt up a cracked stone jar in which to transplant it, and then he only noticed that it was growing rapidly.

"Today's the date the Juniors take their mite boxes to the meeting, mamma," said Richard, one day in September. "Do you know where mine is?"

"Yes, it is in your closet, dear. Just where you put it when the teacher gave it to you."

Richard brought out the dusty thing and shook it hard; but it was empty.

"I declare, I forgot all about it," he said. "Mamma, won't you please lend me a quarter to put into it?"

"No, Richard; you know papa doesn't allow borrowing."

"But I'll have to go with an empty box, mamma, and all the others will have money. I wish I hadn't spent everything for candy. I will do better next time. But I never had more than a penny at a time, and a penny does not count."

"Richard, do you remember that penny slip you bought from Mrs. Gray last spring? That was your penny that you lost, and I wanted to show you what could be done with it. Bring me that little red box in my sewing basket."

Richard brought out the red box, and when it was opened, a number of silver and copper coins rolled out. "Do you remember that all summer you have been pitting little slips and selling them when they grew strong and thrifty? This money is all yours for the mite box and the plant is still left."

"Forty-three cents!" exclaimed Richard, counting the money. "And all from one penny! I'll never say again, mamma, that a penny doesn't amount to anything."—Sunday School Times.

THE GLORIOUS FOURTH.

"Aw, let him come with me!" begged Joe Fuller. "I'll take care of him."

"I'm not a baby," put in his little brother Tom.

Their mother looked anxiously from one to the other. Joe was seventeen and had been around a lot with his father, but Tom was only ten.

"He might get too tired," she said. "Or he might get hold of your gun and shoot himself or you. Besides there are rattlesnakes on the plain and he might get bitten."

"Mommer," said Tom, "Joe was a fine shot at my age and he used to trek around with Dad. Why do I have to be such a sissy?"

"He's never seen a real Fourth of July celebration with fireworks and all," remarked Joe.

"Well," sighed their mother, "you'll only be one night on the way, and your father will be with you coming back—"

"Hurray!" shouted Tom, before his mother could finish. He knew he had her permission to go with his older brother to Judstown, where they had relatives and where there was a fort and a real celebration on the Glorious Fourth.

She saw her two sons off on the third of July, Joe riding a spirited mustang and Tom on a sedate mare. It was a fine, cool morning with a promise of scorching weather before noon.

Tom stood the trip well that day. He cooked the grub and ate his share of it too, and the two boys turned in early, wrapping themselves in thier blankets for the night was cool.

"The one that wakes up first fires off this salute to the Glorious Fourth," said Joe, laying his gun between himself and his small partner.

"Gee!" exclaimed Tom. "I'm goin' to be the guy!"

And that was his lost thought as he sank off into blissful slumber.

He lost all track of time for awhile, when suddenly he became wide awake; was it day? All around him was a weird light. Then he saw the moon with a star beside her. It must be near dawn he decided. But at the same moment he knew that it was not the light that had roused him. There was something with him in his blanket!

Tom lay very still, something was moving, breathing against his side. What could it be?

The boy seemed to think of everything, then he remembered an old Indian who used to stop at their ranch on his way to Judstown once in awhile. The old Indian was called Blue Horse and knew everything to be known about trekking in the wilds. One thing he had told the Fuller boys came back to Tom. It had to do with rattlesnakes.

"Bad fellow," the Indian had warned. "Not too much quick. Him no bite till him coil up. Sometimes him creep in blanket and make him warm on cold night. Indian jump out quick. Rattlesnake jump out after him. Indian keel him before he coil up."

"That's what's in here with me!" shuddered Tom. "A rattler!"

He decided to take the Indian's advice. He stayed very still until the snake quit moving, then like a flash he threw off his blanket and sprang to his feet.

In the moonlight he could see everything plainly. He saw a huge snake flash out of the blanket after him, but before he could make a move, the reptile glided over to Joe. Joe lay on his back peacefully snoring after a hard day's travel. The rattler crawled upon his chest and calmly coiled itself.

"Bite on face pretty sure keel," the Indian had said.

Tom stared in horror watching the wicked reptile. Every second he expected his brother to waken and move. He must save him.

"Joe," he called. "Joe, don't move! Don't move!"

Joe's eyes opened.

"Don't move!" cried Tom. "There's a rattler on your chest. I'll tempt him off. Keep still!"

You may believe Joe obeyed his younger brother! He lay rigid while the snake swayed to and fro, flicking out his tongue and showing his fangs.

Tom looked about for a stick with which to tease the serpent, and his eye fell on his brother's gun, lying where the older boy had playfully put it the night before.

"Joe, I'm going to shoot the rattler," said Tom in a choked voice. "If I poke it, it might strike you. Keep still!"

Joe shut his eyes and said his prayers. He was a good boy.

Tom said his prayers too, and lay down holding the gun steadily. Slowly he brought the barrel nearer and nearer the snake. He dared not miss, and if his hand shook and he shot too low—well, he would not think about that, he decided. He must concentrate on aiming true.

When he had the weapon within a foot of the coiled reptile, he pulled the trigger. He had to. The rattler was just about to strike.

There was a loud explosion. Joe gave a gasping cry. Tom fell over and covered his face, not daring to look.

"Three cheers for the Glorious Fourth!" cried a voice.

Tom looked up and there sat his brother holding up part of a dead rattler.

"Oh, Joe!" cried Tom. "I didn't shoot you, did I?"

"Do I look shot?" inquired Joe.

"But why did you yell?" asked Tom.

"Well, I never had a gun go off so near me before—that is when I was at the business end of it," said Joe. "I felt the powder scorch my clothes! Whew! Well, kid, shake! You saved my life. You're all right!"

"Joe, if I'd killed you!" shuddered Tom, who had a strong imagination.

"Well, you didn't," said Joe. "A miss is as good as a mile. Look!"

He pointed to the east and they saw the dawn breaking with a pearly pink light, while the moon grew pale and the star almost vanished.

"You fired the first salute," laughed Joe. "May all the enemies of the United States perish like that old rattler! Hurrah for the Red, White and Blue!"

"Hurrah!" shouted Tom. "Gee, I'm hungry. Killing rattlers must give kids an appetite."

"Yeh!" said Joe. "Let's rattle the grub and then get going. We'll have a fine snake story to tell at the Fort and Dad'll be proud of you."

That was a memorable Fourth for the two American boys, and their mother at home remarked to one of the girls:

"You know I feel as if something had happened to Tom."

"It's probably something nice," replied her daughter. "You know, Tom is always lucky."—Selected.

Other gifts: Mrs. Cornelius W. Williams, Winston-Salem, two nice dresses and two pair hose; Mrs. Robbins, High Point, a lot of toys and magazines; Union Chapel, W. H. M. S., two sheets; Mrs. H. R. Lee, box of candy for all the children; C. E. Society, High Point College, underwear for a child.

A class from the Home on yesterday gave a program in Burlington at the close of which a good offering was taken. The good people of Burlington took us to their homes and treated us so well that I think all thought they had the best place.

If there are others who would like a program by the class, let us hear from you, telling us what day and hour suits.

For every gift, favor or kindness mentioned in this report, we thank you one and all.

IN MEMORIAM.

In a sanatorium in Asheville, N. C., in the early morning of June 29, 1925, there entered into eternal rest the spirit of Miss Sadie Burton. Last winter her health broke down and she entered a sanatorium in Asheville with bright hopes of a complete restoration to health and all that friends, medical skill and good nursing could do could not stay the hand of death. She was called from her labors in the prime of life, being twenty-two years of age. We can not understand why but God knows what is best and if a sparrow can not fall without His notice we know that one of His children whose life was dedicated to Christian service cannot be removed prematurely.

It was the writers privilege to know the subject of this sketch and to know her was to be conscious of the fact that she was a sincere Christian whose life was governed by high ideals. She was true in every sphere of life whether in the home or in the school room teaching or in the church she did her best and was appreciated and loved by all who knew her.

She gave her heart to Christ early in life and at the time of her death was an honored member of the Reidsville Methodist Protestant church.

The funeral services were conducted from the home of John E. Burton, her brother, on Lawsonville avenue, by the writer, after which we laid her body to rest in Greenview cemetery. She leaves to mourn their loss her mother, Mrs. Ida B. Burton, one brother, John E. Burton, of Reidsville and three sisters, Mrs. George Newnam, of Stacy; Mrs. W. C. Burgess, of Stokesland, Va., and Miss Mattie Burton, of Reidsville.

J. D. Williams.

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE

Union Grove, Orange Charge.—The revival meeting began Sunday, August 2, and continued until Thursday, August 6th. Rev. J. D. Williams did all the preaching. His sermons were clear cut and to the point.

Only two or three attended these services who did not claim to be Christians; these we failed to reach.

The church seemed to be strengthened by the preaching of Bro. Williams. We believe the seed he sowed will tell in days to come. The offering for Bro. Williams was $28.00.

Sincerely,

B. M. Williams.

Spencer.—Rev. D. A. Braswell preached in the home of A. L. Moore, Carolina Ave., the first Sunday in July and continued the meeting till Thursday. We all thank Bro. Braswell for these helpful sermons. On July ninth we organized our W. H. M. S. with ten members. Bro. Braswell came again Sunday August ninth. Preached from Luke chapter 13:20,21. Where unto shall I liken the kingdom of God. It is like leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened.

We were sorry that so few heard this good sermon.

He hopes to have this work in shape by conference. Pray for us that we make no mistake in this work at Spencer, and that if it is God's will that we have a church in Spencer that our faith fail not, and that we may all do our best for our Master.

Mrs. A. L. Moore.

Box 66, Spencer, N. C.

Zoar, Mecklenburg Circuit—

On the fourth Sunday in July, our revival meeting began. Our pastor was very much disappointed in not getting his pulpit help, Rev. C. E. Ridge. But sickness took place in his home and he could not get off to come. We were all so sorry to hear this, as we were looking forward to his being with us.

Our pastor tried to get other help but could not. So he did the preaching himself. And it doesn't seem that anyone could have preached better sermons than he preached. I don't see how anyone could sit under the sound of such good preaching and not repent. We hope there was much good done, that will show up later.

We made up a free collection for our pastor during the meeting which amounted to $17.35.

The third quarterly conference was held at Zoar on Wednesday morning following the meeting. Our delegate to Annual Conference is Mr. T. J. Atkins of Zoar.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

Friendship, Stanly Charge.—It would be supposed, if anyone thought of us at all, that we had disappeared or gone out of existence. But the reporter has just failed to do her duty. We are still here and more determined to do our duty than ever before.

The county Sunday school convention was here July 30, 31. Many interesting lectures were given by the different speakers of the convention, on the importance of better Sunday schools.

We are looking forward to the return of it next year.

As a great many people attended the meetings at different places the attendance at Sunday school yesterday was not so large. 124 present with a collection of $1.81.

Our special meeting began here Sunday, August 2, and closed Friday evening.

Rev. Mr. J. R. Hutton of Greensboro did the preaching from first to last. Mr. Hutton delivered some real gospel sermons taken right from the Bible and proved out.

We have never had in our pulpit a more able and Bible-knowing man than was Mr. Hutton. He won the love of many friends here and especially those whose homes he visited. He will always have a hearty welcome in our church and homes. We did not have such a great revival but I believe that he so stressed the truth that it sank so deep into the hearts and will long be remembered that perhaps will do more lasting good than many a revival. I know what he has said has benefited me and a great many others.

The collection taken for him amounted to $32. I feel that it did not half pay him for his work but the Heavenly Father will pay him more abundantly.

There were several reclamations and perhaps some to join the church Sunday as the doors of the church will be opened and also the Baptism of infants.

Martha Ann Harwood, Rep.

Shelby.—We have had fairly good attendance at our services at this place for the past two Sundays. The pastor and family returned on Friday, July 31, from a vacation of two and a half weeks spent with relatives in and near Burlington. During our absence the Sunday school went on as usual but there was no preaching service.

Preaching services were resumed the first Sunday with the Lord's Supper at the morning service. The pastor is considering plans for a revival meeting to be held the latter part of September. Definite announcement will be made later concerning this meeting.

Last Sunday was a good day for the Shelby church. We were very fortunate in having with us in the Sunday school and preaching services Mr. H. G. Easley, of Burlington, who is a blind musician and long time friend of the pastor and family. Mr. Easley played the piano during the Sunday school and preaching service Sunday morning. He sang a solo at each service. The Sunday night service was given over to Mr. Easley at which time he rendered a very enjoyable musical program and made an interesting address on the doings of the blind people in North Carolina, there being 1200 of these people in the State. We were delighted also to have Brother W. E.

Ledford and a number of other singers from Double Shoals at the night service. They sang several selections preceding the program by Mr. Easley.

Mr. Easley, who was born blind, is a very interesting character. Very early in life he began the study of piano music. He has followed the profession of musician for a quarter of a century and is an expert in his profession. The pastor and family were delighted to have him as their guest during the week-end and we have the promise of a return visit in the future.

We wish to express our thanks to Brother Clyde Tate for a nice chicken, which was dressed and ready for the pot. We thank Mrs. Wm. McSwain for nice cantelopes.

Our Third Quarterly Conference was scheduled for Wednesday night of this week. We will give a report of the conference next week.

We expect to have all of the regular services next Sunday.

C. B. Way, Pastor.

High Point.—The Sunday school held its annual picnic last Thursday afternoon at Ritter's Lake near Greensboro. About 300 members motored to the Lake, which was the largest crowd we have ever had on an outing. The supper was delicious, the weather delightful, the place ideal, and the occasion proved to be most enjoyable, especially to the children.

The A. M. Idol Philathea class and Circle No. 4 of the Foreign Missionary Society will hold a joint meeting on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock with Miss Pearl Reynolds on Fourth St.

Dr. Stevens and his evangelistic party will hold a series of union revival services in High Point beginning Sept. 13th, in which our church will join. He will come to the city upon invitation of the Ministerial Association and the meetings will be held in a tent located on the city lot next to the First Baptist church. It is hoped that a glorious revival will result.

Mrs. W. C. Hammond, who is Executive Secretary of the Board of Public Welfare, has returned from New York, where she has been taking a special course at the School of Social Work. Mrs. Hammond is a very efficient and skillful welfare officer.

Mrs. Ben. T. Moore has issued invitations to an At Home in honor of her brother's bride, Mrs. Richard Reitzel, to be given Friday afternoon, August 14th, at the Reitzel residence, 331 N. Main St.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Garrett, formerly of the Children's Home, have moved into their new residence on West College Drive.

Mrs. Ethel Harris Kirley of Philadelphia and F. R. Harris, Jr., of Henderson have been the guests of Dr. and Mrs. R. M. Andrews.

Mr. and Mrs. James T. Ryan are building an attractive new home on Parkway.

Miss Elizabeth Mitten of Westminster, Md. is expected today to be the guest of her friend and former schoolmate, Mrs. Lewis E. Teague.

The death of the venerable soldier of the cross, Rev. W. C. Kennett, will bring much sorrow to the hearts of the older members of the congregation, many of whom knew him and esteemed him highly.

Mt. Zion.—We have always heard—"there is some good in every person"—I think we could say, "there is some bad in every person" at times. (The Word says there's none perfect, no, not one.) At least the Mt. Zion members of quarterly conference are guilty of this, even I. Last Saturday at 1:30 P. M. our third quarterly conference convened with the shoals church: not a member showed up from Mt. Zion or Pinnacle. Now, as for me, I just simply forgot it, and several others did the same thing. Nevertheless I sinned when I became so interested in things of the world that I forgot my sacred pledged duty to my church. This conference had been duly announced by Bro. Hunter, there was no excuse. Some may have failed to hear the announcements made, but they were made just the same; they ought to have heard. Some may say, Well, the Secretary ought to notify each member a day or two beforehand by mail; possibly I ought, but I tried that once and didn't see any results. The trouble with us is when we have something we want to do or some other place we want to go to, we just let selfishness come in and say, "It's all right, I'll not go; they can do the work." It's a shame any time to neglect, but now particularly when the church needs to muster every available force to fight his wave of evolution, another attempt to destroy the Bible and the fact that Jesus Christ our Savior. I say it's doubly shameful that you and I—should or would treat such important work so coolly. It's simply ignominious; let's not do it again.

Every cloud has a silver lining, so we are told. The conference unanimously voted that Bro. Hunter have a month's vacation; we're mighty glad of that—he needs it and deserves so much. He will take his vacation during the month of September.

Mt. Zion folks, we're badly behind with our finances; let's get bus and pay Bro. Hunter, he may enjoy his vacation rather than have to hire during the month of September for a living.

We had 109 at Sunday school last Sunday. Immediately after Sunday school the missionary society met and had a splendid meeting. They had one good new member come in, Mrs. D. Culler. We are glad to see this missionary spirit prevailing.

Sunday night Bro. Hunter preached another fine sermon. One brother remarked that he could pay $5 more on pastor's salary by having heard that sermon. Everybody enjoyed.

Bro. S. T. Kellam was elected delegate to annual Conference.

Our county Sunday school convention meets at Quaker Gap Baptist church in Stokes Co. the 11th and 12th of August. (September?—Editor.) There is to be a pennant given to the Sunday school that has the most members present for convention 16 years of age and over. We hope to bring the pennant back to Mt. Zion. We're going after it.

It's rather late, but we aim to have a children's day program yet. Date will be announced later. C. W. Allen, Rep.

Mt. Lebanon, Randleman Ct.—Our Sunday school met Friday, July 31, to picnic at the children's Home. We started about ten with two trucks well loaded and several cars. Mr. Neese (our pastor) led with his car.

We stopped over to see our new M. P. College, had a short chapel service. It did our hearts good to read in the fly leaf of their hymnal, "Contributed by Randleman Charge."

Messrs. Andrews and Garrett showed us over the new building; the entire college is splendid. Fine enough for any boy or girl who is interested in college.

We arrived at the Children's Home, were received gladly by the Superintendent and his faithful wife (Mr. and Mrs. Lowdermilk). The children and all connected with the Home seemed greatly pleased to see us. We served dinner on the lawn directly in front of the Home. The children and every one present seemed to enjoy the feast; the tables were well loaded.

In the afternoon we served lemonade. The children gave toasts, also a short but very interesting program was given in the school-room. Every one reported a grand trip.

I'm sure we would be delighted to pay them another visit in the near future. Rep.

Haw River, Glen Raven Charge.—On Monday night after the first Sunday in July our special meeting began and ran over the second in July. Our church is greatly revived. Bro. G. H. Hendry did the preaching and he surely did preach some fine sermons. Every one liked him fine. Hope he will come again some time to preach for us. On last Saturday evening our Sunday school classes met on the church lawn for a good time. We served ice cream and cake and watermelons. Everyone enjoyed it. We have a very good Sunday-school now, but not what it should be yet.

Bro. Williams was with us Sunday and gave us another one of his fine sermons. Sunday night the children's service was given and it was grand. Every child did his part fine. Miss Thelma Thompson had the music in her charge. Misses Espa and Nellie Bullard had charge of training the children. The exercise was a success. The offering was $17.80.

We had Mr. and Mrs. John Stout from Greenville, S. C., to worship with us Sunday; always glad to have Mr. Stout with us, as he was once our Sunday school superintendent. Some of our members are sick. Bro. Calvin Clayton is real feeble. Pray for him. Rep.

Mebane.—A fairly good congregation Sunday morning for Sunday school and preaching service. Last Monday night week the W. H. M. S. and W. F. M. S. held their meeting at the home of Mrs. Claude Sykes. After business matters were attended to, Mrs. Sykes served cream and cake. The W. H. M. S. are planning to give a musical program sometime real soon for the benefit of the society. The next meeting will be held at the home of Mrs. Hill Payne.

"Stunt Night" was observed last Friday night. This was given by the Christian Endeavor Society under the direction of Miss Pauline Nicholson. Proceeds amounted to $6.25.

On the night of August 1, 1925, Mr. James T. Terrell passed from this life. He had been in declining health for some time and a short time before his death his condition became critical. He was 72 years old and had been a member of the church for a number of years, first joining at Hebron M. P. church and later moving his membership to Mebane.

The funeral was conducted the following Monday afternoon in the M. P. Church at this place by his pastor, Rev. T. M. Johnson.

There survive him his wife, seven children, eight grandchildren and three brothers.

The interment took place in Mebane cemetery where he was laid to rest beneath a beautiful mound of flowers. Reporter.

Midway, Haw River Ct.—This reporter was asked some time ago, What is the matter with Midway? as there had not been any report for so long. There is nothing the matter with Midway. Just carelessness in the reporter.

We are still moving along nicely. Have had good attendance at Sunday school these hot summer months.

Our protracted meeting began the fourth Sunday in July and closed last Wednesday night.

The fourth Sunday morning our president, Dr. A. G. Dixon, was with us and preached a splendid sermon. We are always glad to have him with us, as he is one of our boys and is dearly loved at this place. In the afternoon Bro. Lowdermilk and ten of his children gave us a splendid program which was enjoyed by all present. Collection for Children's Home was $33.10. Monday morning at the 11 o'clock hour Bro. Phillips came to us and preached for us until Tuesday night after the first Sunday. He came to us filled with wonderful messages and we feel sure that all who heard him were benefited. We feel that this meeting has helped the whole community. There were several converted and some reclaimed. We hope to have some join the church in the near future. The people presented Bro. Phillips a purse of about $41 which was not enough for the faithful service rendered by him and wife. Their singing at each service was enjoyed very much. After they left our pastor carried the meeting on till Wednesday night when it closed.

Last Sunday afternoon our pastor, Bro. Reed, was away visiting his old home church and we were glad to have with us our young brother, Elwood Carroll, from High Point College. We enjoyed his talk and predict for him a successful life in the work of the Master. Mrs. G. W. Apple, Reporter.

COUNTING THE STARS.

Rev. Mark Guy Pearse was walking home with his little girl by his side. "Father," said she, "I am going to count the stars."

"Very well," he replied; "go on." After a time he heard her counting. "Two hundred and twenty-three, two hundred and twenty-four, two hundred and twenty-five, two hundred and twenty-six. Oh! dear," she said, "I did not think there were so many!"

"Ah! I sometimes say in my soul," said the preacher-father, "Now, Master, I am going to count thy blessings, thy benefits." Soon my heart sighs—sighs not with sorrow, but burdened with such goodness, and I say within myself, 'Ah! I had no idea there were so many.'—Selected.

HANNAH'S TALENT.

Marybelle could sing, and Estner could recite, and Josephine could play, and Hannah was the star basketball player in the eighth grade, and Marcia could sew in a way that won her prizes at the school contests, and Julia was the best pupil in the Longfellow Building in point of scholarship, but Hannah alone of the little club had no talent. That is, Hannah felt sure she was the only one of the gay little group that could do nothing well. Of course, the other girls never hunted such a thing, but Hannah felt it as one and another was praised and asked to help with various undertakings and she was always left out.

"You have the home-making talent, dearie," said Hannah's mother when she heard the doleful story of the club member who had no talent. "I don't know how I should ever get through the sewing and the cooking and the care of the little ones and the problem of making home a happy place without my big girl."

"Yes, but mother, I'd like to be able to do something to make people praise me," said Hannah, trying to keep back the tears. "Josephine was called back three times at the recital this afternoon, and Esther had such a clever little piece that made everybody laugh—well, I can't help being a little bit envious."

"Maybe we can manage to give you some music lessons again soon," said Mrs. Richards. "It is too bad the lessons are so broken into, but times have been hard, and it isn't easy to provide for a large family."

"It wouldn't do any good if I could take lessons," said Hannah dolefully. "Miss Lake said I never would make anything but an ordinary player, no matter how many lessons I took."

"Your playing is very sweet to us," said Mrs. Richards. "When the children are fretful and tired, your playing soothes them and makes them happy. I feel sorry that you are so handicapped with the care of the babies, but you will have more leisure when they grow older."

Of course, Hannah soon forgot her troubles, especially for that afternoon, for there were stockings to darn, the baby to take for his outing, the stories to tell the older children and the new salad to make for supper. She was not given to gloomy feelings; but occasionally, when everybody was telling how remarkable her friends were, she could not help feeling that she did not amount to anything at all.

"Hannah! Hannah!" It was in the dusk of the sweet, warm autumn evening that the girls of the Jolly Junior Club were heard calling their busy member to join them. "Hannah! We're going down to Miller's for grapes! Get a basket and come along!"

Mrs. Miller was an elderly lady at the edge of the town who had a large orchard and vineyard to which people went to buy their fruit in season. It was a delightful walk, and the fruit was so inexpensive that every day a procession of automobiles and people on foot made the short journey, coming back laden with apples and pears and grapes and peaches from the big homestead.

In a jiffy Hannah, with a basket swinging on her arm, joined the happy girls. Talent were forgotten, and together they hurried along singing, laughing and talking at a great rate.

All at once out of a forlorn little house a group of frightened, shrieking children rushed out into the yard and begged the girls to help them. "The baby's choking to death! The baby's choking to death!"

Most of the girls stood as if paralyzed, Hannah nimbly jumped over the shaky gate, wired to keep the children in, and made for the house at a great rate. Marybelle fumbled with the wire fastening. Josephine cried and wrung her hands. Ruth started aimlessly for help somewhere, she did not know where, and the others stood still, pale and frightened.

Taking the choking child, now purple in the face, Hannah promptly held him upside down and gave him a vigorous shaking. Just as Marybells and Josephine reached the house the penny that had lodged in the child's throat flew across the room, and the danger was over. In the midst of the screaming of the children, the wailing of the mother, who was ill in bed, and the frightened exclamations of the girls, Hannah stood calm and quiet, ministering to the frightened baby with experienced hands. When the doctor arrived, he said there was nothing for him to do, and that the cool-headed girl had saved the baby's life.

"What a wonderful thing to do!" said every one, when the story was printed in the paper. "The idea of a 13-year-old girl being able to do the right thing at the right time! Surely, with a talent like that, she will be a trained nurse or perhaps a doctor!"

But Hannah flushed when the subject was mentioned, and said it was really nothing at all to do. "All children choke and have to have things taken from them," she said modestly.

But the townspeople thought otherwise, and one day Hannah had a tiny gold medal pinned to her dress by a distinguished citizen who publicly told the story once more and praised the quickwitted girl who had saved a precious little life. "Nobody knows what that baby will grow to be," he said in closing. "Nobody knows what is wrapped up in the tiny life until that life begins to unfold, and I think we will all agree that in Miss Hannah's life possibilities for good and for service are unfolding early and giving promise of a long, useful, satisfactory and successful career that even death itself cannot close. We are proud of her and her work, and hope that she may go on developing the talent God has given her as long as He gives her life and strength, for helping to restore life is as truly a talent as music or writing or any other gift of the great Creator."

And, looking down at the gleaming star, Hannah ceased to regard herself as the only member of the Jolly Juniors who lacked the ability to bless and help mankind.—Hilda Richmond, Girlhood Days.

DORA'S BIRTHDAY GIFT.

"All who would win must share it—happiness was born a twin."—Byron.

When Dora came down stairs that bright Wednesday morning, she saw a big box on the hall table, and it was all pasted over with funny, foreign-looking stamps.

"Oh, Mummy, what's in the big package?" cried Dora, hopping up and down in her excitement.

"That's what I am waiting to find out," smiled Mrs. King. "Of course I'm not sure, but the package is addressed to you, and it's in Uncle Tom's hand-writing, and tomorrow is your birthday—"

"Let's open it as quick as ever we can," bubbled Dora. "Maybe it is something alive, or something that will spoil!"

There was a stout box inside the mysterious package, and inside of that again, ever so many sheets of crumpled tissue paper, and then several layers of soft, white cotton. Dora could scarcely wait.

"Let's hurry, Mummy," she urged.

"We're getting nearly down to your gift, little Miss Impatience," her mother laughed. "Here it is and it is all folded in silver lace paper, and why, there is a pink silk wrapping inside of that!"

Mrs. King laid the dainty coverings back, and there was the most wonderful doll that Dora had ever seen. It was as large as a small child, and was beautifully dressed in blue satin trimmed with a lovely white and silver material. The doll wore blue silk socks and the cunningest little silver shoes, and on her head was a bonnet to match her dress. The hair of this new treasure was bright golden—just the color of Dora's, but her eyes were as blue as the sky, while Dora's eyes were brown.

"And here is a letter from Uncle Tom," exclaimed Mrs. King. "Perhaps it'll tell us when he is coming home."

She paused a moment and glanced through the letter.

"Isn't that too bad!" she exclaimed. "He can't come for several months yet, but he is sending you the famous doll, Lucille, which won first prize in a big Doll Contest in Paris, and he hopes you'll like this new playmate of yours, and will be good to her."

Dora's cheeks were very pink and her eyes were dancing.

"Of course I'll be good to her, Mummy," she promised, "and I'll love her and put her to bed 'n ever'ing."

There was a little key which hung around Lucille's wrist, and Dora's mother found where this fitted into a tiny opening at the back of the neck, and after the spring was wound and the doll placed gently on the floor, she would walk backwards and forwards very nicely, and especially if Dora lay hold of her hand.

Mrs. King pressed a spot just above Lucille's stomach several times, and sure enough, the doll said "Mamma," "Papa," and "Kitty," very plainly.

"I want to show my new dollie to Bessie," Dora begged. "She thinks her Flossie May is the nicest doll in the world, but she hasn't seen Lucille. Let me take her over there and show Lucille to her. I can't wait, Mummy."

Mrs. King hesitated.

"I'll be careful, Muvver," she entreated.

"Please, Muvver."

There were sounds of approaching footsteps. It was Bessie.

"May Dora come out to play?" she called, almost before she had opened the screen on the side porch.

Then her big black eyes fell on the prize doll, and like Dora she forgot everything else! "May we take her out a little tiny ways," urged Dora after awhile.

"Yes," Mrs. King consented, "but keep Lucille where it is level and the grass is soft—for if she got a tumble she might break, or some of the mechanism inside of her might get out of order. Stay by the white fence, that will be a fine place."

So the two little girls promised and went out, Dora carrying her precious burden carefully.

"I'll walk with her first," decided Bessie, who being a year older than Dora, always wanted to be the teacher when they played school, or to pour the tea if they had a party.

Dora pouted. "No," she said, "I'm going to walk with her. She's my doll, and she's 'fraid and doesn't like strangers."

"All right for you," warned Bessie, darkly. "But when I had my new toy piano, I let you play on it."

Dora couldn't deny this.

"And I'm going to have a party next week," she hinted, "and ever-body isn't going to be asked."

This was a dire threat not to be overlooked, and Dora paused.

"Well," she replied more affably, "you can walk up and down with her twice—down to the street, and back to the magnolia tree."

Bessie nodded her shiny black head delightedly.

"I'll be careful as anything," she beamed. Back and forth Bessie and Lucille went once quite safely, but the second trip Lucille tumbled over the broken stem of a jonquil, and down she went, quicker than it takes to tell it.

"Oh, my beautiful doll!" wailed Dora. "She's all broken up!"

"No, I don't b'lieve so," Bessie assured her, but she was really quite frightened herself.

Side by side, the little girls sat down on the grass to examine Lucille for possible injuries.

"Let's take off her clothes," said Bessie, briskly. "Perhaps she's bumped herself somewhere, and has a black and blue spot."

Sure enough—right there near one of her shoulders was a queer little bunch.

"Oh, I hope she isn't hurt," wailed Dora. "I don't want my new doll to be hurt."

Bessie was examining the little bunch. She pressed it to see what it felt like, and then a funny thing happened. Lucille solled her eyes and began to sing in a sweet, mellow little voice. First there was a verse of "Home Sweet Home," and then "Rock-A-Bye Baby on the Tree Top," and after that several lines of "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," and "My Bonnie Lies Over the Ocean." Then the strains died away and the girls looked at each other and laughed happily.

But Bessie was examining Lucille still farther. She found two more little push buttons on the other shoulder. When she pressed one, Lucille gave a merry little laugh like a peal of bells; and when she pressed the other, the doll cried almost like a real child.

"Isn't she the nicest doll you ever saw," insisted Dora.

"Yes, she is," admitted Bessie, "but perhaps you wouldn't have found out all the things she could do if you hadn't let me play with her."

Dora looked thoughtful.

"That's just what my muvver says," she remarked soberly, "that we don't have half the fun with things when we keep them all to ourselves that we do when we share them with somebody else."

"What'll we do with her next?" wondered Bessie.

"Let's go in and ask my muvver for some pink muslin and black velvet ribbon just like my dress, to make an everyday dress for Lucille out of," suggested Dora jumping up.

"That'll be lots of fun," agreed Bessie. "Let's."

And away they went with the precious prize doll walking between them, each little mother-girl holding a chubby doll hand.—Selected.

"HOW TO DESTROY A CHURCH."

The quotation above certainly raises a serious question. Can a church really be destroyed? Whether it can really be destroyed or not, one thing is certain: It can be greatly hindered in its work. Some one has suggested three ways of doing this:

"1. Discourage the preacher. Absent yourself from one service every Sunday, or miss at least one in three; if he is not very strong, once in four times will answer. Neglect the prayer meeting. Criticise your preacher freely; praise him sparingly; find fault plentifully; pray for him little or none. If he proposes to hold extra meetings, withhold your cooperation. Give yourself no concern whether his salary is paid or not. Never call on him socially, or allow him to think that his comfort, or that of his family, is a matter of importance in your eyes.

"2. Discourage your fellow-members. Observe the directions given above. Complain about everything they do and don't do. Contribute to make yourself the head of a clique, and by their assistance and your own industry keep the church in hot water generally. While doing this, lose no opportunity to complain of the bad treatment you are receiving. Discard charity and candor, take distrust into your bosom, and make scheming your specialty.

"3. Destroy the confidence of the community. Tell the people that you are in the church by force of circumstances, but have no respect for the way in which business is conducted. Publish the faults of your brethren, taking care to magnify them; make no effort to induce people to attend the church. Take no part in the labors of the Sunday school. Publish it on all occasions that you have no confidence in the concern. Predict that it must fail—go down—blow up—never can succeed. By observing these directions faithfully, you will have the satisfaction, if the church is not unusually vigorous, of witnessing the fulfillment of your predictions."

The above quotation should give every church member serious concern. It is hard to imagine a church member who would wilfully and deliberately seek to destroy his church. But an attitude is a powerful thing, whether it be on the good or evil side. On either, it exerts an influence. Is there not danger just here?

It is far better to reverse the rules given above. Get in on the encouraging side. Brighten the hope of your fellows by showing a kindly interest in what they are trying to do, and boost your church in the community. Let people know that you believe in it; in its good name; in its essential purity; in its splendid teachings, and in its future. Thus you will justify your connection with it, and you will need have no fear of its being destroyed.—Selected.

SERMON TO YOUNG PEOPLE.

The Fatherhood of God.

"When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven." Luke 11:2.

God is our Creator. "The Lord hath made all things for himself." "Know ye that the Lord he is God; it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves! we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture."

God is our Benefactor. "Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you." "For in him we live, move and have our being." "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works."

God is our Redeemer. "He shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities." "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. "For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."

God is our Sovereign. "The Lord reigneth, let the people tremble." "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice." "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

And God is our Father. He is our Father in a two-fold sense. In the natural or creative sense He is the Father of all human beings. In the supernatural or spiritual sense He is the Father of all who believe to the saving of the soul.

Let us first give prayerful consideration to the fact that God is the Father of All Mankind.

In Luke 3:38 it is written that Adam was "the son of God." God was his Father in the creative sense just as truly as Adam himself was Seth's father in the generative sense. God is therefore the Father of every human being.

In his address to the Athenians Paul declared that "we are the offspring of God." And he made this statement in the all-inclusive sense, embracing all mankind.

This doctrine places a high value upon each human being. Each man, woman, and child is worth more than all the world besides. "For what is a man profited if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The Father of mercies did not spare His only begotten Son to save lost mankind. The sacrifice of Jesus Christ on the cross is God's estimate of the value of your soul and mine.

This truth of the universal fatherhood of God opens up a realm of gracious and glorious opportunity. Every child bears the image of his father. Man was made in image of his heavenly Father,—in the image of God's intelligence, spirituality, and eternity. To be like God, to become like God, to live forever like God is the wonderful privilege of every son and daughter of Adam. The opportunity of advancement is unlimited.

And this truth of universal reach places upon each rational being a most vital and fearful responsibility. Each is duty bound to realize the purpose of his creation and redemption. Since God has made us for His glory and since He has redeemed us to be transformed into the image of His Son, it becomes man's supreme obligation to attain to these exalted ideals of the Gospels. "Be ye reconciled to God."

In the next place let us prayerfully consider that God is the Father of All Believers.

To be born of God, born from above, born of the Spirit, is to establish a new relationship,—to become sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty. "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." "But ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." This honor have all his saints.

To be thus born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God," is to enter a new world as well as a new relationship. It is to be inducted into the citizenship of the glory world. It is to sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. It is to have fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ. And it is to become heirs to "an inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

The faith that saves creates a new life,—a life hid with Christ in God. It is the new life of righteousness. Sin has been taken away as far as the east is from the west. The peace that passeth all understanding has taken the place of sin. It is the new life of love,—"of the love of God shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us." It is the new life of power. There is in full salvation the power to resist temptation, to endure tribulation, and to perform the most difficult tasks of holy service.

This spiritual fatherhood enjoins a service that is most honorable, most delightful, and most fruitful. It is not the compelling service of a slave under a taskmaster, but is the inviting service of a child under the most compassionate Father. It is the service of love, and love makes every service easy. "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

And this gracious Fatherhood guarantees an everlasting home. Jesus said, "In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were

—The Word of Life

—Rev. H. F. Surratt was present in Calvary church last Sunday morning and assisted in the service. He is now taking his vacation. He is pastor of our church in Charlotte.

—The funeral of Rev. W. C. Kennett at Tabernacle yesterday was largely attended. In the congregation we noted the following ministers: Highfill, Millaway, Dosier, Johnson, Trogdon, J. D. Williams, Brown, Neece, Fogleman, Lowdermilk, A. O. Lindley, Moton, Andrews, Paul Kennett, T. F. McCulloch, C. L. Whitaker. Others who would have been there were prevented by engagements: Rev. W. F. Ashburn who had been selected by Brother Kennett for the occasion took the leading part in the funeral service. He was assisted by Dr. Dixon, Rev. Murphy Williams, Rev. L. W. Gerringer, and Rev. J. A. Burgess. Bro. Ashburn spoke feelingly of the great worth of the deceased and of his own personal obligation to him for much help received in his times of discouragement. He spoke of Bro. Kennett's life as a radiant life from which there went out good cheer to other souls. He also spoke of his constant charity to others. He never spoke ill of anyone. He is not dead, he said,—only fallen asleep. Indeed, he is more alive than ever before. His life is now glorified and perfected. Bros. Gerringer and Burgess spoke briefly and fittingly of the deceased from their points of view. The casket was opened in the vestibule of the church that all might look for the last time on the familiar face. He lay as if peacefully sleeping. The funeral service was in charge of the Masonic Order at the grave. The speaker made a forcible address and the usual ceremonies were gone through. In the death of Rev. W. C. Kennett our Conference loses its oldest and one of its most successful ministers. Yet we have not wholly lost him. His spirit and example will remain to influence others, and the near two thousand souls won by him to the church of Christ will rise up and call him blessed. His going of course will leave those nearest to him with a painful sense of loss until they adjust their thought to the picture Jesus has permitted us to frame in thinking of those whom He has called hence.

—The Biblical Recorder, after weeks of unrestrained discussion of evolution pro and con, has decided that enough has been said, and has closed its columns to that subject. The subject seems to be one to provoke feeling rather than clear thought.

—The Coble reunion yesterday at Coble's church brought together hundreds of people.

ALL THINGS TO ALL MEN.

Christ was a home missionary in the house of Lazarus.

Christ was a foreign missionary when the Greeks came to Him.

Christ was a city missionary when He taught in Samaria.

Christ was a Sabbath school missionary when He opened up the Scriptures and set men to studying the Word of God.

Christ was a children's missionary when He took them in His arms and blessed them.

Christ was a missionary to the poor when He opened the eyes of the blind beggar.

Christ was a missionary to the rich when He opened the spiritual eyes of Zaccheus.

NOTICE.

The Annual Home-Coming Day will be held at Flat Rock Church, Flat Rock Circuit, the 1st Sunday in August at 10:30 A. M. Rev. S. Williams will deliver the address. The special meeting will also begin on that day with Rev. T. A. Williams as helper. Everybody cordially invited. Picnic dinner on the grounds, and please don't forget the skits. Mrs. John B. Ogburn, Secretary Flat Rock Memorial Assoc. Summerfield, N. C., August 10th.

—Dr. M. F. Fox, of Guilford College, died at Norfolk, Va., last Saturday night. He was buried at Guilford College on Tuesday. We are sorry to be unable to attend his funeral. He regarded him as one of our friends and that in his death we sustained a personal loss. He once lived near Tabernacle. He was a physician of no mean ability. The members of his family have our sympathy in their great loss.

—North Carolina seems to be gaining an enviable reputation as a crime producer. In 1924 we had 299 homicides in our State. The victims, 94 were white, 201 were negroes, and four were Indians. Fire-arms were used in 235 cases; knives or other piercing instruments in 47 cases; 6 were babies killed on after birth.

—Bro. D. M. Sullivan, of the Baptist denomination, led the prayer meeting at Calvary Church last night in an inspiring and helpful way. He is a man of faith and proves his faith by his works. When his church was in need of money he put a second mortgage on his home to raise it. He gives freely to other churches besides his own. He has more faith in God than he has in the ALMIGHTY DOLLAR.

—A shocking event is reported from Rockingham. Mr. W. B. Cole, president of a mill company, a man of wealth and of high standing in the community, shot and killed W. W. Ormond, son of a minister. The only occasion known for the terrible deed was the belief in Cole's mind that young Ormond was trying to win the hand of Cole's daughter after agreeing not to do so.

—Our West End Church is having the time of its life, perhaps Pastor Ballard has called to his help Rev. Joseph Lynch, of the Maryland Conference, and they are having a great meeting, the pastor leading in song and Mr. Lynch preaching powerfully to large congregations. His preaching is having effect in convicting and converting some, we have not heard how many. His story on Why I Keep a Duck is a simple story of his childhood days but is a very fascinating one as he tells it. Our West End brethren are fortunate in having the help of Brother Lynch.

—Bro. F. W. Easter, of High Point, has moved to Spray. He was a valuable worker in Welch Memorial Church for years, being Sunday school superintendent much of the time. We hope he will find ways to make himself useful to the cause in his new situation.

—Our thanks to Bro. Peter Hardin, of Tabernacle, for a splendid watermelon. We award this first prize.

—Prof. E. S. Johnson, son of Bro. C. F. Johnson of West End Church, has been elected principal of the school at Washington, N. C.

—Mrs J. P. Morgan, wife of the financial magnate, died last week of sleeping sickness after two months' illness. The greatest medical skill that the greatest wealth can procure cannot stay the hand of death for long. If I could dig holes in the ground like a rabbit,

In a statement to the Christian Science Monitor, Dr. O'Hanlon, for sixteen years Chief Medical Superintendent of Bellevue Hospital, says that, "In three or four years the alcoholic victim will be practically unheard of. I do not hesitate to predict this in view of the improvement already noted. Before the Volstead act was passed, we handled from 10,000 to 12,000 alcoholic cases a year. During 1924 we handled 4,000. Continuing Dr. O'Hanlon said:

The situation is very much better. The habitual drunkard has disappeared. The corner saloon is no longer robbing the public of necessary comforts. Families who previously applied to our social service department for aid are now getting enough to eat, are well clothed and are living in better houses without depending upon philanthropy. The wage earner is using his money to provide for the home instead of for liquor.

Delirium tremens has almost disappeared. A great reduction in the number of accidents going hand in hand with drunkenness is apparent. I might even say that it is a rare exception to trace any accidents coming to our attention to liquor drinking.

Furthermore, Dr. O'Hanlon declared that statistics at Bellevue show that very little of the excessive drinking is done by adolescents, and the number of women treated has been greatly reduced since the passage of the Volstead act.

—The Athenians were to choose one of two architects for a great building they purposed to build. The first, a pert, affected fellow, offered his service in a long premeditated discourse upon the work proposed, and by his oratory inclined the voices of the people in his favor; but the other secured the contract with nine words: "O Athenians, what this man says, I will do."

NO COMPROMISE.

"A chasm is opening between men who believe their Bibles and the men who are prepared for an advance upon Scripature. Inspiration and speculation cannot long abide in peace. Compromise there can be none. We cannot hold the inspiration of the Word, and yet reject it; we cannot believe in the atonement and deny it; we cannot hold the doctrine of the fall and yet talk of the evolution of spiritual life from human nature; we cannot recognize the punishment of the impenitent and yet indulge the larger hope. One way or the other we must go. Decision is the virtue of the hour.

"Neither when we have chosen our way can we keep company with those who go the other way. There must come with decision for truth a corresponding protest against error. Let those who will keep the narrow way keep it, and suffer for their choice; but to hope to follow the broad road at the same time is an absurdity. What communion hath Christ with Belial?"—C. H. Spurgeon.

THERE MIGHT BE A DIFFERENCE.

The telephone bell rang, and one of the group in the living room went to answer it. Her part in the conversation came back readily to the circle she had left, and called forth remark from the guest who was an old friend.

"What a clear, pleasant voice Helen has."

"When she talks over the phone," admitted the little girl of the family with judicial deliberation, and then she wondered at the burst of laughter that followed a moment's silence.

Whether or not her comment really meant what it seemed to imply, the fact remains that in many homes the voices that are sent out are very different from those that are kept in for household use. The tartness, the whining, the ungraciousness, do not greet the caller at the front door or the acquaintance over the wire, and a sudden change of tone from unpleasantness to bright friendliness is often so marked that no hearer can fail to note it. Voice cultivation is worth while, but it should not be wholly for export.—Forward.

WHAT IS SCIENCE?

How many persons really know what science is? How many in reading, or using, or hearing the word used, ever stop to think, "What is science? What does the word really mean?" We think it safe to assume that the majority of persons have no clear idea of what science really is, but have an indefinite, shadowy idea that it is something occult, hidden, above ordinary mortals, possessed by a set or kind of super-men, infallible, or near infallible, and to question any statement of such men is sheer presumption, if not actual sin—attaching the same attributes to such men as the ancients did to their gods. But this is a very great error; for scientists are but men, many of them just of ordinary capacity—none of them super-men and some of them seem to be erratic, get into ruts, and given to mental freaks, and almost wholly devoid of common sense.

Webster says, "Science" from Latin "sci-re, to know." In New Testament, 1 Tim. 6:20, science is from the Greek, gnosis, to know. So we have the following definitions given by Webster: "1. Knowledge, as of principles or facts. 2. Accumulated and accepted knowledge systematized and formulated with reference to the discovery of general truths or the operation of general laws; classified knowledge. 3. Especially such knowledge relating to the physical world;—called also natural science. 4. Any branch or department of systematized knowledge."

So we see that science is real knowledge, not speculation, hypothesis, theory, supposition or guess. Each definition given by the dictionary contains the word "knowledge." So "science" is what is really and truly known. Not what somebody thinks, supposes. Not a mere mental concept, but a fact. So when we get rid of all the learned haze, mist, fog—or to change the figure, brush away all the learned trash—we are in a position to see what is science—that it is knowledge.

A mental concept is one thing. The objective, external, corresponding fact is another. A person may have a concept of a house, but that is not the house. Of a river, lake, or any other thing, imaginable or conceivable, but this concept is not the corresponding reality. Persons may have all kinds of wild, erratic, absurd concepts for which there is not, never has been, and never can be a corresponding reality. Hence we have chimeras, air-castles—all kinds of absurd fancies, as Don Quixote of romance. Much of this is harmless, but sometimes it is very serious, and sometimes disastrous to the subject of these unrealizable concepts, to others, or both. Kaiser Bill doubtless had a concept of victory and perhaps of world empire, but the concept never materialized, but disaster. Before we do a thing we must have the concept. But we may have a concept impossible of realizing. This thought could be pursued indefinitely, but we desist. What we want to say is, that the world is suffering today, if not really cursed, from a whole lot of "stuff" called "science," which is the veriest absurdity. The average newspaper and magazine accepts all this mere speculation of men as true, and truer than "holy writ," just because these men have managed to be dubbed "scientists." Because they have the financial backing and prestige of some college or university.

Now we are in no wise opposed to science. No one but a fool can be. A fact is a fact and can not be denied. But when speculation is put for fact, and especially speculation at variance with the Bible and common sense, observation, and experience, I'm indignant, because it is an insult to my reason. This leads us to say that evolution, both cosmic and organic, is not a science, but a mental concept, for which there is utterly no external, objective reality. A pagan concept, not a Christian, nor biblical concept. It's utterly foreign to the Bible, notwithstanding the desperate efforts made by "modernists" to try to make the Bible agree with it. The great apostles of evolution, such as Darwin, Lamarck, Huxley, Haeckel, and others, have had mental penetration sufficiently keen to see that the evolution concept is not found in the Bible, and have had the courage to say so.

That there is growth, development, and variation within the limits, or bounds of the species, no one who is at all informed will deny; but that evolution has ever originated a species is utterly without proof. The evolutionists admit this. This from a college book on biology that teaches that all life has come from one cell—man of course is included, giving man a brute origin—"Taking for granted the fact of evolution—as we have had to do throughout."—Foundations of Biology, Page 372. The author of this book, used in one of our North Carolina colleges, after carrying us through 371 pages of his book, here gives away the whole case, by saying that he has had to take the "fact of evolution for granted all the way through"—no proof, no attempt at proof, but has had to take the "fact for granted." Why? Because there is no proof. If there were any, surely the abettors of evolution would have produced it. But after more than a half century since Darwinism was launched, during which time the evolutionists have ransacked creation for proof, it still has to be confessed that there is no proof. And then to call this science is an insult to every one's reason. And to teach evolution to our children as a truth, as a fact, contradicting the Bible, common sense, observation and experience, is an unspeakable outrage. But this outrage is being perpetrated in nearly all of our high schools, colleges, and universities. And why? What reason can be assigned? Why not abandon the whole senseless chimera? Is it not a natural antipathy to God, the supernatural, creation, and revelation? An effort to get rid of God, or put Him so far off that His existence becomes negligible—practically "no God"? "The fool hath said in his heart, no God." "Dr. E. A. Milikan, Nobel prize winner and internationally famous physicist, in an address before the American Chemical Society," is reported to have said, among other things: "The pathetic thing is that we have scientists who are trying to prove evolution, which no scientist can ever prove." When evolution cannot be proved, "our enemies themselves be judges," why continue the senseless propaganda, and call it science? And then brand everybody as an ignoramus who does not accept this senseless chimera. Shades of science! "What fools we mortals be."

It seems that the evolutionists are trying to play the game of "bluff" by such statements as "All intelligent people believe it." "All scientists accept it." When as a matter of fact such statements are absolutely false. Why do they continue to make such statements? Is it ignorance on their part or something worse? As a matter of fact a "intelligent" people do not believe it, neither do all scientists accept it. Prof. Virchow of Berlin, reputed to be the greatest pathologist in the world, opposed it to his death. William Dawson, geologist, rejected it to the end. Prof. Price of Nebraska University has written a number of books in opposition to evolution, among which are "The Phantom of Evolution," "The New Geology," "C. E. D., or New Light on the Doctrine of Creation." The evolutionists, so far as we are aware, have made no attempt to answer these books, save by bare denunciation, ridicule, and sarcasm. But intelligent people can read and judge for themselves, when matters of fact are produced, and that by whomsoever produced.

How long is this game of bluff to continue? How long are men, just because "Prof." or "Dr." is attached to their names, going to have the newspapers, magazines and a great many unthinking persons to swallow the chimeras for fact, and call it science? Let us remember that science is fact—what is unquestionably known, not somebody's supposition. J. F. Dosier.

PROPAGANDA PROPS FOR TOBACCO.

The Greenville, Tenn., Sun truly says: "There are more cigarettes smoked in a society novel than are necessary for the movement of the plot. A bright ten-year old boy could give the reason for this. It is tobacco propaganda. It can be just as truly said that there are far more cigarettes, cigars and pipes smoked in the moving pictures than are necessary for the setting forth of the play. Same reason.

It is refreshing to read of persons who will not fall for the propagandizing of tobacco at any price. In other words, they are not for sale. It seems that Jack Dempsey belongs to this class. The Toronto Guardian says a cigarette promoter endeavored to secure a testimonial from Dempsey while he was visiting in Kingston, Ontario, for a certain make of cigarettes, offering him a large sum of money for a statement of less than forty words, the effect that he smoked that particular brand, "when not in training." The aroused Dempsey's indignation, and he said bluntly: "I can't sign that. You couldn't get me to do it for ten times what you offer. I don't smoke cigarettes and never did. If you had harmless candy or soda water and thought it was all right, I wouldn't mind giving you a testimonial for nothing. But I won't sign your cigarette testimonial."

It seems that the man making the offer thought nothing of the deception he expected to practice on the public. Men who are willing to entice boys into smoking, in order to increase their profits, seldom stop at the means to be used. Deception goes with the greed for gain.

THE QUICK-WITTED WESLEY.

By Rev. H. H. Smith.

On reading Wesley's "Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion," Philip Doddridge expressed his admiration by writing upon it. How forcible are right words." Wesley was noted for speaking and writing "right words," so much so that it was seldom necessary or written. He had such wonderfully self-possession that even under the greatest provocation and without a moment to reflect, he spoke with calmness and wisdom.

When, as an act of courtesy, he consulted Bishop Butler before preaching at a certain place, the Bishop replied very sharply: "well, sir, since you ask my advice, I will give it freely. You have no business here; you are not commissioned to preach in this diocese. Therefore I advise you to go hence."

The average minister of the gospel would not have found it an easy matter to maintain self-control when sharply bidden by a Bishop to "get out." But note Wesley's calm and dignified reply "My lord, my business on earth is to do what good I can. Wherever, therefore, I think I can do most good, there must I stay, so long as I think so. At present I think I can do most good here; therefore here I stay."

A carping, fault-finding man once wrote Wesley making certain charges against his conduct. After answering the charges, Wesley closed by saying: "You conclude with praying that God would remove pride and malice from among us. Of pride, I have too much; of malice, I have none. However, the prayer is good, and I thank you for it."

One of the early Methodist preachers became discouraged, was inclined to doubt his call to preach, and wrote Wesley asking that another preacher be sent to the circuit, saying he believed he was "out of place." Wesley replied: "Dear Brother: You are indeed out of place, for you are reasoning when you ought to be praying."

On one occasion Wesley visited Edward Bolton, a local preacher who greatly admired the founder of Methodism. Wesley was in the parlor, busy as usual, reading and writing, when Mr. Bolton, wishing to enjoy his society and engage in conversation, began by saying, "How much more pleasant it is to be in the country than in London; all is silent, all reposed, and no distracting voices of the busy multitude intrude themselves." "True, Neddy," replied Wesley, "but noisy thoughts away." Bolton took the hint and was silent until Wesley had finished his work and was ready for conversation.

Once a low-bred fellow ran against Wesley in an impudent manner, saying, "I never turn out for fools." Wesley, stepping aside, said, "I always do."

There was a notable character by the name Beau Nash who attended one of Wesley's services with the avowed purpose "to amuse a people, confound the preacher, and make methodism, ridiculous." A large crowd had gathered to see the fun, and during the service he interrupted Wesley and charged him with preaching without authority. "Besides," said, "your preaching frightens people out of their wits." "Sir," replied Wesley, "did you ever hear me preach?" "No," replied Nash, "How then," said Wesley, "can you judge of what you never heard?" "By common report," he replied. "Sir," said Wesley, "is not your name Nash? I dare not judge you by common report. I think it not enough to judge by." Nash quailed under this ironical reply and soon beat a hasty retreat.

Wesley was sent for to visit a young woman in Bedlam. A subordinate officer abruptly told him that "none of these preachers" was to come there. Only a short while before he had been prohibited from talking to the prisoners in Newgate. He made this comment: "So we are forbid to go to Newgate for fear of making them wicked, and to Bedlam for fear of making them mad."

A man once spoke reproachfully to Wesley, saying, "You preach perfection." "Not to you," replied Wesley. "And why not to me?" "Because I should like to preach something else to you, sir." "Why, what would you preach to me?" Wesley replied, "How to escape the damnation of hell."

While stopping at an inn in Scotland, the waiter said to Wesley, "Sir, the lord of the stable wants to know if he shall feed your horses." "This," remarked Wesley, "must be a great country for titles where the hostler is called the 'lord of the stable.'"

Near the close of his life, a traveling preacher inquired of Wesley, "What advice have you to give in order to perpetuate the great revival of religion in which you have been the principal instrument?" He instantly replied, "Take care of the rising generation."

During a season of persecutions by his enemies, his friends were deeply agitated, but Wesley was the coolest of them all. He says: "Every week I am bespattered in the public papers. Many are in tears on the occasion; many terribly frighten and crying out 'O, what will the end be?' 'What will it be?' Why glory to God in the highest, and peace and goodwill among men." His reply was both timely and prophetic.

SALVATION ARMY AND TOBACCO.

Will H. Brown.

When the Salvation Army drive was on in New York City for $500,000 to help carry on its work, the Tobacco Record raised the question as to whether or not the Army as an organization is engaged in any kind of anti-tobacco propaganda, so its editor wrote a letter to Salvation Army headquarters, requesting a statement on the question, "by some one whose authority can not be disputed." Bart Andrews, director of the drive, replied for the Salvation Army, saying that the Army as an organization carries on no propaganda against tobacco, but made this statement: "Within the organization, among its own officers and members, the use of tobacco is forbidden. Also the children of Salvationists are urged not to use it. None of the officers use tobacco themselves, and some of them, speaking in public and writing individually in the periodicals, are rather emphatic against its use by anybody; others are more liberal."

The example of the Army in this way, through its officers, workers and members, is having a powerful influence for good. The army has found, by its contact with the masses that tobacco is injurious, hence this attitude of its leaders. It is the same attitude as taken against liquor as the twin of tobacco.

By the way, perhaps one of the most striking incidents indicating that the 18th Amendment is being enforced is the statement of officers of the National Cigar Leaf Tobacco Association that the national convention of the Association to be held in June will be "strictly dry." It is almost time for the doxology.

THE MIRACLES OF JESUS CHRIST.

For more than eighteen hundred years the enemies of Christianity have denounced as untrue the miracles that Jesus wrought while He was in the flesh, including the miracle of His Own resurrection. It is not in the least surprising that infidels and agnostics such as Voltaire, David Hume, Ingersoll, and Darrow should do this, for this is just a part of the program of the forces of unbelief to disprove and destroy the Christian religion. But the height of unholy and contemptuous disloyalty is reached when the so-called modernists, many of whom are professed ministers of the gospel of Christ, join hands with the devil's crowd in recording their disbelief in these same miracles.

These recorded miracles of Jesus have been set forth as true by every law of evidence. First they were performed in the open, in the presence of witnesses. No one questioned these miracles during the life time of Jesus. His bitterest enemies accepted them. Not a shadow of doubt was cast upon them at the time they were wrought. Thousands, friends and foes, as eye witnesses, declared that they were matters of fact.

They have been recorded by holy, honest, and truthful men,—men who gave their lives to the dissemination of the truth. No man in history can prove a better character for truthfulness than the four men who wrote the Gospels. They were not men of the imaginative temperament. They were plain men and recorded plain facts. And these facts were recorded under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. And inspired men are not in the least inclined to make mistakes, or impose legends as truth.

And Christianity is a living memorial of the fact that Jesus Christ wrought miracles when He was upon the earth. The continuous working of the miracle of salvation in the realm of the spirit is a forcible demonstration of the same benevolent omnipotence wherewith the Son of God healed the bodies of men nineteen hundred years ago. And there are millions living today that bear witness to the miracle of personal salvation.

It was this same Jesus Christ who performed the miracle of creation. "All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made." John 1:3. "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him, and for him." Col. 1:16.

Now the evolutionists of the theistic turn of mind say that it took the creator millions of years to create the physical universe. They agree that He could have done it perfectly well in six minutes instead of six days, if He had thought best. For there is no limit to the exercise of omnipotence. Wouldn't it be foolish for a blacksmith to take thirty days to make a plow when he could make it in thirty minutes? Would it not be unwise for a contractor to take ten years to build a house when he could build it just as well in ten days? And do not the evolutionists attempt to convict Jesus Christ of lacking common sense in parading before the world their fond supposition that the miracle of creation stretched out through millions of years? Yea, they insult the intelligence of the Almighty by their ridiculous hypothesis.

This untenable tenet of evolution is a part of the satanic scheme to repudiate every supernatural exercise of Deity, and thereby destroy the Bible and the Christian religion. But it can't be done.—Word of Life.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

What Must We Do?

Somehow we are not going very fast with our budgets. See statement of budget in another column. Some charges have paid very little, and some even at this time of year, have not paid anything yet. Brethren, Conference is less than three months ahead of us, so please raise your budgets as rapidly as possible. We are needing money now to meet the current expenses belonging to the Annual Conference budget.

Among the Churches.

On Thursday, August 13, we had the pleasure and the privilege of being with the pastor and people on Guilford charge at a splendid circuit rally. Each church on the charge was largely represented in the rally except Midway church, and if they could have known what a splendid day the other folks were having some of them would surely have been there. The singing was good, the speaking was good, and the spirit of the meeting was fine. Pastor Whitaker was happy over the meeting, and the folks, I am sure, went away well pleased with the occasion. They voted to hold another rally about the same time next year.

Chase City.

For some time we have been thinking about and talking about a Methodist Protestant Church near Chase City, Va. That church is now an assured fact. A company of our people moved over into this community from Lincoln and Cleveland counties, and from other points in North Carolina, and they kept feeling that they must have a church home of their own. At their request the last Annual Conference appointed them a pastor in the person of Rev. J. H. Trolinger. Bro. Trolinger was in the Seminary, so did not get to them until in June. Since then they have built a very neat country church, and on August 9 Bro. Trolinger began a revival service in this new church. So when I reached them this last Sunday morning the meeting had been running just one week. They were having a great revival which had resulted in more than 30 conversions. We organized a Methodist Protestant Church with more than 80 members, 22 of whom were of the converts in the meeting. Pastor Trolinger announced that the meeting would continue at least until Wednesday night of this week. The people think they have a splendid opportunity for another Methodist Protestant Church in an adjoining neighborhood.

Spencer.

One day last week at the request of a few of our people in Spencer, N. C., I visited them and looked over the grounds there, and made inquiry as to our prospects in Spencer. And I reached this conclusion: In several instances we have started Methodist Protestant churches in other communities when we didn't have as good prospects as we now have in Spencer.

These people told me that Rev. D. A. Braswell is planning a ten days' meeting in Spencer soon, with other brethren to assist him. At the close of this meeting Bro. Braswell will take stock of followers there, and then we can tell better about the prospects. Brethren, if we would only raise the Annual Conference budget in full, so we would have the $10,000 for Church Extension. We could then forge ahead in a most wonderful way. We owe it to ourselves and to our people and to our God to raise our budgets in full. The budgets are indeed "our opportunities and our privilege."

Greensville.

Wife is assisting Rev. H. L. Powell this week in meetings at Wesley's Chapel on the Greensville charge, and I am spending part of the week here. The attendance is good, and the prospects for a good meeting are fine. Bro. Powell is happy with this people, and they love him.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR TOPIC, AUG. 23.
Perils of Envy, Anger, and Hatred. Matt. 5: 21, 22; 1 John 3:11-15.

Some Bible Hints.

It is the same spirit that kills a man's reputation that kills his body. It violates the law of love (v. 21.).

Anger, contempt of people, the "thou fool" attitude, keeps a man in a state of bitterness that is like hell (v. 22).

Cain's sin was primarily envy. Sin always grows unless it is checked, as Cain's sin grew to murder (v. 12).

The difference between the world and the Christian is hate and love. We can test ourselves by this rule (v. 14).

A Fearful Trio.

Envy, anger and hatred are a fearful trio to get mixed up in the nature of a human being. Some one has said that envy is "indigestion of the mind," this leads on to anger, which is the loss of self-control, and these lead on to hatred of others. One can never afford to give way to envy and anger; for besides the harmful affects of these upon our natures they lead to hatred which is so killing to the soul.

The cure for all these is love. None of them can exist side by side with love. Kindness is a soil in which no evil can grow.

What Our Scripture Lessons Teach.

In the lesson from Matt. Jesus strikes at the roots of their old-time practices. All of us know that a murderer should be brought to trial in the courts; but here Jesus tells us that the one guilty of anger, the most usual motive for murder, is answerable as well. If the motive is there, uncurbed, the deed is easily forth coming. The whole teaching here is a question of spirit. The attitude of one's heart towards his fellow-man must be against these bad habits of mind and heart, if he would have his life conform to Jesus teachings.

In John's writings we see clearly that John knew the meaning of love in its highest sense, and his messages upon this theme are heart searching.

He loved Jesus and His teachings greatly. He lived them more nearly than anyone else, perhaps, and, hence, he can help us to get the meaning for ourselves.

The greatest message ever lived on earth, was love manifested in Jesus our Savior: the greatest truth ever delivered to humanity was love, the supreme ideal.

Hate is evil, hate is unchristian, and hate lays the foundation which breeds desire for murder. If hatred could be banished, murder would soon cease.

Anger does no good, anger is weakening, and saps our vitality mentally, physically, and morally. It also causes us to put our worst selves to the front rather than our best.

Things To Pray For.

1—Thank God for the teachings of the sermon on the mount.

2—Thank God for the example in the Life of Jesus Christ.

3—Thank God for the promised power of the Holy Spirit to help us to overcome the evil about us.

4—Ask God to help us to see the dangers along life's path, and to avoid them.

5—Ask God to inspire us to right ideals and purposes.

6—Ask God to bless this meeting to the strengthening of our lives, and the lives of all the young people of this day.

The great secret of the tender heart lies in the fellowship of Jesus Christ. It is the continual wonder about Jesus, that He was so strong and yet so tender-hearted. No authority could make Him quail; no array of power could ever daunt Him, and yet a bruised reed He would never break and smoking flax He would not quench. He was tender not because He knew so little. He was tender because He knew so much. All that was hidden from duller eyes He saw—all that men had to bear and battle through. Their helplessness, their crying in the night, their inarticulate appeal to heaven—all this was ever audible to Jesus, and kept His heart as tender as a child's.—Selected.

Sin brings separation from God. The word "depart," uttered to the workers of iniquity, is not an arbitrary one. It voices a law of God that runs through all His moral realm. . . Think it not strange, if man is driven from God and goodness who yields himself to sin. By a changeless law of moral repulsion, he is pushed away. Is it hopeless? Yes, as long as his back is turned toward God. But let him come to himself, let him feel his sin and degradation, let him long for home, for forgiveness, for his Father's face, and the law of changeless love takes hold of him. The law of divine attraction draws him then to God and goodness.

Man-like it is to fall into sin,

Fiend-like it is to dwell therein.

Christ-like it is for sin to grieve,

God-like it is all sin to leave.

THE PLACE OF AMERICA IN GOD'S PLAN.

The greatest need of the church in the cities is out-standing leadership. In-so-far as the Institutional Church has failed, the failure has been due to inefficient leadership. When we make this statement we make no charge against anyone who has been connected with such unsuccessful organizations. We have expected too much not only of our city pastors, but of other leaders and workers. Too much has been attempted with the number of workers employed. Every department demands a specialist in that line.

That leadership demanded must be a city-minded leadership. We do not ask whether these workers are rural or city-reared—that is unimportant, but he must be city-minded or he cannot adequately sense the conditions under which he must labor, nor appreciate the conditions of the people to whom he is to minister. This leadership must be city-trained leadership. This is a new subject of study. Much that is put down in books in reference to work of this character may be true in a given field, but is frequently erroneous when given universal application. Every worker should come to his task with an open mind, and be ready to adapt even his most highly cherished ideals and methods of work, to conditions which may be discovered in the particular field of service.

It must be specialised leadership. No man or woman can possibly know all phases of the life of the city. It must be a supervised leadership, having as its directors men and women of the ability of strategists and statesmen. No half-way measures will suffice. The church must give her time, her money, her ministers, her members, and herself to this great task of evangelizing and saving the cities of America.

A continuous adaptation may be necessary in every part of the city. Every denomination should study the whole city as a field, and discover where its work is most successful. The city Church Federation (under our present form of organisation) should be a party to this survey, and all of the churches of the city should co-operate as one great Protestant body. Together they should study their common task. The plans and policies of the denominational boards, city missionary societies, and of local churches co-operating, should be based upon facts ascertained by frequent surveys. In no other way will it be possible to meet the many and frequent changes in opportunity and responsibility.

The problems of the city are the problems of the new civilization. The city Christianized means the country saved. But the city paganized will paganize and destroy modern civilization. The late Dr. Bashford said, "New York City is the greatest mission field in the world." Many smaller cities are approaching a close second in the demands which their necessities are making upon the church. No one has yet developed the science of the city church. The rapid growth of our population makes the city a mission field of the magnitude of which has not yet been understood. As goes the cities, so goes America.

Charles H. Beck.

"THIS CAN'T BE THE PLACE."

"This can't be the place," protested Amy, as Margaret stopped before the sagging picket gate.

"Yes, it is," said her companion, consulting the slip of paper in her hand; "302 East Jefferson, and this is 302."

"There must be some mistake; they surely never meant to send us to such a place," exclaimed Amy.

"They're expecting us," answered Margaret in a low voice as a woman appeared in the doorway.

The two girls in their dainty suits and hats were in decided contrast to the unpainted, weather-beaten cottage, with its dilapidated porch and its sagging roof. Yet neither one was cleaner or neater than the little gray-haired woman in the door, her face alight with hospitable welcome as the girls came forward.

"You are my delegates?" she asked.

"Yes," assented Margaret. "And you are Mrs. Price? My name is Margaret Hughes, and this is my friend, Amy Clark."

"Come right in. You will find your room just at the head of the stairs. Dinner is ready as soon as you are."

"Well, what do you think of this?" Amy dropped her bag, and sank limply upon the bed, only to rise again for a tour of inspection. "She must expect us to wash in that bowl, Margaret! And I'll wager you it's a feather bed." She prodded the snowy counterpane investigatively. "It is," she nodded. "And so hot up under this roof! I can't stay here; that's settled."

"It is—different," conceded Margaret, who was smoothing back her hair in front of a cracked mirror. "But it's clean."

"Different? Clean?" retorted Amy. "Well, cleanliness is a virtue, but it doesn't make up for the lack of a bath-room and a good bed. We'll just take our bags back with us and ask the committee for another place."

"We'll" agreed Margaret.

Their hostess was waiting at the foot of the closed stairs for them, and led them into the room where a steaming dinner awaited them.

"My husband, Mr. Price," said his wife; and the girls found themselves shaking hands with a small man whose deep blue eyes looked at them dreamily from under heavy lashes.

The meal passed pleasantly. The thick slices of pink ham, accompanied by snowy potatoes and flaky biscuits, melted away before the onslaught of the two hungry girls. Mrs. Price passed the dishes temptingly, her eyes alight.

"I'm afraid we'll scare you," laughed Margaret. "But these biscuits are so good!"

"There, now! I'm always glad to see people eat. 'Specially young people."

"You have no young people?" queried Amy, then blushed angrily at her inquisitiveness as a look of pain flashed across Mrs. Price's face.

"Not now," she answered quietly; and the meal ended in a rather strained manner.

"Whatever did I say?" exclaimed Amy as they reached the hot little room once more.

"I don't know, but perhaps her children died."

"Well, we've got to hurry if we get to that afternoon session. I'm thankful we'll have a cooler place than this to sleep in to-night," said Amy.

"I'm going to stay here!" answered Margaret quietly.

"What?" gasped Amy.

"I don't think it would be very nice to leave after we've come here. Besides, I want to know her better."

"Oh, well, if you're going to stay, I'll have to, too," conceded Amy. "But I shouldn't think you could stand it here; it's so hot."

"She does, and it's only for three nights. I want to know her."

Margaret proceeded to make good her wish. She found time after the session at the church to give a full account to Mrs. Price.

"But why don't you go, too?" she demanded. "There's to be a real interesting programme to-night."

"Oh, I couldn't," answered Mrs. Price hastily. "I haven't anything fit to wear and besides—no; I guess I won't go to-night," and she disappeared kitchenward.

Margaret sat still, frowning slightly, and was unusually quiet when Amy appeared later.

Mrs. Price left the conversation entirely to her guests and her husband.

"Mr. Thomas gave a fine talk, and another Mr. Thomas is to sing to-night," explained Amy.

"Yes, they're my wife's brothers," Mr. Price could not conceal the note of pride in his voice. "You'd better go, Mary," he suggested.

"Not to-night," was the quiet reply; but Margaret caught the disappointed look on his face and the pain in his dark eyes.

The next day was unusually hot and sultry. After the morning session Margaret was forced to abandon any idea of attending the afternoon one. The heat had given her a severe headache, and Amy set off alone.

Mrs. Price settled Margaret on a couch in the cool parlor, and at Margaret's request, brought in her basket of mending. For some time the two sat in silence, Margaret watching the bright needle as it flew in and out. Gradually they began to talk. Under Margaret's skillful questioning and ready sympathy Mrs. Price was soon talking freely, pouring out her heart.

When Mrs. Price had gone to the kitchen to prepare supper, Margaret lay still in the cool room, mentally reviewing all that her hostess had told her. The only daughter in a family of boys, she had been loved and cared for by all and brought up in a comfortable farming community. Then, when her husband came, a well-dressed young man, of courteous manner and fine appearance her family was bitterly opposed to his courtship. But she loved him, and he loved her, and so they were married. They had bought this little cottage out of their joint savings, meaning to fix it up into a bower of beauty. But—Margaret remembered the deep sigh—times had been hard; there had been no work to do—Mr. Price had no trade—children had come, one after another; and one by one the plans were abandoned. But in spite of everything Mr. Price had always been good to her.

"He couldn't help it if there was no work, but my people are of the kind who think 'no work' and 'won't' are synonymous. But I understand him. We love each other," she had said simply.

Out of nine children, six died in infancy, one in girlhood, and two were living. Of these two, one was married and lived in a distant state. The other, a boy, had not got on well with his father. There had been words, hasty on both sides; and he had gone away. They didn't know where, and it was six months now.

"So we're all alone again, but we miss the children."

Margaret stirred restlessly. Mrs. Price was so bright and capable; so evidently fit for better things, it was a shame for her to be married to such a worthless man. And yet—he was good and kind. She herself could see that in the little attentions he paid his wife. And perhaps he couldn't help it. Anyhow, if his wife didn't judge against him, it wasn't her place to do so.

"But I do wish," she whispered, "that I could bring some sunshine into her life."

Amy came in from the meeting with an enthusiastic report.

"And, Margaret, they're decided to have a young folks' convention, and arouse the young people. It's to be next month, in our church. Won't that be splendid?"

"Fine," agreed her audience.

Suddenly a daring plan flashed into Margaret's mind.

"Mrs. Price, won't you come?"

For an instant a pleased look shone in Mrs. Price's deep eyes; then she shook her head.

"No, I couldn't go," she answered quietly.

"Why not?" demanded her husband.

A bright flush spread over her cheeks, but she made no answer.

"You must come and be my visitor," insisted Margaret. "Please say, 'Yes.' Maybe Mr. Price would come, too. Would you?"

"No." His eyes had grown keen, and his voice was very determined. "I—there wouldn't be money enough for that, but Mary shall go. Yes, you shall, Mary. It's the first time in a great many years that you've had such a nice invitation, and you're to accept." With that he rose and left the room.

Mrs. Price's eyes were shining.

"I expect, perhaps, I might come, Miss Margaret, if Jim sets his mind."

"It will be lovely," responded Margaret with enthusiasm. "For a whole week we'll play and play, and be young again."

The pink flush on Mrs. Price's cheeks was as young as that on Margaret's.

"I wish Jim could go," she said. "It would seem as if it was our wedding trip. But, of course, the tickets."

Margaret clapped her hands delightedly.

"I know fifty miles isn't much. I'll get brother to run the car over for me. Would you like that?"

"Like a trip in an automobile? I never was in one," she answered simply.

Margaret confided her plans to Amy, who was carried along on her enthusiasm.

"We'll give them the time of their lives," they decided.

Nothing could have been more ideal the day in which Margaret and her brother came for their guests. Mr. Price handed his smiling wife into the car with old-fashioned gallantry, but in their shabby valise, and stepped in beside her. Margaret did not attempt to make conversation as they sped along the smooth roads. From surreptitious glances she saw the enjoyment on their faces, and caught their lovelike attitude as they gazed wide-eyed on the country flashing by.

All too soon, it seemed, the streets of the city were reached. The car drew up before an imposing stone house, and Margaret bounded lightly to her feet.

"Here we are, and welcome home!"

The daintest room in the house, Margaret's own, was given over to her guests. Margaret saw the pleasure in Mrs. Price's eyes, and was forced to turn away to hide the sudden dimness in her own.

The days flew by swiftly. Margaret was delighted with her guests, and they seemed to have grown young again. Aside from the convention with its lectures, music, and general sociability, Margaret had planned automobile rides out into the surrounding country, and had shown all the sights of their bustling little city.

Finally the last day of the Price's stay arrived. The last night of the convention was to be given over to a social, to which all the young people of the city from all churches were invited.

Just after dinner Margaret slipped into Mrs. Price's room, with a filmy white gown over her arm. Mrs. Price was just combing her hair, drawing it back severely, as was her mode of hairdressing.

"Oh, don't do that!" exclaimed Margaret, surprised at the wealth of soft curling hair falling about her guest's shoulders.

With deft fingers Margaret gathered up the long strands, drawing it back loosely and pinning it up in a soft coil.

"How lovely you are!" she cried in frank admiration of the happy face. "Mrs. Price, I wonder if you won't wear white to-night."

"But I haven't any white dress."

"I know—but I hope you won't think I'm bold; but I've a little dress here that is too small for me, and I know it would just fit you. Won't you wear it, please?" Margaret stopped, her eyes pleading with the older woman.

For an instant Mrs. Price hesitated, then held out her hand.

"Yes, I'll wear it. Thank you."

"Oh, thank you," answered Margaret, as the white folds fell around Mrs. Price. "You're a dream! You'll be the belle to-night."

Margaret piloted her guest to a comfortable seat, and soon there was a laughing, chattering group around them, for they were well liked.

Margaret, for the moment unoccupied, looked out over the church parlors with shining eyes.

"I know they've had a good time," she thought; "and I'm so glad! But I wish they could always be like this."

Her eyes rested on a tall young man near her, who was standing alone. There was something in his face vaguely familiar; and yet he was, she knew, an absolute stranger to her. As she looked, he made a gesture which she recognized instantly. Quickly she walked over to him. He looked up, surprised as she addressed him.

"You—are John Price?"

"Yes." His manner was courteous, though wondering.

"I'm Margaret Hughes. No, you don't know me; but your mother and father would like to speak to you."

She laughed in sheer delight at the eager light on his face.

"Where are they?"

"Right here in the church. They've been visiting me for a week now, and to-morrow they go home," explained Margaret, as she led him to them.

"Mother! Father!" the big fellow exclaimed.

For a moment the little woman looked at him silently, too dazed to speak. Then she took his outstretched hand in hers, her eyes aglow.

Margaret watched the trio happily, and her face was very bright when the next morning she drove the three home in the car.

It was only a week given out of her overflowing life; yet she had given two people a new impetus for years to come, and had led a son to his parent's love.—Christian Endeavor World.

SOWING AND REAPING.

Now some one wants to know why it is more harmful for a girl to smoke than a boy. How can one lose sight of the fact, that God created woman to be the purest, cleanest, sweetest thing on this earth, and if she fails to set an example of excellence she will be doing more harm than any man on this earth can do. A noted physician has said that the girl who smokes will be a perfect physical wreck by the time she is thirty years old. One of the most important things in life is that the mothers of future generations should have robust health, and it is a black crime for girls to do anything that will impair their health.

The respect that men have for the female sex has more to do with their clean living than anything else in this world. We hear men say, "Let the girls smoke if they want to," but you will find that that class of men want girls to be as bad as they are, so they will have an excuse for their own evil habits. Our young men cannot get positions that require mental and moral strength if they smoke cigarettes. It is much worse than any other form of using tobacco, because the paper of which they are made has been saturated with some kind of dope that will ruin the health of the smokers.

Now young ladies, it is your privilege and bounden duty to use every power of mind, and soul, and strength, to keep your purity and cleanliness so that every young man with whom you come in contact may desire to be as perfect as you are. You cannot do this and smoke.

And now a young mother wants to know how to go about training her precious little boy so that he may escape the snares and pitfalls of life. The first requisite is to be sure that you are following divine guidance in your own life seven days in the week. Don't do anything that you would not be willing to see him do, and for sweet purity's sake teach him to obey you because he loves you and not because he is afraid of getting a beating. Don't let him contract evil habits in early childhood, that will give him trouble all his life, because you think he is too young to understand why he should not do these things. Teach him first to obey his parents, then to tell the truth and be unselfish, and above every thing else in the world teach him that our loving Father in heaven will guide him safely through life if he will let Him. When a child is taken to Christ before he is old enough to commit sin he will know exactly where to go for strength and pardon when an awakened conscience tells him he has broken God's laws.

It is one of the saddest things on this earth that we see in this "Christian America" thousands of children whose parents let them grow up to manhood and womanhood without ever giving them one single moral lesson. I had rather fold the little dimpled hands and hide the sunny curls, and laughing eyes under the daisies in the churchyard than to know that they were growing up with no knowledge of the Christ who died for them.

Ruth Fletcher.

Abraham Lincoln's great-great-grandfather established the first furnace and forge for making wrought iron in New England.

His name was Mordecai Lincoln.

Three of his sons acquired wealth and social distinction. Several of his grandsons were notable. One of them, Abraham, was chosen to make the address to Washington in Philadelphia after the Revolution and was a member of the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention of 1789-90.

Returning now to the great-great-grandfather of the President we will trace the line direct to the White House.

The great-grandfather was John Lincoln. By his father's will he was given 300 acres of land in New Jersey. He bought and sold land in New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Virginia, increasing the value of his holdings at each turn. His son Abraham, the President's grandfather, in 1789 sold his Virginia property for the round sum of 5000 pounds, and with his family, including his son Thomas, the President's father, went to Kentucky, where he purchased 2,600 acres.

Four years later he had gone to Kentucky and while at work with his boys in a clearing, he was shot by an Indian.

Thomas, the President's father, was then six years old. Under the laws in effect at that time, the oldest son inherited the father's estate in its entirety. The eldest son was Mordecai. Thomas was penniless, an orphan, to every school child.

This was the cause of the poverty and humble conditions of Thomas Lincoln. For 39 years, or until Abraham Lincoln reached the age of 23 and began his public life, this branch of the Lincoln family was in obscurity.

However, there flowed in Abraham Lincoln's veins some of the best blood in the country. How this asserted itself is known to every school child.

The writer may be stupid and unread, for he frankly admits that the history of the Lincoln family was sensational news to him. He always supposed Lincolns were a lot of ne'er-do-wells, spiritless and propertyless. The facts outlined here, are from "The

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, AUGUST 30.

Paul and the Philippian Jailer.

Lesson Text: Acts 16:19-34.

Golden Text: Acts 16:31.

The Central Truth: Prayer is the mightiest and most beneficent power that man can wield. God puts His entire omnipotence at the disposal of the man of believing prayer.

Scriptural Points.

1. The revival started at the conversion of Lydia and her household continued. Prayer services at the river side were held daily. The revival was attracting much attention.

2. A half-witted girl, possessed with a spirit of divination, followed Paul and his company and declared that they were servants of the living God and ministers of eternal salvation. This truthful statement was no doubt uttered in ridicule and contempt. Paul put up with it for several days, but at last he turned to the unfortunate girl and in the name of Jesus Christ commanded the evil spirit to come out of her. And the girl was restored to her normal self.

3. No longer the tool of Satan this girl could no longer indulge the peculiar art of fortune-telling. Being a loyal convert to Christianity she refused to continue in the unholy practice. Her masters could no longer make money out of her demoniacal dowry which had been taken from her and they became furious.

4. And they took vengeance upon Paul and Silas, because they were the main speakers at the prayer meeting. Luke and Timothy escaped arrest. Paul and Silas were arraigned before the city magistrates at the market place. They were charged with teaching unlawful customs and thereby disturbing the peace and quiet of the city. These were, as usual, false charges. Paul had put a stop to their traffic in a satanic art.

5. The multitude of bystanders joined the accusers in demanding severe and immediate punishment. At the command of the magistrates Paul and Silas were beaten with many stripes, probably thirty-nine each; for that was the legal number to be given for a simple offense.

6. With backs blue and bleeding these messengers of the cross were cast into prison and their feet made fast in the stocks, to prevent any possible escape. In this condition of pain and distress these men were not in the least cast down. They were still happy in the will of God. They sang praises to God that they were accounted worthy to suffer for the name of Jesus. And, like Jesus and Stephen, they prayed for their persecutors. This was kept until midnight when an earthquake shook the city most fearfully. Every prison door was opened. Every prisoner was loosed.

7. The awakened jailer seeing the jail door open and supposing the prisoners had escaped, drew a sword to take his own life. For it was the death penalty to allow prisoners to escape, and he preferred to administer this death penalty himself.

8. Paul interrupted this purpose to kill himself by assuring the jailer that none of the prisoners had escaped. This assurance from Paul was attended with a sinful conviction of the Spirit. Realizing now that his sinfulness was suspended over an awful hell, the jailer fell down before Paul and Silas and made the most important request of all the ages, "Sir, what must I do to be saved?"

9. Their answer embraced in one sentence the entire gospel of salvation, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house." They spoke further to the jailer and his household and explained the plan of salvation more fully. And he "believed in God with all his house."

10. The jailer gave four good evidences of a sound conversion. 1. He "rejoiced." He was happy in the Lord. 2. He "washed the stripes," and probably applied some healing ointment. 3. He received baptism and membership into the Christian Church. 4. He set the door down to an early breakfast.

Practical Points.

1. Persecution is often the best testimony of faithfulness. "Yea, and all that will godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." 2 Tim. 3:12.

2. Persecution is inevitable because it is the program of Christianity to destroy the works of the devil, such as the world, flesh, the saloon, the blind tiger, the brothel, and the immoral show. It is natural for the devil's crowd to oppose to the death the taking away of their means of pleasure and profit.

3. It is the artful policy of satan to persuade Christians to compromise their attitude toward his institutions and strongholds in order to perpetuate his reign of soul destruction. And so many accept this compromised attitude in order to escape persecution and be popular with the worldliminded.

4. The blessings of persecution are manifold. The flames of persecution tend to purify the gold of character, enlarge faith in God, elevate to heavenly places in Christ, and to make believers, "strong in the Lord and in the powers of his might." "Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of God."

5. In every distressful condition of life, however painful and disgraceful, there is something to be thankful for. Paul and Silas sang praises to God in jail. They were so thankful for "the unsearchable riches in Christ," which the world, the flesh, and the devil could not take away.

6. Satan is impotent to defeat the purposes of God, the faith of the Christian, and conquering sweep of the church of God.

7. The ultimate triumph of the kingdom of God is assured. The Almighty has given this decree of assurance: "But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." Num. 14:21.—Word of Life.

BE AN ELM.

Somewhere I've read: "If you want a tree for today, plant the poplar; if you want it to be there tomorrow, plant the elm."

"The poplar and the elm are both ambitious but the poplar lives for the present alone, and the elm has thought for the future. In the eagerness of its ambition, the poplar sends forth branches in the spring without developing the strength to support them in the sluggish days of summer. Its roots are constricted. its spread is narrow, its life brief.

"The elm grows roots that are deep and spreading. Expansion is its nature. Its fibers are tough and strong; it weathers wind and storm; it lives and grows for generations.

"The one provides for the present alone; the other has thought for the future." branching.

THE RABBI'S LOSS.

During the absence of Rabbi Meir, his two beautiful children died. His wife carried them to her room and laid them upon her bed. On reaching home, the Rabbi's first question was for his children. "They are not far away," the wife replied, and then addressed him thus: "Rabbi, I would propose one question: 'A person entrusted some jewels to my keeping, and now He demands them; should I give them back to Him?' " "What!" he exclaimed, "would you hesitate to restore to every one his own?" "No," she answered, "but I thought it best not to restore them without acquainting you." Then she led him to the room, and, removing the white covering from the little bodies, revealed the silent forms of his children. With tearful eyes and throbbing heart he exclaimed, "Blessed be the name of the Lord!"—Selected.

THE MERCY OF GOD.

"The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy."

Mercy is a favor shown to the undeserving. It is benevolence, tenderness, pity, compassion, clemency, shown toward offenders. The essential thing in mercy is that the person to whom a favor is shown is guilty and has no claim to mercy. If he has any claim that is proportionate with the favor bestowed, the act is one of justice and not of mercy. That God is a merciful being, no one can doubt. David said, "The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." (Psalm 103:8.)

That God has sent His Son into our world to die for us is ample argument that He is merciful and gracious. What father would give his son to die for the guilty? What ruler has there been who would give his only son to suffer a shameful death in order to sustain the honor of his own law and in order to save even a whole country of rebels? And where is the judge who, to save the guilty, would give up to the same death a much-beloved, an only son? Yet "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." And this gift was the proof of God's mercy; it was the expression of His mercy; it was the sacrifice which mercy made to save the guilty. For it cannot be said that the sufferings of Christ made any change in God. It is not true that God was originally stern, inflexible and unmerciful; and that He has been made mild and forgiving by the death of His Son. It is not true that those sorrows have made God different from what He was, He gave His Son to die, not that He might be made merciful, but as the expression of mercy; not that His mercy might be bought, but because He was originally so merciful that He was willing to submit to anything, even the ignominy and death of His Son that man might be saved.

A father standing on the shore of a river sees his child suddenly fall into the waters. The child struggles with the current, but is carried farther out into the stream and is sinking. The father will instinctively plunge into that stream, at the peril of his own life, to save that of his drowning child. But neither the danger of his child nor his piercing cry makes the father compassionate and kind. No, he loves his son so much that he is willing to throw himself into the river to save his life.

A country is invaded. A father lays his hand on the head of his only son and sends him forth to the field of strife and death. Does that invitation, that peril, make the father love his country? No. He so loved his country that to save it he was willing to part with his only son, if necessary, that he should pour out his blood in defence of his country.

In the same way God, the Father of mercies, looked on men. He so loved the world; He so pitied us; He so desired our welfare, that, to save us, He was willing to give up His Son to die. And such a death! What are all the strugglings of a drowning child; what are all the privations of a camp or the perils of the field of battle; what all the pains of sickness, the tortures of the rack, the severities of flame, compared with the sufferings of Jesus Christ. They stand alone. Nowhere has there been ignominy so great, torture so keen, and pain so bitter as the Son of God endured. No other spectacle has been witnessed like that when the Son of God was nailed to the cross. And when He had been waylaid and persecuted; when He had been rejected and spurned; when He was nailed to the tree; when He had been crowned with thorns; mercy still prevailed, and the murderers of the Son of God—the perpetrators of that great crime which has been unequaled by any other deed of human guilt—were told that they might be pardoned. And from that cross the proclamation has gone forth that all, no matter what their guilt, may be saved. Here flows blood so rich in the sight of God that it is sufficient to atone for the sins of the whole world, and all who are now penitent and all believe on His name may enter heaven.—Adam W. Miller.

PERSONAL INFLUENCE.

An atheist going along a country road overtook a woman poorly clad, who seemed strangely excited. Her face was glowing with a calm and radiant joy.

"What were you talking about as you walked along?" he asked.

"I nebber knowed I was talking; 'pears like I didn't notice myself. I was thinkin' as I look on de worl' an' de sky, an' took 'em all in, dat they is all mine—all mine, 'cause I is Christ's and Christ is God's!"

He was a learned man, but this was a kind of learning he had never heard of. He was a successful man, but here was such triumph that he had never dreamed of. He listened, full of curiosity to what the woman had to say; he went away, but the leaven worked, causing him so much thought that he never rested until he also could say: "They are all mine, for I am Christ's!"

This kind of influence counts. God owns it. It makes its impression upon the unsaved. The results are a blessing to the one who gives and the one who receives. No apology is needed because of any adverse effects. The earthly end of such a being is peace and joy and satisfaction.—Central Christian Advocate.

—Sir Ramsay MacDonald, Britain's Prime Minister, said recently: "I am amazed at a great many of my old friends saying that the old Scottish Sabbath was a burden. I would like to see a state of society where every man and woman preferred the old Scottish Sabbath to the modern French one, because in that state of society you would have fine, solid, eternal foundations of character and self-command."

AS LITTLE CHILDREN.

A Story of a Double Reunion.

At the little schoolhouse that stood on the hill for almost a century many persons had secured all the education they ever acquired.

It was a district school, in Philadelphia community, and in that community the spirit of brotherly love seemed to permeate the entire countryside—the simple-minded people living up to the spirit which the name typified.

At the time the events about to be related took place many of the early pupils of this school—in fact, nearly all of them—had passed away; but there were a few of the older ones left, and quite a number of the middle-aged. Of the younger generation there were at least several scores.

One of the former teachers of this school conceived the idea of having a reunion, and the proposition met with instant favor.

Wide publicity was given the approaching event, through the local paper, by word of mouth, and letters sent to those who now remount, and letters sent to those who now resided many miles away—some in adjoining states—informing one and all that on Saturday, August 23rd the reunion would be held.

And they came from every point of the compass. As early as nine o'clock they began to arrive, and by eleven the grove surrounding the little schoolhouse was crowded.

The spirit of these lines seemed to prevail:
Oh, Time, turn back, on the ceaseless way,
And make us boys and girls, just for today.

The years fell from the shoulders of the middle-aged and the old, as they caught the spirit of the youngsters, forgot their cares, discarded their dignity—some few had grown to be very dignified in everyday life—and romped and played as they did when they were indeed children.

"Do you remember the time?" was an oft-repeated question, asked perhaps a thousand times during the day, as pranks of the old days were recalled.

Conspicuous among the throng was Monroe Henderson—now an old man, gray of hair and stooped of shoulders. He had taught the school for a number of years. Under his tutelage had been the children of former pupils, yea, even a few grand-children of former pupils. He mounted an improvised rostrum, and called the roll, from memory. Quite a number answered, the girls saving "Present," while the boys, as in the olden days, responded "Here."

After the roll call there were some recitations. Mary Carnes, now a grandmother, recited a long string of verses, beginning:

"They've bought that bran' new organ,
Sue;

They've done just what they said they'd do—

And fetched it into church."

She continued through the entire poem, voicing her disapproval, in old-time, humorous fashion, of bringing a musical instrument into the church.

Then Hank Bankston regaled them with one of his early temperance speeches, the first verse running:

"There sat two glasses, filled to the brim,
On the rich man's table, rim to rim;
One was rich and red as blood,
The other as clear as a crystal flood."

After Hank's temperance lecture, extolling at great length the virtues of clear water and the disastrous effects of red wine, came the most humorous number of the program—a negro sermon. 'Lige Orr favored the crowd with the sermon he had delivered twenty years before, founded on the remarkable text: "Be sure your sins don't find you out."

Then Bill Lee and his daughters sang an old song which had to do with schools days, the departed boys and girls, the pranks of the young people, the youthful sweethearts. The song brought many chuckles from the young people, but the eyes of the old people grew moist as, in retrospect, they saw the happiest years of their lives, never to be forgotten.

At twelve o'clock the crowd stood and sang "Old Hundred" with vim and vigor, after which they adjourned for lunch. Baskets were brought from the buggies and other vehicles and the ladies got busy spreading the good things—fried chicken, pies, cakes and pickles. The hungry crowd then "fired and fell back," as the minister directed, after asking a blessing.

And they did all eat and were filled. While the fragments taken up might not have filled seven baskets, yet there was ample left with which to fill several shoe boxes, and these were sent to persons who were unable to be present by reason of illness or age.

For the afternoon there was no fixed program—in fact, no program at all. Everybody talked and laughed, still recalling school days. They all seemed to be enjoying themselves, with but two exceptions, and they were notable. John Parker and Jimmie Turner had not spoken for years. They had attended the same terms of school, years before, and were present today. They avoided one another. During the luncheon Parker sat at one end of the table, while Turner stubbornly stuck to the other extreme end. These men lived on adjoining farms, and their children were schoolmates. They did not, however, take any part in the estrangement between their parents. On the contrary they were the best of friends. In fact, young Johnnie Parker, eighteen years of age, was very much in love with Helen, the sixteen year old daughter of Turner.

Today Johnnie and Helen had managed to get together, after lunch, and sauntered out in the grove where they found a well-shaded fliver. The rear seat of this car proved an ideal courting place. Their whereabouts were unknown to their parents.

Mingling with his former pupils, Monroe Henderson came upon John Parker, Sr., and grasped his hand in a lingering greeting. They had only conversed a few minutes, when the old teacher's eyes noted Turner, and he exclaimed: "Why, bless me, if there isn't Jimmie; let's go and greet him."

"He does not speak to me," replied John, "though I can't blame him for not speaking."

"Why, John, my boy, I am surprised. What on earth is the matter with you fellows?"

Johnson led his former teacher to the outskirts of the crowd, and when they were out of earshot, said: "Mr. Henderson, I have to make a confession. Do you remember the time you whipped Jimmie, when a bunch of us boys got in that watermelon scrape—smashed up old man Taylor's melons?"

"Yes, John, I remember that quite distinctly; but, as I recall, the boy deserved the whipping."

"Teacher, you are mistaken. He didn't deserve the whipping. I deserved it. I acted a coward and kept silent and let the poor fellow get the flogging that I merited. He, like a gentleman, would not involve me, but took the licking himself. He has never spoken to me since. Now, I want to straighten the matter out. We are neighbors and ought to be friends. Will you undertake to bring about a reconciliation? I will make any sort of apology you think proper."

Monroe Henderson, despite his seventy odd years, still retained an inherent sense of humor. His face was thoughtful for a moment, and presently his eyes twinkled, which evidence of amusement the miserable John failed to observe. Then he spoke:

"Yes, John, I think it can be done. I will undertake it if you will permit me to go about it in my own way. There is a unique plan I would like to try. It may fail, but I am inclined to believe that it will succeed. If you'll agree to do just as I direct, I will undertake to bring about a reconciliation, otherwise I will not."

"Go ahead. You have my promise in advance to comply with your instruction. I'll do anything you say. This situation has existed until I am sick and tired of it."

Without another word, the old gentleman stepped into the bushes and cut a hickory switch. He carefully trimmed off the branches, took John by the hand and sternly commanded: "Come on, sir."

John followed, wonderingly. The teacher marched him down to where Jimmie was standing, whereupon he extended his hand, and in a friendly tone said, "Howdy, Jimmie; I'm mighty glad to see you, son."

Jimmie accepted the proffered hand, without so much as a glance at John.

"Jimmie," the teacher began, "you remember doubtless the time I whipped you in connection with a watermelon scrape."

Jimmie nodded, and the older man continued:

"John tells me that I was wrong—that he was the guilty party and merited the punishment. I want to apologize, son. While I can't undo what I did that day, I can rectify the mistake insofar as John is concerned. I now learn that he should have received the punishment then. It is a little late, but I am going to give it to him now."

And, without another word, he swung his right arm and started whipping John, just as he had whipped the unfortunate Jimmie, years before. Neither of the men was given time to remonstrate or to express any opinion. Jimmie stood, open-mouthed and wide-eyed, witnessing the unusual spectacle.

The beginning of such an unheard of procedure had created among the the pleasure seekers something of a sensation. The crowd had become somewhat scattered, but when they noted what was taking place they hurriedly gathered around the participants, until presently they were packed and jammed until there was barely room for the flying arms of the teacher as he delivered the blows. The small boys shrieked with laughter, and presently the grown people, thinking this merely one more unique way of reminding them of their school days, laughed until their sides hurt.

"Pour it on him!" yelled one fellow.

"Hit him hard! You ain't a hurtin' him," cried another.

"Make him dance!" urged an overgrown boy.

The participants soon caught the spirit of the onlookers, and the teacher's eyes now twinkled more than ever, and his firm mouth betrayed a smile; but his activities did not relax. He continued to ply the switch with even more pep. He was now landing the blows on the loose part of John's trousers, where they would make the most noise, and John proceeded to yell and dance as if he were being half killed.

During this time, far out in the grove a boy and a girl who had been seated in a flivver, now joined the crowd—Johnny and Helen—eager to see what had caused the commotion. They edged up to the circle and their eyes almost popped from their sockets when they witnessed the strange spectacle—the boy's father being whipped like a kid, and the girl's father standing by laughing as she had never seen him laugh before.

Finally the arm of the flayer slowed down, and then ceased entirely, whereupon John sank to a camp stool near by. No sooner was he seated than Jimmie came over and patted him gently on the back, and, in a loud tone, intended for the crowd, said:—"Sorry for you, John. You sure got a good one." Then, in a lower tone, intended only for Jimmie, "Bring your family over to my house Sunday. I want you to take dinner with us."

And the crowd, witnessing this wonderful performance—the flogging and the later sympathy by Jimmie—merely thought it all a joke, sprung by these "old boys" for the delight of the youngsters. One man declared that it was the crowning event of the occasion, and warmly congratulated the three performers for "putting on the show," as he expressed it.

And the crowd never knew any better.—Robert Otis Huie, in the American Agriculturist.

POETICAL GRAMMAR.

Three little words you often see
Are articles a, an, and the.
A noun the name of anything:
As school or garden, hoop or swing.
Adjectives, the kind of noun,
As great, small, pretty, white or brown.
Instead of noun the pronouns stand—
Her head, his face, your arm, my hand,
Verbs tell something to be done—
To read, count, laugh, sing, jump or run.
How things are done the adverbs tell
As slowly, quickly, ill or well.
Conjunctions join in the words together,
As men, and women, wind or weather.
The preposition stands before
A noun, as in or through the door.
The interjection shows surprise,
As Oh! how pretty. Ah! how wise.
The whole are called nine parts of speech,
Which reading, writing, speaking teach.

A Scholarship: how about it? Time is slipping by rapidly. Soon schools and colleges will open their doors to our young people for the fall work. Many of the boys and girls of the Methodist Protestant Church have recently graduated from some high school and are now looking about them at the different colleges, making plans to push forward to gain the higher education. Some are so fortunate in their home surroundings they can easily take up the college work and go each year with all ease. Others are not able to attend college who are eager for the college training. They have to devise ways and means whereby they can afford to enter college. It is of these young men and young women we wish you to think. In the Woman's Home Missionary Society of North Carolina there is a general scholarship loan fund for worthy young people who desire to go to High Point College. There is also the Emma B. Siler Scholarship for a girl going out of the Children's Home to the college. You can add to either of these funds.

Last year, your committee on scholarships grouped the societies by districts and made a plea for each group to raise a $100 scholarship for High Point College. Five scholarships were obtained; the committee felt that there could have been more. Think with me, were you unable financially to put your son or daughter in college and by means of a loan from our scholarship fund he or she could arrange to attend and thus prepare for a more useful life, would you be grateful that such an opportunity was given them?

We are confidently expecting every society that raised $100 for scholarship last year to do the same again this year, and we are believing there are several districts or individuals who will give a scholarship. There are so many who need this help. It is with great pleasure we add already to our list of scholarships a new one: this is given by the West End, Greensboro, Home Missionary Society. Who will be the next one to report a scholarship? If now alone, try to get other churches to group with yours, so your society can help send some worthy one to the college this fall. Please report to Mrs. Paul Burns, Spring Garden St., Greensboro, N. C. ships raised. She scholarship fund. But H. A. Garrett, Treas., High Point, N. C., quickly so the committee will know young people they will be able to assist. money is loaned by the committee without the approval and recommendation of Dr. Andrews, President, and N. M. Harrison, Jr., Dean of Men. Keep the scholarships on your mind and in your heart until you see that one is raised. Mrs. J. M. Stone.

Notice.

Six churches, First Church, Thomaville, English St., Welch Memorial, Lebanon, and First Church, High Point, and Mitchell's Grove, have been grouped together and are asked to contribute $100 for a scholarship in High Point College for the coming year. We are very anxious to collect this amount as soon as possible, and are asking the treasurers of the home missionary societies of these churches to send all money collected for this purpose to Mrs. H. A. Garrett, Treasurer, High Point College, High Point, N. C., at once. This money will be used as a loan fund to aid some deserving girl or boy in getting an education. We trust that this appeal will touch the heart of each member of this group, and cause her to respond with a generous contribution to a most worthy cause.

OBSCURE MARTYRS.

They have no place in storied page;
No rest in marble shrine;
They are past and gone with a perished age,
That died and "made no sign."
But work that shall find its wages yet,
And deeds that their God did not forget,
Done for their love divine—
These were their mourners, and these shall be
The crowns of their immortality.
Oh, seek them not where sleep the dead,
Ye shall not find their trace;
No graven stone is at their head,
No green grass hides their face;
But sad and unseen is their silent grave—
It may be the sand or the deep sea wave,
Or a lonely desert place;
For they need no prayer and no mourning bell
They are tombed in true hearts that knew them well.

They healed sick hearts till theirs were broken,
And dried sad eyes till theirs lost sight;
We shall know 't last by a certain token
How they fought and fell in the fight.
Salt tears of sorrow unhehld,
Passionate cries unchronicled,
And silent strifes for the right—
Angels shall count them, and earth shall sigh
That she left her best children to battle and die.

—Sir Edwin Arnold.

STIRRING UP GOD'S GIFT.

When Paul wrote to his young friend Timothy to "stir up the gift of God" which was in him, he probably did so because he realized that either through modesty or inertia Timothy was not really doing the work of which he was capable. He was a good young man, and there can be no doubt that he was exercising a beneficent influence upon the men and women around him; but Paul coveted for Timothy the most potent and the most widely extended influence which was possible to him, and he felt that Timothy was capable of better work than he had ever done before and that better work depended to no small degree upon Timothy himself. He had it in him to do certain things, but whether or not he would do them rested largely with himself; at the time Paul wrote he was not doing these things. It is just possible that Timothy's body was weakly and that his low physical vitality hampered his religious activities, yet in Paul's view it was possible to rise above this limitation, probably with distinct physical benefit.

What a wonderful change would come over the religious world today if everywhere men began to stir up the gift of God that is within them! What new voices and what new messages we should hear in the pulpit and on the platform! What new pens would thrill us, and persuade us, and challenge us to new thought and higher life! What new philanthropies would spring into being as the love of God has its way in the hearts of loving, but very busy men! What burdens would be lifted as strong men bowed their shoulders gladly to the load to help their weaker brethren! The impossible would happen in a thousand ways all over the world, as the divine energy which has been fretting unused in human lives found free and full expression.

Rightly viewed, most of our great discoveries in science and art have been simply the stirring up of some gift of God. We do not really create anything, we hardly even invent anything, we just discover things; and nearly all our great discoveries are rendered possible solely by the human spirit stirring up the divine fire which burns within it. God is in men, but it rests with men to say whether or not the Divine Spirit shall flame out in power and light and beauty in their lives. No doubt the Infinite could have His way without our consent, but He wills to work through the human will.

It is just possible that men are praying today for power to do certain things, or they are beseeching God to send other men who shall be able to do these things, and all the while the Spirit which can do these very things is struggling within them for liberty to leap forth and answer their own prayers. Centuries of experience have chiseled the old motto deep into human consciousness that "Heaven helps those who help themselves"—and this is truer than we deem it. The isolated, desolate, discouraged little church on the outermost border of Nowhere may be looking thousands of miles away for help which cometh not, and all the while the gift of God which shall transform that community lies not without but within. All that is needed is to stir up the gift of God.

It is just possible that some of us are spending too much time on our knees asking God to send us power when all we need is to use the power which He has already given. Our salvation is very often much nearer than we think. God is never far away. Everlastingly it is true, "In Him we live, and move, and have our being"; and His omnipotence is wherever He is. The power to do; the power to change a community, transform a nation, and evangelize a world, lies within the hearts of men. Let us stir up the gift of God, and miracles of healing and power and salvation will follow.—The New Outlook.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS.

(Hebrews 12:1 2)

By Rev. C. D. Gilkeson, D. D.

Dedicated to the Rev. Louis Armistead McMurray at his ordination to the foreign missionary service, and read by the author as part of the "charge" delivered on that occasion.

Jesus, for cleansing from all sin,
Jesus, for peace, thy peace, within,
Jesus, for strength the race to win,
I look to Thee.

Jesus, from sins that do beset,
From worry, unbelief, and fret,
From words that may bring me regret,
I look to Thee.

Jesus, for help from day to day,
To drop the weights that would delay
And hinder progress on the way,
I look to Thee.

Jesus, for grace, that men may see
Thy life, thy love revealed in me,
And thus be led to Calvary,
I look to Thee.

For vision, Lord, to see the right,
For courage, Lord, to fight the fight
Till victory's won, Lord, in thy might,
I look to Thee.

Refrain.

Jesus enthroned, I look to Thee;
My strength, my guide, O Saviour, be;
I look to Thee.

BE YE RECONCILED.

In the garret-room of a house in the under-quarter of Los Angeles a man sat motionless before a small table. He was past middle age, and his face, scarred by sin, was now strangely attentive. He was listening. The curious instruments on the table before him had snatched from the ether and made audible the voice of God's minister, "Be ye reconciled to God."

The minutes sped past. As the silent man in that upper room heard the pleading voice, he pictured the great church from which this radio sermon came. It had been years since he had attended church, and the smile on his face was self-mocking. He wondered if the plea for reconciliation could include him. And then came the words: "A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." The decision was made, the sinner repented, and there was joy in the presence of the angels in heaven.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

FROM PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

High Point.—The Mission Band, composed of girls from 12 to 16 years of age, held its monthly meeting Monday afternoon at the church with Mrs. S. S. Coe as temporary leader. A Home department has lately been added, and the dues will be divided equally between the Foreign and Home work. Mrs. J. D. Johnson, who was the efficient and popular leader of this group, has recently left High Point and removed to Macon, Ga., to make her home, and she is greatly missed by the girls. It is hoped that a permanent leader may be secured soon.

The pastor, Dr. Brown, and his wife will be absent from the city for a week. They expect to go to Wrightsville Beach with Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Montgomery. Their friends are pleased for them to have this outing and rest, as the unusually warm summer has been very trying.

The many friends of Mrs. Minnie P. Harrell are delighted to welcome her home again from a stay of three months in Tampa, Fla. with her sister, Mrs. Herman Meredith.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Hinkle and three children left last Thursday in their car for a trip to points in West Virginia to visit relatives of Mr. Hinkle.

Mr. W. A. Davis and children are spending two weeks at Piedmont Springs.

Mrs. J. A. Gray and sons, Elson and Joseph, returned last Thursday night from a week's visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hutchison of Charlotte. Mrs. Weaver Marr and children, who have been guests of her parents, Dr. and Mrs. Brown, left Friday for Asheville, where they will be joined by Mr. Marr for a visit to his relatives for two weeks. From there they will go to their home in Jacksonville, Fla.

Rev. and Mrs. C. W. Bates of Asheville spent a few days last week with Dr. and Mrs. Brown at the Parsonage.

New books for the Sunday school library will soon be purchased, and Miss Mami Hough, the faithful librarian, is now making out a suitable list. This will be welcome news to the children and young people who are fond of reading.

Mr. L. R. Johnson, principal of High Point high school, returned Friday from New York where he has been attending summer school at Columbia University. Miss Myrtle Ashcraft of Wadesboro has been spending the summer with her friend, Mrs. Johnson, during his absence.

We regret to note that Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Shields will return to their former home in Greensboro, where he will engage in business. Since uniting with our church last April they have made many friends among the members of the congregation, who will reluctantly part with them.

Dr. and Mrs. R. M. Andrews are building an attractive brick residence on West College Drive, near the College campus, and expect to be ready to move into it about October. The section of the city around the College is rapidly developing into a beautiful residential district.

Stanly Charge.—After having closed a series of excellent preaching, presented by Rev. J. R. Hutton of Greensboro we actually had two more great sermons yesterday, delivered by our pastor, Rev. Atlas Ridge. Using for his morning text: 2 Timothy 2:3. "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," he certainly did preach a great sermon. After the sermon he received three young people into our church on profession of faith.

Those joined are: Misses Davis, Marie Hattey, Geneva Herlocker, Ruth Almond. May we as church members do our duty in helping the dear one along life's pathway.

He also baptized two infants and Geneva, one of those who joined the church.

At the evening service he delivered one of the most powerful sermons I believe I ever heard. I am sure those who did not hear this message missed a great lesson.

Mr. Ridge has just closed a five day's meeting at Porters, with Mr. Whitaker of High Point as pulpit help. Mr. Whitaker returned home Wednesday morning on account of a rally to be held at his church.

Mr. Ridge continued the meeting until Thursday eve. He said they had the best meeting that they had had during the four years of his stay here.

Our Sunday school is doing well. We still have a very good attendance, 143 present and collection of $2.58.

The community was sad on last Tuesday night when the news went out that "Aunt Sarah Herlocker" as everybody called her was called from her earthly home to a home on high.

She had been in failing health for a number of years and could not attend church but while she could not she was always interested in it and the welfare of it.

Aunt Sarah was a true and loving mother and was loved by all who knew her. She will be greatly missed in her church and community and especially in her home.

She joined Friendship M. P. church fifty or more years ago and remained a true and faithful member until death.

While the church has lost a faithful member others have lost a loving mother.

Aunt Sarah was seventy-one years of age. The family has our entire and deepest sympathy in the loss of their loving mother and grandmother.

Belmont, Mt. Hermon Circuit.—Sunday-school is still moving along nicely, although the attendance was not very good to-day. So many of our people attended the revival services at Mt. Pleasant, Mt. Hermon, and St. Paul. Our hearts were filled with sorrow this morning because our superintendent, Mr. A. Nicholson, was unable to be with us. He will leave to-morrow, Aug. 17, for Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, where he will undergo an operation. Mr. Nicholson has been faithful to his duty and is loved by all. Our prayers go with him, that God may restore him to health.

Our children's day service was held the fourth Sunday night in July. The children rendered their parts well. The pageant,

"The Call," which was given by the large girls was especially beautiful and impressive. The offering amounted to $30.49.

Our revival meeting will begin Sunday, August 23rd with Bro. Gerringer as pulpit help. As far as I know there will be three services on Sunday and we will be mighty glad to have all our old members worship with us. Our church has been greatly revived and 27 new members added to it as a result of the revival prayer service, but still the harvest is great and there is work for all. Let us pray that God may pour out His blessings upon us, and that many souls may be saved. Reporter.

Graham.—Last Sunday our pastor, Rev. D. R. Williams, delivered two splendid sermons. Twenty-three new members have been received into our church so far this year.

We had children's day service on Sunday, Aug. 9th, at 8 P. M. The children gave an interesting program. Much credit is due Mrs. Arthur Williams and Miss Mabel Cheek who labored faithfully to make it a success. The offering amounted to $28.00.

At the quarterly conference held the first evening in August, Brother D. M. Johnson was elected delegate to the Annual Conference.

The ladies' aid society held an ice cream supper at the church on last Friday evening. The proceeds amounted to about $36.00.

The church has been painted recently and now presents a much more attractive appearance.

A number of our Sunday school and our church members attended the union picnic on August 8 at Kimeville. Members from five different churches of the town were present and enjoyed the afternoon. The crowd was estimated to be about 600. Reporter.

Hawkins Chapel, Littleton Ct.—The revival meeting began August 9th and continued until Thursday night. Rev. M. P. Chambliss was pulpit helper. He rendered some splendid sermons. Only a few attended these services who did not claim to be Christians. These we failed to reach. We were glad to have Rev. A. G. Dixon with us the beginning of our service and Mr. W. R. Vaughn of Henderson. Both of these men spoke concerning our college at High Point. I do not know how much money Mr. Vaughn received; he will report it.

May the dear Lord abide with us forever. Maggie Hawkins, Reporter.

Alleghany, Davidson Ct.—Our protracted meeting commenced the second Sunday in August and lasted until Friday night. We had a good meeting. Seven were converted or reclaimed and two joined the church, a father and his son. There was a large crowd on Sunday and of a night the house was crowded and the doors and windows full of people trying to hear Brother Jones preach.

Brother Ridge preached twice on Sunday—good sermons. On Monday Brother E. W. Jones came in and preached the rest of the time. He preached some as good sermons as I ever heard. He gave both saint and sinner their portion and some did seem to heed and come in while others would not come in. I hope that rest till they find Jesus precious souls, for it is dangerous to live in sin.

We had Sunday school yesterday. While there were several protracted meetings in reach there were 36 present. Some love the Sunday school. I think the Sunday school is a great help to keep us right and help us on the way. There is something for each of us to do. On Sunday the collection was for the Children's Home. It was about $8.00. Paid Brother Jones about $28. We hope he will come this way again. Pray for him, pray for Brother Ridge, that the Lord will wonderfully bless them. We ask all to pray for the young converts. And those two that joined the church. Abigail Coggin.

Concord.—The third quarterly conference was held August 11th. The conference elected Mr. W. J. Widerhouse as delegate to the Annual Conference. The reports from the pastor, Sunday school, Endeavor societies, and other organizations were very encouraging.

The Sunday school has purchased new primary and junior hymnals for these two departments.

The church service is well attended. Last Sunday the pastor preached a very impressive sermon at the morning hour on "Piloting the Ship of Life." The Sunday night service was unusually well attended. Quite a number of visitors were present. Pastor Lindley's messages are always inspiring, but this one was unusually good.

Maggie Mann, Asst. Rep.

Randleman.—Mrs. Neese has returned from the Sanatorium. Mrs. Sarah McCollum of Mt. Lebanon church departed this life August 11. She suffered much, but bore it patiently. She braved the end with an unwavering faith, and left a testimony to cheer and gladden the hearts of those who survive.

Our special meeting at Mt. Lebanon is to begin the first Sunday in September. Dr. George R. Brown is our engaged help. We are looking forward to a real awakening along spiritual lines.

Wm. H. Neese.

Shiloh.—Our Sunday school is progressing nicely considering the sickness and visiting. Rev. Raymond Gertner will start a revival meeting Sunday, August 23. We are hoping to have good attendance.

"God will bring every work unto judgment, whether it be good or whether it be evil."

We should now acquaint ourselves with God by proving his promises. Angels record every prayer that is earnest and sincere. We should rather dispense with selfish gratifications than neglect communion with God. The deepest poverty, the greatest self-denial, with His approval, is better than riches, honors, ease, and friendship without it. We must take time to pray. "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

Best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

Macy Martin.

—WHY DO YOU GO TO CHURCH?

Halifax Circuit.—We began our protracted meeting at Eden church on Sunday, August 2nd. Mrs. A. G. Dixon was with us from the beginning to the close and did most of the preaching. Dr. Dixon came on Tuesday evening and remained with us until we closed Friday evening, and preached for us three times. The church was greatly revived and we had 17 conversions and reclamations and five additions to the church.

We will begin our meeting at Union tomorrow, Aug. 16th. We are praying for and expecting a good revival here.

The people of the charge are still pounding us. We want to thank W. L. Ross for flour, coffee, rolled oats, salmon, pine apple, sugar, rice, macaroni, soap, washing powder tea, post toasties, flavoring, and a canteloupe; Mrs. Edwards for sugar; Norwood Aycock, for ice; Mrs. S. A. Whitley for eggs and peaches; Mr. B. F. Willey, for gasoline; Mrs. N. M. Harrison for shoulder of meat; Mrs. T. C. Williams for meat; Mrs. E. G. Glenn, for silk hose and socks.

C. L. Spencer, Pastor.

Love's Grove, Midland Ct.—We are moving along very well here in our Master's vineyard. There is plenty of work to do here yet. Our protracted meeting started Aug. 9th and closed the 14th with Brother Ridenhour and an evangelist from the Baptist church. Brother Waldrop, who did all the preaching. He did it well, with soul stirring gospel sermons which brought forth fruit. The church was greatly revised. Eight joined the church and I think there will be more later.

In appreciation of Bro. Waldrop's service there was a purse made up for him of over $54. And that was not enough yet, so the church pounded Brother Ridenhour so that it took two Fords to move it to the Parsonage. There was a large attendance all through the meeting, with some from away in attendance; Bro. Dixon Reed on Sunday and Mrs. Lettie Cooper of Greensboro the most of the meeting and Bro. A. Ridge of Friendship. I want to say to you good people thank you, and come this way again often. I will close as our pastor will report soon.

I want to ask the prayers of all God's people for us all.

With best wishes to all,

John N. Smith.

Pageland.—We have been very quiet so far as reports in the Herald are concerned, but that does not say that we have been idle or loafing on the job. With many other duties the pastor has been waiting and hoping that someone else would take the responsibility as reporter, but seeing no reports from the work I feel that the readers of the Herald should know that we are still on the job. So far I have filled all appointments as near as possible since entering upon my work. The work is moving on nicely so far as interest is concerned, but we are far behind with our Conference claims. We have had three Children's Day programs and the offerings at each church were very good. They should have been much larger. The children did well and large audiences greeted us at each church.

So far we have had only one of our special

Hope Sunday, August 23rd. The pastor will preach on Sunday and Bro. C. E. Phillips will come and do the preaching beginning Monday. Our meeting at Rose Hill will follow the following Sunday with Bro. Phillips as our help. Pray for us that we may have a great ingathering of souls for the Master. Our meeting at Bethesda was held in July with Bro. M. P. Chambliss as our help. Bro. Quick was there and preached at the eleven o'clock hour on the 14th Sunday and Bro. Chambliss did the preaching during the remainder of the meeting. Forty-eight came forward confessing faith in Christ and reconsecrating their lives to his service.

Some improvements have been made in equipment at the Rose Hill church. A new piano has been bought and our church has been wired in order to be lighted from the Southern Power Company line that lights our town. Some improvements have been made on the grounds at New Hope Church. We hope to do more later in the fall and beautify our church grounds with shrubbery and grass. Plans have been considered for Sunday school rooms at Rose Hill and we hope to begin work on same in the near future. We have outgrown and are in need of Sunday school rooms here. All the churches need Sunday school rooms and we hope to try to build at the other churches soon.

Third quarterly conference was held at New Hope and Bro. Earl Cook was elected delegate to Annual Conference. The fourth quarterly Conference will be held in Pageland at Rose Hill. Reports of officials were very good from Rose Hill and New Hope; the other two churches were not represented. Our Herald subscription has been increased some and we hope to increase it more before conference meets this fall.

Bro. Chambliss preached the plain simple gospel. He preaches with power and puts his whole soul into his work. He is young in the work as a pastor but is doing a great work and is rapidly making a place among the preachers of our church as a noted evangelist. He has the talent for an evangelist and with a few years experience I feel that he will have a place in our conference as a noted evangelist. May God wonderfully bless him in his work.

With best wishes to the Herald and its readers, I am yours in His service,

M. Ivey Crutchfield, Pastor.

Asheville.—Brother Bates is spending the week at Mt. Pleasant in a meeting with Bro. G. F. Milliaway. Mrs. Bates and the children are visiting on Granville circuit.

Rev. Homer Casto of Bethel Home preached for us last Sunday. His messages are always enjoyed.

At our third quarterly conference last week Miss Norvella McIntyre was declared elected delegate to the Annual Conference. There were good reports from the various departments. Our pastor made 252 visits during the quarter. The attendance at preaching services has been gratifying, a number of strangers at each service. The Ladies' Aid has received $250.04.

The conference requested Bro. Bates to exhort to the family of Rev. W. C. Kennett our sympathy, and our appreciation of his life.

Thanks of the conference were extended to Bro. Cashatt for his services in rounding up delinquents and urging them to pay up all obligations during the month of August.

More than a dozen of our members are ill and must be kept away from church.

Reporter.

Hebron Church, Orange Charge.—The revival services began at this church Sunday August, 9th. Rev. D. R. Williams came for the Sunday afternoon service and remained until the close Thursday night. Bro. Williams was at his best. His messages were delivered with power and were well received.

Results: a number reconsecrated themselves. Five or six conversions, four additions to the church.

A purse of $21.00 was given to Bro. Williams. Bro. T. O. Pender assisted in the singing. Some money was given him.

Announcements: Rev. T. F. McCulloch will preach at the following times and places: Meleron 4th Sunday, August, 11:00 A. M. C. Ridge 4th Sunday, August, 3:00 P. M.

Sincerely,

B. M. Williams.

Vickrey, Guilford Circuit.—I am taking the privilege to report from Vickrey church as we haven't been heard from recently.

A circuit rally was held at this church on Thursday, August 13th. We count it one of the best days there has ever been at Vickrey, but when you know the speakers you can't wonder at its being a good day for us. Miteneis Grove, Fairfield, Hickory Grove and Vickrey were well represented. Every church represented took part in the program during the day. There were two splendid addresses in the morning by Dr. Brown and Dr. R. M. Andrews. The afternoon services began by the children from the Home rendering a very entertaining program, after which Rev. Joseph Lynch made a very interesting talk, and there came the talks by Dr. and Mrs. A. G. Dixon. The singing of a solo, "Tell Me the Story of Jesus," by Rev. Lester Ballard added greatly to the program. Another enjoyable feature was the picnic dinner with plenty of ice cold lemonade. It was unanimously voted that this rally be an annual occasion. J. F. Marsh from Vickrey, was elected secretary for the rally.

E. Holton.

Henderson.—

Rev. and Mrs. J. E. Pritchard are back and all the regular services started again yesterday.

Mr. Pritchard didn't receive much rest on his vacation as he was helping in a meeting at Tabernacle church near Greensboro. Mrs. Pritchard has been visiting relatives near Siler City.

Mr. and Mrs. Ray Dickerson entertained the Baracas, Philatheas and the choir at a watermelon feast out on their farm on the night of August 3rd.

Our revival meeting begins first Sunday in September. Rev. J. R. Hutton, of Greensboro, has been engaged as pulpit helper.

Reporter.

Whitakers, Whitakers Charge.--Things have been moving with us lately. On the 6th of Aug. we held our S. S. picnic at Braswell's Park, Rocky Mount. A good attendance and big dinner, which was thoroughly enjoyed by all. The children enjoyed it so much, as there was everything there to give them a good time. Last Tuesday our C. E. society came out to our big grove here and had a delightful dinner of barbecue and Brunswick stew. We've done this now for two years, and while we enjoy the dinner, the greatest thing is the fellowship with one another. They bring their work and all sit around in the shade of the big oaks and work, and play games. There were 44 present at this dinner. Last Thursday night Spencer Cutchin gave a play ("June"), which she had worked up with the "Intermediates." This was well rendered and enjoyed by all. It was worth the price of the play to see Undine Hull and Will Bond Ray act the part of negroes, they were fine. The money is to be sent to Mr. Auman to be used toward educating a boy in his school. Mr. Auman organized this bunch of children as juniors. They are now "Intermediates." Yesterday our Ladies' Aid and W. F. M. S. met near Battleboro, with one of our oldest members, Miss Cornelia Bedgood, a faithful and loyal member, and we hope we were able to carry a little cheer into her lonely life. We had a full attendance, only three of our members being absent.

Notwithstanding the fact that our pastor was away all last week preaching in a revival and of course broken down, yet he gave us two splendid sermons last Sunday. He is away again this week in meetings. Our Sunday school attendance has been fine all through the hot weather. We have not experienced the usual summer "slump." At our Ladies' Aid meeting yesterday we were discussing the fine compliment paid us by Pres. Dixon, when he said we were so well up with everything there was no need of his coming to us, so if we get him to visit us we must get behind. Now that's too bad. If he would make a visit to score us for being behind, we think he might have made us one to praise us. However, we hated to miss having him with us, as it's always a pleasure to see and hear him.

Our people through this section have been especially blest by a kind Providence in protecting our crops through the storms. Our neighboring sections have been visited with destructive storms, laying waste their year's work. Our sympathy goes out to them, and we ought to realize how very much we owe to our Father for this wise protection, and be more humble and give our lives more completely to His service. For "To whom much is given, from him much is expected."

Best wishes to all readers.

D'you know what I'd do?

Well, I'd dig a deep hole--

Right under that tree--

Then I'd go down--and down,

And find out where the tree starts,

And I'd find out how it eats and drinks,

And what makes it grow. . .

Yes I would!

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, AUGUST 23.

The Macedonian Call.

Lesson Text: Acts 16:6-15.

Golden Text: Acts 16:9.

The Central Truth: The Holy Spirit not only issues the call to the ministry but He also directs the activities of those who toil in the great harvest field of lost souls.

Scriptural Points.

1. Let it be borne in mind that Paul was called of God to be a pioneer missionary to the Gentile world. In Rom. 15:20 he wrote: "So have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation."

2. And also let it be borne in mind that the chief objective of his second missionary journey was not the immediate purpose, namely, the strengthening of the churches already established, but the carrying the gospel to the regions beyond, even into the continent of Europe.
